FALKIRK—(From a Correspondent).—Mr. Morison Kyle's concert came off last night in the Corn Exchange. All who appreciate first-class music and first-rate singers, embraced the opportunity of enjoying one of the most refined musical performances ever given in Falkirk. Madame Florence Lancia, a singer of continental reputation, and Mr. Augustus Braham, were the vocalists. Miss Lancia, unlike others of her class, pre-eminently excels where acting is not required, and she has only to make her voice heard to give universal satisfaction. It is not too much to say that her voice is adequate to the severest tests, and that, true as the finest toned instrument, it is capable of sustaining every conceivable variety of expression. We have no hesitation in saying that a bright future is in store for such talents as Miss Lancia possesses. Of Mr. Braham we need say little lest we should say too much. His fame is already so well established that it does not require any effort on our part to add to its brilliancy. Miss Leng is rather a pleasing contralto, but we think she is scarcely heard to advantage in a large hall. There is no want of expression of fervour, but this seems to assume at times the character of a shake disagreeable than otherwise. She sings an excellent second, and could she but dispense with the little drawback we have named, her merits would be considerably enhanced. Mr. Seguin was well received. He has an excellent bass voice, and can make himself heard with effect. Of Mr. Julian Adams' performances we had occasion to speak lately in terms of high praise, and it is enough to repeat that his solos on the pianoforte and concertina gave as usual the greatest satisfaction. The entertainment, as we have already said, was of the very highest class, and the thanks of the music-loving portion of the community are due to Mr. Kyle for his successful endeavours to introduce them to a more elevated and refined musical sentiment than they have hitherto been privileged to hear or admire. —The Falkirk Herald, April 12th, 1860.

FOREIGN.

VIENNA.—M. Leopold de Meyer gave his second concert, a few days ago, in the small Redouten-Saal, which was filled by an audience as brilliant as it was numerous. M. de Meyer is one of those few artists whose rich fancy is constantly producing fresh works. This rare quality places him in the agreeable position of always being able to offer his friends and the admirers of his talent some novelty or other. If, to this great facility of production, we add the undisputed mastery of his play, the surprising bravura of his magnificent manual skill, and the elegance as well as delicacy of his style, it is easy to form an idea of the charm which his concerts possess for the art-loving public. Of the new pieces presented to us on this occasion by M. de Meyer, we must more especially mention, "Ein Alpenlied," containing the most charming effects; a grand fantasia on themes from Le Pardon de Ploërmel, and a grand duet—in which he was assisted by Mdlle. Fiby—on themes from Il Trovatore. These pieces gained for him, in his double character of composer and virtuoso, the most rapturous applause and repeated recalls. The "Fantasia-Polka," Ein Kinddes Glücks, introduced to our notice at the first concert, also excited the warmest approbation, the composer being obliged, in obedience to the flattering pertinacity of the audience, to repeat it. The beautiful introduction with which M. de Meyer ushered in the piece on repeating it, was especially liked. After M. de Meyer, Mdlle. Fiby rivetted the attention of the audience, and deservedly came in for her share of the applause and the results, both by her charming personal appearance, and her finished, temperate and feeling play. That highly gifted and talented vocalist, Madlle Frankenberg, distinguished herself no less. Her fine, powerful and fresh voice, to which she imparts such life and impression, will, doubtless, soon win a fitting sphere of action on the stage. The concert was honoured by the presence of their Imperial Highnesses, the Archduchess Sophie and the Archduke Ludwig-Victor.—Vienna Presse.

BRUSSELS.—The Théâtre de la Monnaie is oscillating, as far as novelty is concerned, between Le Pardon de Ploërmel and Gustave III., while M. Maillart's Dragons de Villars and Verdi's Ernani are being got up. These two operas will be preceded by M. Burgmuller's Péri. This ballet, represented here for the first time on the 12th December, 1844, was warmly applauded on its revival. An Italian company, under the direction of M. Eugenio Meressilos, begun a series of performances in the Théâtre du Cirque. Their first opera was Lucrezia Borgia.—On Easter Sunday, Mozart's seventh mass in G, and motets by the great masters, were admirably executed at Saint Gudule, by a numerous body of picked singers and instrumentalists.

Bologna, September 22nd, 1770.

I hope that our mother is well, as also yourself; and I desire that for the future you will answer my letters more regularly, for it is easier to answer than to find things to say of one's own.

The six minuets of Haydn please me more than the first twelve. We have been obliged to play them very often to the Countess, and we should like to introduce the taste for German minuets into Italy, for their minuets will soon become as long as entire symphonies. Forgive me for writing so badly; I am in haste, otherwise I am capable of doing better.

Bologna, Sept. 29th, 1770.

We are extremely sorry to hear such bad news of our good Martha. I pray God to strengthen her. But what is to be done? We think of her all the day long.

Wolfgang has commenced to-day the recitatives of his opera.

P.S. of Wolfgang.—I will add a few words just to fill up the letter. I pity poor Martha with all my heart, ill for so long a time and yet so patient. I trust, with God's help, she will recover her health; if not, one must not grieve too much, because God's will is always best, and God knows better than us, whether it is best for her to stay in this world or to go to the other one; let her cheer up then, but who knows but that she may suddenly see the same change for fine weather.

The Same to the Same.—

Bologna, Oct. 6th, 1770.

We have been in town for five days; we were at the fête of St. Petronius, which is celebrated magnificently here in the immense church dedicated to this saint. A musical service is got up, in which all the musicians in Bologna take part. We ought to have left here on Tuesday for Milan; but there is something here which will detain us. It is "something," if it comes to pass, will do great honour to Wolfgang.

The father, Martini, has received the method for violin that you sent him; we are the best friends in the world. He has finished the second part of his work; I shall bring back the two parts. We go every day to see him, and have long dissertations historico-musical.

So you have had three concerts, and have not invited us! Very well. We should have appeared like phantoms, and vanished in the same style.

P.S. from Wolfgang.—Why was I not with you, to amuse myself with you! I hope Martha is better. I played the organ to-day at the Dominicans; my remembrances to all the small Theresas.* To all our friends inside the house, and out of it, my compliments. I should like to hear the symphonies of the Berehl Garden and contribute my quota of trumpet and fife. I saw and heard the grand ceremony of Saint Petronius at Bologna. It was fine, but long; they were obliged to bring trumpets from Lucca to play flourishes, but they played in an abominable manner.

* The 15th October, St. Theresa's day.

ANCIENT SONGS, BALLADS, & DANCE TUNES,

Illustrating the National Music of England; with Remarks and Anecdote. Preceded by a short account of the Minstrels, and Introductions to the various Reigns, by

W. CHAPPELL, F.S.A.,

THE AIRS HARMONIZED BY G. A. MACFARREN.

In Two Vols. Imp. 8vo., £2 8s.; or in 17 Parts, each 3s.

"The main body of the work consists of a mass of erudition, no less copious than well digested. Mr. Chappell's work is the only one of its kind."—Quarterly Review, July, '59.

"This book does every credit to the patience, intelligence, and modesty of its author."—Athenæum, August 13th, '59.

"Not two, but twenty notices could be written of this excellent and carefully wrought book."—Athenæum, August 20, '59.

"The book is indeed one which the ladies will delight in for its music, and graver readers for its curious learning."—Notes and Queries, July 9.

"The student of history, the antiquary, the reader for amusement, and the cultivated lover of sweet sounds, will come alike to Mr. Chappell's volumes in search of gratification for their several tastes, and will assuredly not come in vain."—Gentleman's Magazine, August, '57.

"In the limits of a short notice it is impossible to do justice to Mr. Chappell's volumes. They are full of pleasant matter for every class of reader."—Examiner, Sept. 17.

"'Popular Music of the Olden Time,' one of the greatest and most valuable works which have ever issued from the English musical press."—Spectator, March 5, '59.

"Antique specimens furnished by Mr. W. Chappell's invaluable work on 'Popular Music of the Olden Time.'"—Times, March, 31, '59.

"There is an enormous amount of research in Mr. Chappell's book, yet no sign of labour; no heaviness whatever; but, on the contrary, the author gives the results of his studies briefly, smoothly, pleasantly as possible."—Morning Post, Sept. 22.

"Mr. William Chappell's great collection of our national songs and ballads, is, in truth, an English classic, a standard work—distinguished not only as a vast storehouse of the treasures of genuine English music and song—but as a literary work of great learning and research, and so full of curious and interesting information relative to the music, as well as the manners and customs of our ancestors, that it may be regarded as a contribution not only to the history of music, but to the history of England."—Daily News, Dec. 7, '58.

"An invaluable history of the early music of this country, the fruit of study, at once patient and unwearying, and of investigation adequately learned and intelligent."—Morning Herald, Sept. 1, '56.

"We heartily recommend this important and admirable work to the attention, not of musical readers only, but of the whole public. It is full of interesting information, the result of great learning and deep research; while it is attractive from its pictures of society and manners among our ancestors, and from the exceedingly pleasant and animated style in which it is written."—Daily News, Oct. 11, '59.

"Mr. Chappell's collection is in all respects a remarkable work, one of those which an honest enthusiasm may, but a money-fee never can, produce."—Chambers's Journal, Oct. 23, '58.

DR. MARK'S
GREAT NATIONAL ENTERPRISE

Organised in 1848, and developed at THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC BRIDGE STREET, MANCHESTER, established by him expressly as a Great National Institution to facilitate the Encouragement and Promotion of NATIVE MUSICAL TALENT, and the GENERAL ADVANCEMENT OF MUSIC AMONG THE RISING GENERATION, upon his new and effective system, also as a NORMAL SCHOOL for the training of masters to conduct CONSERVATOIRES OF MUSIC to be established throughout the United Kingdom, for LITTLE CHILDREN, the whole comprising an entirely new scheme of NATIONAL EDUCATION, by blending music with general instruction, so that the study of music shall become a branch of education in the humblest of schools of this country. To illustrate and to rouse an interest in every town and city for these institutions, Dr. Mark travels with a number of his pupils occasionally through the country—giving lectures, and introducing his highly approved and pleasing Musical Entertainment, entitled DR. MARK AND HIS LITTLE MEN, who number upwards of Thirty Instrumentalists, and a most Efficient Chorus, the whole forming a most unique and complete Juvenile Orchestra, composed of LITTLE ENGLISH, IRISH, SCOTCH AND WELCH BOYS, FROM FIVE TO SIXTEEN YEARS OF AGE, who play Operatic Selections, Solos, Marches, Quadrilles, Galops, &c., and sing Songs and Choruses in a most effective manner, and to whom Dr. Mark gives a gratuitous General and Musical Education.

APPOINTMENTS OF MASTERS AND ARRANGEMENTS OF CLASSES IN THE ABOVE INSTITUTION.

Principal of the Royal College of Music; Director, Composer, and Conductor; Lecturer to both Private and Public, Theoretical and Practical Instrumental and Vocal Classes	Dr. MARK.

Vocal Classes	Messrs. POWELL and ELDER.

Dr. MARK has also made provision for the Orphans of the Musical Profession possessing musical talent, who will find the above institution a happy home, and receive a most effective general and musical education, board, and clothing, free of all expense.

Little Boys, from five to nine years of age, apprenticed for three, five, or seven years by paying a moderate entrance fee to cover the expenses of instrument and books.

Twelve appointments ready for Masters.

For Prospectuses, apply direct to the Royal College of Music, Bridge-street, Manchester.

Dr. MARK is also open to Engagements with his Little Men.

Dr. MARK begs to invite the Parents and Friends, and all those interested in his Enterprise and in the Education of the Youths of this country to visit his establishment. Visiting hours:—From Nine to Eleven, a.m., and Two and Four, p.m. Saturdays and Sundays excepted.

NEW SONGS BY J. W. DAVISON, "Rough wind that moanest loud," (sung by Mr. Santley at the Monday Popular Concerts); "Swifter far than Summer's flight," (sung by Miss Palmer at the Monday Popular Concerts); "False friend, wilt thou smile or weep," Beatrice's song in the Cenci, (sung by Madame Sainton-Dolby, at the Monday Popular Concerts, St. James's Hall); are published by Cramer, Beale and Co., 201, Regent-street.

The above Songs form Nos. 1, 2, and 3, of Vocal Illustrations of Shelley.

"Mr. Santley was encored in one of the thoroughly picturesque and poetical settings of Shelley, by Mr. J. W Davison, mentioned a week or two since. His song, 'Rough wind that moanest loud,' is a thoroughly good song."—Athenæum.

REVIEWS.

"'The sea hath its pearls,' barcarole"—words by Longfellow, music by F. Scotson Clark (Augener and Co.) Mr. Clark's Muse sails on smoothly and gaily enough with her "barcarole," until the first full close, when the boat in which, with unperturbed composure, she is sitting, strikes against a rock :—

Extricating herself, however, with what grace she may, Mr. Clark's Muse again sails on smoothly and gaily, until the boat gets stuck in a little shallow :—

Nothing disconcerted, she once more shows her seamanship, and smoothly and gaily arrives within sight of shore, until, just as she is on the point of landing, the boat overturns :—

Metaphor apart, but for the violations of good harmony we have just cited, "The sea with its pearls" (although it has nothing whatever in common with the spirit of Longfellow) would be a very pretty song. It is dedicated to Miss Poole.

"'Come back Annie,' ballad"—words by John Oxenford, music by J. L. Hatton (Boosey and Sons). This ballad, with chorus, composed for Mr. J. W. Raynor and the Christy's Minstrels, is certainly one of the most genial aspirations ever contributed to the repertory of those perfectly counterfeited niggers. The words, simple and unpretending though they be, are worth quoting :—

"Come back, Annie, come back, dear—
Nought is chang'd since thou wert here,
Here for thee the chair is set,
Here thy book is open yet;
Yonder too, thy basket stands,
Waiting for thy busy hands,
While thy birds sing merrily,
Hoping to be fed by thee.
Annie dear, Annie dear;
All for thee is waiting here.

Come back, Annie, come back, dear,
Oft I fancy thou art near,
Often smiles a pallid face,
Oft a slender form I trace:
Then the birds no longer sing,
But with fear are flutt'ring,
While the shade resembling thee,
Hope, not terror, wakes in me.
Annie dear, Annie dear,
Living, dead, I'll greet thee here."

"'Fantaisie sur Rigoletto,' de Verdi—Francesco Berger, Op. 25, No. 3 (R. W. Ollivier). This is a hash that sadly stands in need of better sauce—an olla podrida without garlic, a salad without spring onions. M. Berger has made minced-meat of some of Signor Verdi's most genuine melodies, that is all. He has brought nothing of his own, to make up for the torture he is inflicting on the chosen composer of Young Italy. Take, for example, a few bars of the well-known "Donna è mobile :"—

"Giocoso"—says M. Berger! "Giocoso," indeed, for M. Berger, but not for Signor Verdi.

It is as though M. Berger were whipping the tune, for its naughty insinuations against the constancy of the fair sex. A still more graceful melody—"Ah veglia, O donna"—is even more unceremoniously treated :—

"Senza affretare"—says M. Berger! "Senza affretare," forsooth! the sooner it was over, we should say, the better.

It is as though mice were running over the face of the melody while it slumbered in repose. Ought such Vandalism as this to be tolerated?—and, if so, to what end? We await the Visigothic reply.

It is much more agreeable (even for professed critics) to praise than to find fault; and we heartily thank Signor

Alberto Randegger for affording us the opportunity of exercising a privilege but too often denied us. The first of a series of songs from his pen which lie before us is, "She loves me best of all" (Addison, Hollier, and Lucas), "composed for and dedicated to 'his friend,' Montem Smith." Here, although the melody is somewhat common-place, we cannot fail to welcome the uniform correctness of the harmony, or to dwell with pleasure on such neat points of musicianship as the following :—

A composer need not always be inspired, but should always manifest a knowledge of his art. From "The Goldbeater" (Boosey and Sons)—"words by Arthur Matthison, composed for and dedicated to Mr. W. H. Weiss"—we cannot single out a point to cite, and for the simple reason that the song is good enough to be cited in extenso. Bold, full of character, and vocally effective, it is also faultlessly written from end to end. As a question of notation, we should like to ask theorists, who busy themselves in the system of harmonics, whether the E flat, in the subjoined quotation, should really be E flat or D sharp :—

Against "Round the Corner" (Metzler and Co.)—words by Mr. Charles Swain (the old Swain?—the veteran?)—a sparkling, pretty, and thoroughly "genial" (a word, the employment of which at "Our Club" is punished by a fine of sixpence)—thoroughly genial composition, we must take, nevertheless, an exception or two. For instance, will Signor Randegger inform us in what key is the following :—

We are aware that in the next bar comes a "C sharp," which, with the authority of Michael Costa, establishes the tone of D minor ; but Quid tum postea ? Peraunter, Sig. Randegger will explain. On the other hand, we have not a word but praise for this charming bagatelle ("composed for and dedicated"—we should have said—"to Mad. Rudersdorff"), which might have been signed "Auber," and have done no discredit to a name representing in music what the term "esprit" (one of Auber's prenames, by the way*) represents in French. I Quattro Fiori—sternelli Toscani, di Teobaldo Cicconi, posti in musica" (Addison, Hollier and Lucas)—"all' amico Francesco Berger"—represent Sig. Randegger in a more ambitious, if not a more attractive light. No. 1, "La Rosa," is coquettishly treated—now 6-8, now 2-4, now 8-8, now 3-8 measure, being alternately employed with an effect scarcely proportioned to the means of expression resorted to. Nevertheless, "La Rosa" has some good points. The words "Una languida rosa di giardini" (Page 2, in 2-4 measure) are charmingly rendered, and the succeeding bars present a sequence of harmony which only a practised musician could have written. No. 2, "Il Giglio," while less affected (Sig. Randegger must excuse the word), is, we think, more beautiful than its predecessor. Here we have genuine expression attained by the most legitimate means—in short, a beautiful song, without reservation or qualification. No. 3, "La Gaggia," and No. 4, "La Vainiglia," have both much to recommend them. The sparkling gaiety of the first is likely to win many light-hearted admirers, while the more recherché character of the last will enlist partisans of a graver turn of mind. The "Rose" and the "Lily," however, decidedly bear away the palm—which it is proper they should do, seeing that they are so much more beautiful, as "fiori," than their companions. "Sleep, dearest Lady" (Addison, Hollier, & Co)—"composed for and dedicated to Miss Dolby"—has been, if we are not mistaken, already noticed in these columns. It is a pretty quiet cradle-song, and we strongly recommend Signor Randegger to restore the original words, printed in italics, and beginning :—

"Sleep, baby, sleep,
Thy father tends the sheep,
Thy mother shakes the little tree,
Down falls a pretty dream for thee.

Sleep, baby, sleep,
The skies are full of sheep ;
Each star is but a little lamb,
The moon it is the lambkin's dam.

Sleep, baby, sleep,
And thou shalt have a sheep,
A sheep with golden bells so fine,
A playmate he shall be of thine.

Sleep, baby, sleep,
And cry not like a sheep,
Or else the shepherd's dog so wild
Will come and bite my naughty child.
Sleep, baby, sleep."

—"beginning," we said ; well, beginning and ending as above. We recommend their restoration, because they are infinitely more "genial" (saving the presence of "Our Club") than the elegant common-places, which are printed in "Romans" over their heads. Moreover, the music well expresses the pretty loveable "babble" of Mama. "To thee, my Love, to Thee" (Chappell and Co.)—words by W. Allingham, Esq., "composed for and dedicated to Miss Palmer"—is a very spirited song in A minor, the most attractive part of which, however, is the episode in the tonic major (page 2-3) with which each verse concludes, and which is in every sense charming. We have further to notice "'Un so spiro d'Amore,' romanzetta," and "'L'Invito,' notturnino" (J. J. Ewer and Co.), the former a very elegant, the latter a quaint and attractive little song ; "Yesterday and To-morrow" (same publishers)—"words by Charles Swain"—which, though not at all in the "ad captandum" style, is very superior to the ordinary run of ballads, and (page 2, line 2) contains one of Sig. Randegger's favourite (and well-written) sequences ; "Georgiana, impromptu Polka, and "Mazurka" (same publishers)—both for pianoforte alone, the last of which is extremely graceful and by many degrees the best, the first (except the trio in E—page 5) being anything rather than original.

* Daniel François Esprit Auber, born at Caen, January 29, 1784.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

MR. RANSFORD'S CONCERT.

Sir,—In your last week's impression I find you have a correspondent (H. T. A.) who states that "Miss Ransford did not (as stated), sing an Italian aria." I should much like to know what he calls "Fatal Goffredo," from Torquato Tasso, by Donizetti. I am aware that many notices are written even before the actual thing takes place, for publication, but any one attempting to contradict, correct, or revise a notice, ought himself first to be perfectly acquainted with what actually did take place. I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

William E. Ransford.

THE LATE FREDERICK WILLIAM COLLARD.

Sir,—A biographical sketch of the late Mr. Collard having appeared in several journals, with many inaccuracies, I beg to forward a correct statement of facts relative to that gentleman, whose demise has been a source of regret to his numerous friends.

He was born in June, 1772, at Wiveliscombe, Somersetshire, and came to London in Nov., 1791, entered into an engagement as an assistant with Messrs. Longman and Broderip, music-publishers and musical-instrument makers, and remained with them until that firm became insolvent.

Mr. Collard married Miss Lukey, daughter of Mr. Lukey (formerly partner with Mr. Longman), and in the year 1799 entered into partnership with Muzio Clementi, the celebrated composer and distinguished pianist, under the firm of Clementi, Banger, Hyde, Collard, and Davies. His brother, Mr. William Frederick Collard, subsequently joined the firm, and retired in 1842, with an ample fortune. Mr. F. W. Collard survived his early partners, with the exception of his brother, and upon the latter relinquishing business, Mr. Collard's two nephews, Messrs. Frederick William and Charles Collard, became his partners.

Mr. Collard, from his active and energetic business habits, realised a large fortune, the bulk of which he bequeathed to the two nephews above mentioned. He was a kind and hospitable man, and entertained liberally those who had the privilege of his acquaintance. His will was proved at Doctors'-commons by his executors, Mr. J. P. Theobald, solicitor, Furnival's-inn, Mr. R. Addison, music-publisher, Regent-street, and Mr. H. G. Bohn, publisher, York-street, Covent-garden, at upwards of £130,000. The elder nephew, Mr. Frederick Collard, has now retired from business, and his brother Charles is the sole representative of the late firms.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

(Communicated.)

The programme for the new season has just been issued by the directors. A list of special entertainments already decided upon, including six Opera Concerts, the grand Flower Show, the International Musical Festival of the Orphéonists of France in June, and the Great Opening Mendelssohn Festival on the 4th of May, has been prepared, and on each of these special occasions the ordinary price of admission will be 5*s.* or upwards.

The Mendelssohn Festival has attracted great interest. To suit the general convenience, it has been arranged that the performance of Elijah shall commence at three o'clock. This, it is expected, will fill up the time until nearly six; and as soon after that hour as may be convenient, the Statue (which will be placed at the head of the stairs in the centre of the terrace) will be unveiled with appropriate ceremony, many of the members of the principal German Gesangvereine of London assisting.

At dusk a great torchlight procession, similar in character to that which afforded so much surprise and gratification on the occasion of the Schiller Centenary, in November last, will take place around the fountains, and through the winding paths of the terraces and grounds.

It is intended that there shall be four great divisions of torch-bearers, arranged under the command of leaders, wearing sashes and bearing lights—coloured red, blue, green, and white. To carry out the true Germanic feeling, the torches have been specially obtained from Hanover.

Upon the signal being displayed from the Queen's balcony, the torch-bearers, who will have previously assembled at the various points indicated in the plans issued to their leaders, will light their torches, and proceed in single file through the central paths and walks, and will pass round the series of fountains, and in four lines around the walks on the terrace, thus enabling the visitors in the open corridors and within the building on the garden side, to obtain, under shelter, a full view of this interesting celebration. Upon arriving at the centre of the terrace nearest to the palace, they will advance in four lines to the foot of the statue of Mendelssohn, when, as was the case at the Schiller Festival, the torches will be cast into one general bonfire. At the same moment the fountains will play, and coloured lights will be displayed along the line of the terrace.

MADAME CLARA NOVELLO.

Among the lady vocalists whose talent has given lustre to their art, compelled the world to forget the fact of their English origin, and drawn forth the acknowledgment, not only of Continental Europe but even of their native country, no one has reached a higher pinnacle of fame, and no one has more richly merited her elevation, than Madame Clara Novello. Memories that are still green, are stored with impressions of Paton; the generation is not extinct which treasures the recollection of Stephens and Maria Tree; we have men among us who remember with rapture the singing of Salmon and Dickons; and the career of the transcendant Billington was not beyond the experience of many who live to speak of her unparalleled excellence. The warmest enthusiast, however, for any or for all of these remarkable singers, has found it impossible not to admire, not to own, the rare powers of the lady who at this moment ranks in the highest class of European singers, and who is, in a few months, to be lost to us for ever. It is not so generally known as it will be universally regretted, that Madame Novello has determined to take a formal and final farewell of the public in November next; but it will readily be believed—such is this lady's known integrity—that, having so determined, she will abide by the resolution, and not (as has before now been the case with songstresses whose professional position should have held them above the capability of trifling with the world's esteem) make this occasion the first of a series of leave-takings. It will not be until the end of the London season that she can arrive in England; she will then sing, possibly for the Sacred Harmonic Society, perhaps at the Crystal Palace, certainly at the two provincial festivals, and in farewell concerts at the chief towns throughout the kingdom, and lastly, at one or two performances in the metropolis.

The very frequent fact of the value of a treasure being inestimated until after the treasure be lost, occurs not in the instance of Madame Novello; her importance to the station she holds, without a rival, is felt; and the unlikelihood is equally recognised of her having a successor who can satisfactorily replace her. Great as are the requisites for a dramatic singer, the excitement of the scene in which she appears, and the effect of the accessories by which she is surrounded, tend materially to draw forth her best qualities, and, at the same time, to influence her audience. It is a higher grade of artistry, that can enable a singer in an oratorio to control the sympathy of her hearers; since the sentiment she embodies is, for the most part, if more exalted, less generally congenial, and she has not the advantage of action to assist her to enforce its expression. Her greater difficulty than that of a theatrical prima donna, indeed, is twofold: first, in conceiving the deeper purpose of the work she has to perform; secondly, in impressing a less ready audience with her conception. Whatever have been Mad. Novello's continental successes on the stage, it is in the more arduous duties of a singer of sacred music that she is best known in England, and it is in this capacity that her retirement will leave a blank which at present appears irreparable. Her grand style, her clear enunciation, and, above all, her exquisite voice, which is wonderful for its magnificent power as it is admirable for its delicious quality: these are the characteristics which every one recognises in the lady of whom we speak; these are what endear her to the lovers of the highest class of vocal music, and these are what render her aid indispensable to our greatest performances. Who that has heard, in the execution of "God save the Queen," at the Crystal Palace, her beautiful, bright, clear, ringing notes, pealing above the massive sound produced by the thousands of choristers and instrumentalists, distinctly audible at the remote extremes of that colossal building—who that has heard, can recal the remembrance without as much amazement as pleasure? Who that has heard, in the Hymn of Praise of Mendelssohn, her unparalleled delivery of the phrase, "The night is departing, departing," can ever believe that such perfect loveliness of sound, so beautiful in itself, and so true to the marvellous idea of the composer, can ever be realised by a successor? These are, perhaps, the two most remarkable instances of the display of Madame Novello's unique excellence; but no one who reads our remarks will be unable to swell the list by many examples he must have witnessed, which surpassing everything else he has experienced, are yet surpassed by these two. It is as natural as it is common, to feel a strong interest in the personal career of an artist who has professionally pleased us; to gratify such a desire among the countless admirers of Mad. Novello, to trace the course by which she has attained her pre-eminence, we have been at some pains to collect the particulars of the chief points of her history, which we believe we could not more opportunely than now set before our readers.

Of the three first essentials to a biography—the birth, parentage, and education of the heroine—one, in the case of the heroine, is always a point of delicacy; for who is the heroine, is she old or young, that will be unscrupulous as to the discussion of the date, at least, if not of the locality of her birth. Madame Novello is, however, quite old enough to have earned the admiration, nay, the affection (if the same term of fondness may express the love of the intelligence that we employ to signify the love of the heart) of millions; while she is far too young to leave us without the conviction that she is in the full possession of her powers, that she is at the very apex of her career, and that we ought to have had yet many years' enjoyment of her rare talent. Well, then, though she be a lady, she will have no just grounds of quarrel with us for revealing a fact, which, after all, is no secret, and in which, therefore, we can claim no copyright—the fact, namely, of the precise time and place of her birth.

Clara Novello first saw the light—to use a figure of speech which is scarcely compatible with that optical delusion, whereof she must have proved the fallacy during her sojourn in the brightly sunny south—in Oxford-street, London; she saw, on that occasion, at least as much of the light as ever can penetrate our misty atmosphere, for the event occured when the air is at its clearest, and the sun is at its brightest, a fortnight before midsummer, in the year 1818, upon the beaming 10th of June. Thus it will be seen, firstly, that she is a genuine Englishwoman; and that this much musically maligned land of fogs and consequent rheums, catarrh, and influenzas, has yet to boast, in her organ, of its power of producing voices of equal beauty to those raised and nurtured in the Land of Song. It will be seen, secondly, that she will leave forty-two years behind her, when she quits this busy scene of ever-renewed excitement for the private seclusion of her own homestead, having still a natural prospect of a very long term for the enjoyment of that repose to which she retires by choice, not by compulsion, to give her family the benefit of her maturity; not because those faculties are exhausted with which she has so long delighted us, that we long to be longer delighted. Daughter of June, perennial flower of forty-two summers, we ask your pardon for this disclosure of your birth, and shall proceed next week to the consideration of your parentage.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—Israel in Egypt was performed last night, for the first time this season, the principal vocalists being Miss Parepa, Miss Fanny Rowland, Madame Sainton-Dolby, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Santley, and Signor Belletti.

CONCERTS.

MR. SIMS REEVES'S BENEFIT CONCERT.—Perhaps no singer that ever lived has done more to vindicate the claims of his art than Mr. Sims Reeves; and certain it is that no singer, native or foreign, ever was a more general and deserved a favourite. Not alone is the connoisseur delighted—Mr. Reeves ranking first among the virtuosi—but the public at large,—the great shilling-paying masses, whom poor Jullien first taught to know and appreciate good music,—flock in crowds, whenever and wherever the name of Sims Reeves is announced, and by the warmth and heartiness of their applause, testify to the hold that he has upon their sympathies. Other artists may have their special merits, some excelling in sacred, some in secular, some in dramatic music, but of Mr. Reeves it may be said with truth, that in every branch of singing he is pre-eminent. In the majestic strains of Handel, the solemn recitative, the pathetic air, the vigorous declamation, he stands unapproached; while there are many airs that he has made, as it were, his own. Who, for instance, can sing, "Call forth thy powers," "Sound an alarm," "The enemy said," "Then shall the righteous," "Comfort ye my people," "Total eclipse," like Mr. Reeves? Not to multiply instances (as we might ad libitum), it is sufficient to say that, as an oratorio singer, Mr. Reeves is unequalled. Nor is it alone in sacred music that his great talents are conspicuous. His dramatic performances are no less admirable—the dashing brigand in Fra Diavolo, the ill-fated Edgardo in Lucia, the love-lorn Elvino in La Sonnambula, Florentin in Fidelio, Manrico in Trovatore (wide as the poles asunder)—all differing so largely in style, and all alike excellent in conception and execution—stamp Mr. Reeves as immeasurably the first of our English operatic artists. In the concert-room, again, he is at home with all the composers—Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn, alike finding an interpreter worthy of their best inspirations; and no tenor, in our recollection, has ever done such ample justice to their compositions. It is no wonder, then, that the announcement of Mr. Sims Reeves's benefit at St. James's Hall, on Monday evening, should have attracted the largest audience that has yet been seen in that building. Had the room been double the size, it would scarcely have sufficed to accommodate the numbers who sought admission, undeterred by the wretched weather, and anxious only to be present at one of the best of the many good selections with which the Monday Popular Concerts have familiarised the public. As it was, many were the disappointed applicants turned reluctantly away from the doors. Mr. Reeves chose four pieces for the display of his genius, each a perfect gem in its way, although different in style. In the touching recitative, "Deeper and deeper still," from Jephtha, and the lovely air which follows, "Waft her angels through the skies," our eminent tenor showed himself a perfect master of the highest style of vocal music. Beethoven's "Adelaide" has lately been frefrequently sung by Mr. Reeves, but never more exquisitely than on this occasion, the pianoforte accompaniment being played by Miss Arabella Goddard with that delicacy and refinement of which she is unrivalled. A perfect furor of applause followed, and Mr. Reeves had twice to return and bow his acknowledgments, wisely resisting an encore. The air from Don Giovanni, "Dalla sua pace," afforded Mr. Reeves an opportunity of exhibiting his appreciation of Mozart; and as a further proof of his versatility, so much humour was infused into the elegant little air of "Beethoven, "The stolen kiss," that an irresistible demand for its repetition ensued. It is a very long time since Mrs. Reeves has been heard in a London concert-room, and the public, not forgetful of an old favourite, accorded her a hearty welcome. Mendelssohn's "Frühlingslied," and Spohr's duet from Jessonda, evinced those musician-like qualities which have always characterised Mrs. Reeves's singing. Madame Sainton-Dolby also selected a song of Mehdelssohn, "Night," and was warmly applauded for her highly effective and most expressive rendering of Mr. J. W. Davison's setting of Shelley's words, "False friend, wilt thou smile or weep" (Cenci).

The instrumental selection constituted a worthy companion to the vocal; Beethoven's so called "Posthumous Quartet," in F major, Op. 133, was heard for the third time at these concerts, and with increased interest, and Rossini's Quartet, in G major, No. 1, although but a bagatelle in comparison with that of the giant tone-poet, was nevertheless sufficiently interesting to warrant its introduction. The executants in each instance were Messrs. Sainton, Goffrie, Doyle and Piatti, and both quartets were played to admiration.

One of Mozart's Sonatas in F major, for pianoforte alone, was given for the first time and when we say that this beautiful composition was performed by Miss Arabella Goddard with all her admirable taste, faultless mechanism, and incomparable expression, our readers have a guarantee that no word other than "perfect" can apply to it In Dussek's very popular Sonata in B flat (Op. 69)—No. 1 of the Monday Popular Concert Library—Miss Goddard enjoyed the co-operation of M. Sainton, whose purity of tone and thorough mastery of his instrument, divided the plaudits with the fair pianist, and both artists were honoured by a recall. A more splendid performance could not have been desired.

Next Monday the selection will be again from various masters—Mr. Charles Hallé, Madame Sainton-Dolby, Herr Becker, and Mr. Sims Reeves, being the principal performers.

Crystal Palace.—The concert on Saturday, one of unusual interest, was a "Shaksperian Selection;" whygiven on this occasion we have not been informed. The notion and poetry of every piece, however, was referable to the works of the great poet. The performance commenced with Mendelssohn's music to A Midsummer Night's Dream, the principal singers being Miss S. Wells, Miss Eyles, Mr. William Cummings, Mr. Baxter, Mr. Land, Mr. Lawler—all members of the London Glee and Madrigal Union—and a chorus under the direction of Mr. Smythson. Mendelssohn's music was followed by a miscellaneous selection, including two overtures—The Merry Wives of Windsor, by O. Nicolai, and The Two Gentlemen of Verona, by J. Street—and comprising compositions by Sir Henry Bishop, Sir John Stevenson, Dr. Callcott, Dr. Wilson, and Stevens. The single encore of the concert was awarded to Stevens' glee, "Blow thou wintry wind," sung by Miss Wells, Miss Eyles, Mr. W. Cummings. and Mr. Lawler. The concert-room was crowded, and nearly four thousand persons were assembled in the building.

Brixton.—Mrs. F. Lucas gave a concert last week in the New Music Hall, when Madame Sainton-Dolby, Mrs. Winn, Mr. Montem Smith, and Mr. Winn, as vocalists, and Miss Cazaly, Mr. O'Leary (pianofortes), and Mr. G. Horton (oboe), as instrumentalists, lent their assistance to the concert-giver, who was in excellent voice, and gave the grand scena from Der Freischütz with feeling and expression, also a duet with Madame Sainton, besides singing in several concerted pieces. Madame Sainton was encored in Balfe's "Green trees whispered low and mild," and in "Janet's Choice" (Claribel). Mrs. Winn was similarly complimented in a ballad, and the other vocal pieces went off with spirit. The instrumental music consisted of pianoforte fantasies of Thalberg and Liszt, extremely well played by Mr. O'Leary and Miss Cazaly, and a solo on the oboe, on subjects from Pia di Tolomei, skilfully executed by Mr. Horton. Mr. O'Leary was accompanyist at the pianoforte. The audience were evidently pleased with the entertainment Mrs. Lucas had provided for their gratification.

MUSIC AND THEATRES IN PARIS.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

Thursday, April 12.

The members of parliament and other energetic English, who, eager to enjoy their short holiday, rushed over here to spend the last days of Lent and this Easter week—anticipating, no doubt, all the delights of spring-time, the "gioventir dell'anno," must have been rather disappointed. Some fine days we certainly have had, but on Tuesday cold, with a slight fall of snow, began again. However, if the daytime has been unpropitious, evening has brought the never-failing resource of the theatre, and many a hearty laugh, or, if the piece be touching, a tear in some pretty blue English eye, has borne testimony to the charm of that first-rate kind of acting that is so remarkable here.

However, talking of theatres, I will give you a rapid sketch of what has been going on at the Operas. Pierre de Medicis brings excellent receipts to the Grand-Opéra: that is, I suppose, the criterion of the success of a piece. Prince Poniatowski gave the banquet the Saturday before Passion Week to the "administration" and all the principal singers and dancers of the Opéra, and a gracious remuneration to the choristers; so you can imagine that with them the opera is popular also. Monsieur A. Royer goes on actively, however, with his design of bringing out the Sémiramis of Rossini, which Méry has just finished translating into French. Putting aside the great musical outline of the composer, which, of course, will be preserved, it is in many ways thrown almost into a new form—a general re-arrangement of the text and recitatives having been found necessary for the French stage. The decorations will be gorgeous. There is some talk of Merly taking the part of Assur. On Thursday, Friday, and Saturday of Passion Week all the imperial theatres were closed: the Italian Opera was the one exception, but it was to give the Stabat Mater of Rossini that the doors were opened. The Emperor and Empress had the same artists to perform it also in the chapel of the Tuilleries. Mesdames Alboni, Penco, Battu, and MM. Tamberlik, Badiali, Morini, and Manfredi, sang this grand work. The parts that gave the most pleasure were the quartetto, "Quando corpus morietus," sung by Alboni, Mad. Penco, Tamberlik, and Badiali, and "Fac ut portem Christi," sung by Alboni. At the Opéra-Comique, the Roman d'Elvire is again being played, as Madlle. Monrose is better. Galathée is given on alternate nights. I told you last week of the probability of M. Carvalho giving up the management of the Théâtre-Lyrique. Since I wrote, all arrangements have been concluded, and M. Rétz has assumed the reins of government, while M. Carvalho has gone to London with his wife. The Théâtre-Lyrique thus loses its greatest ornament in losing Mad. Carvalho. But for the lady, in a lucrative point of view, it is decidedly an advantage for her, as they say M. Carvalho lost during his management, notwithstanding the brilliant way in which it was carried on. And, certainly, to lose was but a sorry recompense for so much trouble, whereas, as it is, he may look forward to a brilliant and successful career for his wife.

Last week—to speak now of the drama—the Gymnase gave a new work from the pen of M. Dumanoir, assisted by M. Keranion. It is a comedy in four acts, entitled Jeanne qui rit et Jeanne qui pleure, and bears somewhat in its plot a resemblance to La joie fait peur of Mad. de Girardin. But the plan of the work, and style in which it is treated, save it from being a reproach that it is so. Whenever M. Dumanoir writes a piece the public can go in all security and retain their places, certain that it will be more or less brilliant, well written, and worth listening to. The tale runs thus:—Madame Jeanne Rey has lost her husband in the war in Kabylia. The gallant Colonel Rey, surrounded by Arabs, fell at the head of his regiment. Madame Rey had not gone with him to Africa, but remained behind in a little town in Brittany, to take care of her mother-in-law (who is infirm and blind), and her husband's young sister Laurence. A year-and-a-half have hardly passed since this misfortune, when Mad. Rey and Laurence leave off their mournful dress, and appear brilliantly attired at a ball given by the sous-préfet. The poor young husband, to all appearance, has been soon forgotten, and charming and graceful as is the young widow, she is, it would seem, worldly and frivolous at heart. Her conduct is the talk of the little provincial town, and the name given her is Jeanne qui rit. But the other Jeanne who is she? She is a Mad. Jeanne Vanneau, a model widow. No one, however, knew her husband. He was captain of a vessel that was wrecked, and his widow has retired to this little town. Never would she be seen at a ball at the sous-préfet's, she would not wear those pretty lilac colours invented for transitory sorrows. Nothing is too black or mournful (it is true, she is fair, and fair people are longer in being consoled, so the French say, than dark, as black is so becoming to them). She is, in fact, Jeanne qui pleure. Meanwhile, M. Maurice Bouel, the surgeon of the regiment, and the inseparable friend of Colonel Rey, arrives from Africa. Ere his death, the Colonel had sent some last words to his family by him. But being struck down himself a few minutes afterwards he was taken prisoner. He had just recovered his liberty and returned to France to fulfil his sad mission. On arriving in the little town the first news he hears is the heartless conduct of Madame Rey. Maurice, who loves Laurence sincerely, and who had come back to marry her, is shocked by hearing she has been her sister-in-law's companion in these gaieties, and meeting Mad. Vanneau, who had been a first-love long ago, recalls his promises, tells him she is free, and whose conduct offers such a contrast to the others. She again induces her to ask him to marry her. But he must call on the family of the Colonel, and there his indignation soon changes to admiration, as he discovers the secret of the false gaiety. It is the day the letters ought to arrive from Africa: the poor old blind mother asks if the accustomed letter from her son, which had never yet missed, has arrived. Yes, the letter has come: they read it to her; the Colonel is well. Maurice guesses everything, but at an imploring sign from the two women, remains silent. To preserve yet a few happy hours to the poor blind mother, the wife and sister devour their tears in secret. It is because she likes to hear her son's wife is admired Jeanne has appeared at the ball. And no one has discovered the secret of this pious disguise, except an old notary, M. Bidault. Maurice leaves them more in love with Laurence than ever, but bound in honour to another woman. In the third act the interest increases, for the hypocritical character of Mad. Vanneau developes itself; her anxiety to hasten her marriage, her rage when it must be deferred, certain papers being necessary, and her consternation when a letter is put into the notary's hand and he tells her it is from her husband, who is still among the living. Maurice, delivered from his engagement, goes joyously to try and make his peace with Laurence. She at first refuses to accept him, but relents, and when told a husband has come to life a wild hope crosses her mind that it is her brother. A letter is put into her hand; this time it is a genuine one, and from her brother, who is alive. He was only wounded and is saved, in another instant he will be home. She reads in an ecstasy of joy the letter to the old mother. Jeanne enters while it is being read, recognises the writing of her husband, by an immense effort controls her emotion, and seizing the letter she falls on her knees and reads it; at the same instant Colonel Rey is heard coming up stairs. The artifice of the poor old notary who had first heard of the Colonel's being alive, and making it a trap by pretending to Madame Vanneau that it was her husband, thus thoroughly unmasking her character, freeing Maurice, making him and Laurence happy, and working up the curiosity of the spectators, is most cleverly done, and the last scene is most dramatically and touchingly acted. Mad. Rose-Cheri performed the part of Mad. Rey; M. Desrieux that of Maurice. Bouel-Geoffrey was remarkable in the character of Bidault the notary, and the rest of the characters were well filled.

A paper here says that the direction of the Grand-Opéra is to pass into the hands of the municipality of Paris, and that this change would hasten the construction of a new opera-house. Other papers say there is a talk of the town of Paris paying the expenses of the building, and giving it up in compensation for the pretty park of Monceau. The last number of the Revue Municipale says that "M. Bellu, to whom Paris owes the building of several theatres, has been charged, under the direction of M. Davionid, architect, with the reconstruction of the Théâtre-Imperial (the old cirque), and of that of the Théâtre-Lyrique. The agreement has been signed by M. Bellu and the Prefect of the Seine, and authorised by the highest authority. M. Bellu has engaged, for the sum of 4,300,000 francs, to finish the two theatres in the space of eighteen months from the day on which the ground on which they are to be built is given up for that purpose by the town. It is not only the exterior, but in a state perfectly fit to enter in that they are to be given up by that time."

Among the aristocratic dilettanti there is a talk of getting up a series of concerts, with a programme of the highest order. MM. de Morny, Troplong, Baroche, &c., with Prince Poniatowski as their president, are a few of the names talked of already.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—This Evening (Saturday April 28), second time, the new opera, by Signor Campana, entitled ALMINA. Biondello, Signor Giuglini; and Almina, Madlle. Piccolomini (her last appearance but one previous to her final retirement from the stage). Concluding with the new Ballet Divertissement, in which Madlle. Pocchini, Madlle. Morlacchi, and M. Durand, will appear. In consequence of the extraordinary enthusiasm created by Madame Borghi-Mamo and Signor Mongini, in Rossini's opera of Otello, and in accordance with a generally expressed desire that the same should be repeated, the management have the honour of announcing to the nobility, gentry, and subscribers, that on Tuesday next, May 1, will be performed (second time) Otello. Desdemona, Madame Borghi-Mamo (her sixth appearance in this country); Elmire, Signor Vialetti; Iago, Signor Everardi; and Otello, Signor Mongini (his second appearance in that character in England).

Conductor—M. BENEDICT.

It is respectfully intimated that in order to secure places, early application should be made at the box-office of the theatre, which is open daily, from 10 till 5, under the direction of Mr. Nugent.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.—First appearance of Signor Ronconi. On Tuesday next, May 1, will be performed (for the first time these two years), Auber's Opera

FRA DIAVOLO.

Zerlina, Madame Miolan-Carvalho (her first appearance in that character); Lady Allcash, Madlle. Corbari (her first appearance in that character); Il Marcheso, Signor Gardoni; Lorenzo, Signor Neri Baraldi; Matteo, Signor Polonini; Beppo, Signor Tagliafico; Giacomo, M. Zelger; and Lord Allcash, Signor Ronconi (his first appearance this season).

Conductor—Mr. COSTA.

La Saltarella in the third act, will be danced by Madlle. Ema and M. Desplaces.

Subscription Night next Thursday.

First appearance of Signor Grasiani.

Thursday next, May 3, will be given as a Subscription Night, in lieu of Saturday, August 18, on which occasion (for tht first time this season) Verndi's Opera will be performed with the following powerful cast:—Leonora, Madame Grisi (being the third of the twelve representations to which her engagement is limited); Azucena, Mdlle. Csillag (her first appearance in that character); Ines, Madame Tagliafico; Il Conte di Luna, Signor Grasiani (his first appearance this season); Fernando, Signor Tagliafico; Ruiz, Signor Lucchesi; Un Zingaro, Signor Rossi; and Manrico, Signor Mario (his third appearance this season).

Doors open at Eight o'clock, the Opera commences at half-past. Pit tickets, 7s.; amphitheatre stalls, 7s. and 5s.; amphtheatre, 2s. 6d.

JULLIEN FUND.

THE illness of M. Jullien having, with fatal rapidity, terminated in death, it has been resolved that the donations to the JULLIEN FUND shall be applied in the manner which would have been most in consonance with the wishes of the deceased, had it been permitted him to express them, viz., to the relief of his widow and family, who, by his loss, are left totally unprovided for.

Committee for the distribution of the Jullien Fund.

Mr. John Mitchell; Mr. W. R. Sams; Mr. Thomas Chappell; Mr. W. Duncan Davison; Mr. Jules Benedict; Mr. A. Blumenthal.

Honorary Treasurers.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, APRIL 28TH, 1860.

THE new season at Sydenham will be inaugurated on the 4th of May, in the most brilliant manner conceivable. We cannot look for a third Handel Commemoration Festival; but if there is a name closely associated with that of Handel in the minds and hearts of Englishmen, it is the name of Mendelssohn. Next in popularity to The Messiah undoubtedly stands Elijah; and, while spell-bound under the influence of those mighty choruses of the Christian Musical Epic,—delivered by thousands of voices and instruments, assembled (under the guidance of one directing intelligence, and one mechanical guide—the mind and the bâton of Mr. Costa), in the great central transept of the Crystal Palace, on the never-to-be-forgotten 100th anniversary of Handel's death—many were the speculations as to how the choruses of Mendelssohn would sound under similar exciting circumstances. It was the general belief that the choruses in St. Paul would present difficulties not easy to surmount, but the opinions in favour of Elijah were unanimous.

Nevertheless, after frequent and earnest discussions of the subject, not only at the time specified, within the walls of the Crystal Palace, but subsequently in almost every musical circle throughout the country, the idea was almost universally abandoned as untenable. "There will be no possibility"—it was argued—"at least during the life of the present generation, of again bringing together such an army of choristers, however it might be practicable, with Michael Costa's indomitable energy, to enlist another instrumental army as numerous and as formidable as the last." But those who exhibited this want of faith, had reckoned without their host—in other words, without their Robert K. Bowley—for, in the organisation of such gigantic undertakings, Mr. Bowley is notoriously a "host" in himself. He, no doubt, had reflected on the matter deeply, and as the first step to once more making the "giant-chorus" a palpable fact, was resolved that the flower and strength of this phalanx should not be dispersed at all. He had at his command a convenient locality, known under the familiar name of "Exeter Hall," where some two thousand could occasionally be accommodated in anticipation of future events. Here Mr. Bowley persuaded them not only to meet at intervals, but what was more important, to meet for practice. Since the Handel Festival, then, the so-called "Metropolitan Contingent" of the Handel Festival chorus have assembled from time to time, and under the superintendence of their celebrated chief, Mr. Costa, have been resolutely drilled, not only in the music of Handel, but in that of other composers—such, for example, as the old Italian masters, an invaluable school for the attainment of choral excellence. Thus a nucleus has not only been kept together, but vastly improved in efficiency, ready, at a moment's notice, for any great undertaking. Attention of late has been especially accorded to the choruses of Elijah, two or three rehearsals of the whole of which have taken place in Exeter Hall, preliminary to the grand performance of the oratorio at the Crystal Palace, projected some time since, and now publicly advertised for Friday next, the 4th of May. How the idea originated may be best set forth in the language of the prospectus, just issued by the directors of the Crystal Palace:—

"When the news of the sudden and premature decease of Mendelssohn reached England, in November, 1847, the Sacred Harmonic Society were preparing a performance of his oratorio, Elijah, which had been given in its revised form at Exeter Hall, under the composer's direction, in the preceding April. The regret expressed on all sides at the sad intelligence led to a subscription being immediately entered into for the erection of some permanent memorial to the worth and genius of the departed musician. Her Majesty the Queen and H.R.H. the Prince Consort took much interest in the furtherance of this object; while the Philharmonic Society, and other musical institutions, with a large number of professors and amateurs, contributed towards its accomplishment. Some hundreds of pounds were collected; the amount being invested in the Funds, in the names of trustees. The original intention was to place in some public building a bust of the composer. Applications were addressed to the authorities of Westminster Abbey, St. Paul's Cathedral, the British Museum, and other establishments of a public nature. In some cases, however, fees were asked almost exceeding the whole amount of the subscription; in others, the application was refused; and although no opportunity has been lost of endeavouring to carry out the original idea, it has been found impracticable. Upwards of ten years having elapsed since the death of Mendelssohn, and the committee feeling reluctant to remain under the reproach of inaction, it was ultimately determined, notwithstanding the great additional cost, that a bronze statue should be executed, which might be placed in some prominent position in the open air, instead of within the walls of a public building. In accordance with this determination, Mr. Charles Bacon, the sculptor, who had previously prepared a full-length model of the deceased, was entrusted with the task. Mr. Bacon unfortunately laboured under great disadvantages, inasmuch as the utmost diversity exists between the different portraits and busts of the composer. In the execution of the statue, however, he has been favoured with the advice of many of Mendelssohn's most intimate friends in this country; and among others, Mr. Klingemann, Sir G. Smart, Mr. Benedict, Dr. Sterndale Bennett, Mr. Buxton, Mr. Chorley, Mr. J. W. Davison, Mr. Gruneisen, &c. The Misses Alexander, Mrs. Grote, and Madame Lind-Goldschmidt, have also assisted the sculptor with their suggestions. The model completed, the casting was entrusted to Messrs. Robinson and Cottam, of Lower Belgrave-place, by whom, within the last few months, it has been successfully accomplished. The statue is to be removed early next week to the Lower Terrace of the Crystal Palace, preparatory to the Inauguration Fête on Friday, the 4th of May.

"As, with the exception of the statue of Handel by Roubiliac (now in the possession of the Sacred Harmonic Society, originally in Vauxhall Gardens), this work is the only instance of a statue to a musical composer being erected in this country, the present is deemed a fitting occasion for a celebration of the event. In order to carry out as completely as possible the object in view, it has been determined to celebrate the occasion by the grandest performance of the composer's best-known work, the oratorio of Elijah, which has ever taken place. The Sacred Harmonic Society will provide an orchestra of nearly 3,000 performers. In addition to the Handel Festival Choir (which, besides the chorus of the Sacred Harmonic Society, comprises members of the principal choral societies of the metropolis), the leading professional choristers, with deputations from the principal provincial choral societies and cathedral choirs, and various continental bodies, will be present. The band will include the instrumentalists of the Sacred Harmonic Society, with numerous additions from the principal orchestras of the metropolis, the Crystal Palace, &c. The stringed instruments alone will exceed 250 in number. The whole of the arrangements are under the direction of the committee of the Sacred Harmonic Society; and Mr. Costa has undertaken to conduct the performance. Mdlle. Parepa, Madame Sainton-Dolby, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Signor Belletti, with other vocalists, are engaged as principals. The arrangements for the audience will be under the direction of the stewards of the Sacred Harmonic Society, whose exertions contributed so much to the general comfort at the Handel Commemoration of last year."

"Thanks be to God,"—the "Baalite" choruses,—and above all the "Sanctus" ("Holy! Holy"), with three thousand singers and players (the singers of course in proportion), will be something to look forward to—something, indeed, that we may naturally expect to rival, if not surpass, the stupendous displays of 1857 and 1859. If untiring zeal and perseverance in providing for the gratification of the public are entitled to support, surely never was patronage more richly deserved than by the directors of the Crystal Palace and their indefatigable General Manager.

Coming to their usual box in the "Edinburgh Castle," Pantagruel and Epistemon found upon the table a small piece of paper, on which were some verses in the villanous handwriting of Panurge. Nor was the paper itself without pictorial adornment, for the poet had evidently placed on it a glass of stout, which being wet at the bottom, had left behind it a spacious brown ring, whereby much of the poetry was encompassed.

"Chance," said Epistemon, "hath here disported itself"—

"If thou personifiest Chance," observed Pantagruel, "rather say '*her*self,' for I take it the personified Chance correspondeth to the goddess Fortuna—'gratim quæ regit Antium.'"

"Well, then," said Epistemon, pettishly, "Chance hath disported *her*self in a most humorous and fitting manner. Songs of war are sometimes surrounded by a wreath of laurel; on Valentine's Day, sixpence will purchase you an amatory sonnet set in a circle of true lover's knots. Now here thou findest the poetry of Panurge encompassed by beer—the very Hippocrene whence the bard draweth his inspiration. Well might he say with Persius:—

'Nec fonte labra prolui caballino
Nec in bicipiti somniasse Parnasso
Memini'——

No kick of a horse produced this Pierian spring—this Hippocrene hath its beginning in the vat of one of those mighty men who are now so vociferous in the cause of sobriety."

"Read the poetry—read—read!" cried Pantagruel, impatiently. "I do not greatly affect poetry read aloud; but still thy converse is so infernally dull, that I would have thy tongue employed on anything rather than on the utterance of thine own absurd views and sentiments.

Thus encouraged, Epistemon read as follows:—

"THE GARDEN DEITY.

"This cottage on the moor, so modest, with its thatch
Of bulrush and of sedge, right faithfully I watch;
A log of oak am I, hewn by a rustic hand,
But yet I ever spread a blessing o'er the land.
A father and a son, who in this cottage dwell,
Salute me as a god, and venerate me well.
One piously takes care, lest weeds and grasses rude
Upon my sacred ground irrev'rently intrude.
The other brings me gifts of little value—still,
Their worth is great indeed, if measur'd by his will.
In Spring a varied wreath upon my brow is set,
With sprigs of early corn, and many a violet;
Gourds, fragrant apples too, in season they bestow—
Grapes that with deep'ning tint beneath their foliage grow.
Sometimes the wanton kid, sometimes the bearded goat,
Upon my altar bleeds—(but this you'll mention not).
For all these pious gifts some gratitude is due—
So here Priapus stands, a watchman ever true;
These vines and plants, rude boys, he safely guards from you.
A wealthy churl, who ne'er to me will tribute pay,
Is living near—rob him—you can't mistake your way."

"That," said Pantagruel, approvingly, "is the best thing he has done."

"Well," said Epistemon, "measured by that very low standard, it may, perhaps, be allowed to pass. Nor, as he has once, on the precedent of old George Chapman, adopted this meter as an equivalent for the hexameter, can we well object to his extension of the same to the Ithyphallic numbers in which, as thou knowest, the eighteenth carmen of Catullus is written. For your Ithyphallic is such an enervation of the hexameter, that the distinction between them, though palpable to the ancients, is not perceptible to an ear trained to the observance of accent only, and not of quantity. Some, probably, will take pleasure in the distich:—

'The other brings me gifts of little value—still,
Their worth is great indeed, if measured by his will.'

But to me, it is such a violent expansion, and therefore distortion of the original line—

'Alter parva ferens manu semper munera larga,'

That I fancy our vile friend hath rather translated Döring's note on the line, than the line itself, 'Munera parva, quæ quis pio animo offert suo si metiaris modulo, sunt magna et diis gratissima.'"

"The history of the widow's mite told in Pagan fashion," said Pantagruel, with a sigh.

"As for the concluding two lines," continued Epistemon, "I find them most offensive and detestable. The wealthy churl never pays tribute to Priapus, but as 'pays' won't rhyme with 'way,' the poet has recourse to the low, shabby expedient of turning the present into a sort of indefinite future, and sings 'will not pay.' Out upon such bobbling rhymesters, when they lay their profane hands on one of the choicest gems of Roman poetry that was ever bequeathed to the present generation."

"Stop thy miserable abuse of thy betters," exclaimed Panurge, who had slipped in unobserved, and had been sitting in the adjoining box for some five minutes, listening with small pleasure to the comment on his verse, "and hear the news. This paper I hold in my hand is the Entr'Acte for the 14th of April, and it containeth a dialogue wherein great praise is bestowed on our converse—as choice, witty, pleasant, and erudite!"

"Ha!" said Epistemon, "then it must refer to some discourse in which thou tookest no part. But what is the meaning of this? One of the speeches in this dialogue saith that the record of our conversation is in imitation of Rabelais. Who in the name of wonder is Rabelais? I flatter myself that our talk now and then approacheth the fashion of Erasmus, but I never heard of Rabelais."

"Hast thou forgotten him?" said Pantagruel—"a low, dirty, clerical fellow, who a long time ago was always dangling at my heels."

"I think I recollect the varlet," said Panurge, "but I always kept him at a respectful distance, and held with him but small converse. Ha! he was not a wight with whom I would have been seen walking down Little St. Andrew-street!"

"The worst of the knave was," observed Pantagruel, "that he wrote a sort of history of our transactions, in which he made us talk all sorts of filth and obscenity."

"Us!" exclaimed Epistemon; "us, who are negotiating with the Tract Society for the sale of our dialogues, as likely to purify the moral atmosphere of this sinful metropolis!"

"Therefore observe the kindness of the Entr'Acte," interposed Panurge. "Though it wrongly ascribeth our talk to the influence of that base ribald, yet it lovingly saith that the pure ore and not the dross is imitated."

"Humph!" growled Epistemon, "then why doth it contain Latin that no one can read? Look here: 'Qui se ipse laudat, itoo derisiorem invenerit?' What the devil doth that mean?"

"Hadst thou been as deeply versed in the sentences of Publius Syrus as beseemeth thy years," said Panurge, "thou wouldst know that the passage thou hast quoted is a misprint for—

'Qui se ipsum laudat, cito derisorem invenit.'"

"Five words wrong out of seven is a heavy proportion," murmured Epistemon.

"I know the saw right well," exclaimed Pantagruel, cheerfully. "Joseph Scaliger hath Hellenised it thus:—

'Αινῶν ἑαυτὸν τάχα γελαστὴν περιέτυχε.'"

"It strikes me," remarked Epistemon, after a pause, during which he had carefully read the dialogue in the Entr'acte, "that thy pretended friend is only laughing at us, for he putteth all the commendation of our wit in the mouth of an individual, whom he afterwards representeth to be the author of our dialogues."

"And why, thou disagreeable curmudgeon," shouted Panurge, "why the devil should he not laugh?—

——'Ridentim dicere verum
Quid vetat.'"

"Is nobody to laugh but ourselves, thou cantankerous jobbernol? For my part, I am convinced that the Entr'Acte of the 14th meant kindly by us. He doth not sneer, as thou didst thyself, at my 'Propertius,' and he saith we do not want to satisfy the general reader, which I take as a high compliment, for I am like that exquisite mime, Arbuscula—

——'Satis est equitem mihi plaudere, ut audax, Contemptis aliis, exploso Arbuscula dixit.'"

At this juncture, a marvellously ill-favoured countenance popped up from an adjoining box, and said, in a coarse, ginny sort of voice—

"I think you may render that:—

'I'm not one of them tragic sticks,
As seeks the cry of 'Brayvo Hicks.'"

"Reserve thine elucidations till such times as they are required," said Pantagruel, with all the mild dignity of his race, and without even turning round to look at the intruder, who was immediately behind him.

"On microscopic observation," said Epistemon, looking long and earnestly at the intruder, through a glass of hot gin-and-water, "On microscopic observation, I should pronounce thee to be an unfortunate schoolmaster, decomposed by bad beer and frequent passages through the Insolvent Court, into thy constituent atoms, and then, by some mysterious process, recomposed into a sort of shabby 'fast man.'"

Hereupon the intruder began to weep and wail, in maudlin style, declaring that no one loved him, and that he wished he had never been born,—in which latter sentiment, Pantagruel, Panurge and Epistemon, being all agreed, for the first time in their lives, most heartily concurred. Then he became frantically joyous, and sang out:—

"Thus became Tom Tosspot rich,
Thus went through the tailor's stitch;
Thus did Bacchus conquer Indy,
Thus philosophy, Melindy."

Then he discoursed gravely, and said, "Qui feut premier, soif ou beuverye? Soif; car qui eust beu sans soif durant le temps d'innocence? Beuverye, car 'privatio praesupponit habitum.' Je suis clerc—'Facundi calices quem non fecere disertum.'"

Then he got back to his maudlin strain, and whimpered forth, while all stared at him with infinite disgust, "Nobody loves me; nobody drinks with me; nobody eats with me. I'll dine with the Saracen's Head."

"At the Saracen's Head," suggested Epistemon.

"You're another! Who's your hatter? Does your mother know you're out?" retorted the intruder, using phrases not only in themselves unseemly, but rendered still more repulsive by the absence of all logical connection. "I mean what I say—I will dine with the Saracen's Head; for I will order me a dish of boiled tripe, and the sign of the Saracen's Head shall be taken off the hinges, and placed on the table. Thus shall I dine with the Saracen's Head—as the lady dines with her mother, in that scintillating little piece called A Christmas Dinner. Then I will get drunk, very drunk, to a degree that even the great Robson shall not be able to imitate—a grand, original drunkenness.

"Become inebriate as thou pleasest," observed Pantagruel with disdainful benignity, but still without turning round, "provided it be at thine own expense; nay, I extend my permission still further, thou mayest even intoxicate thyself at the expense of another, provided that other be not I."

"Oblivious crew," shouted the intruder, "know, to your infinite shame and confusion, that I am your ancient friend, Carpimon." And with these words he fell senseless on the floor. Pantagruel looked at his face for the first time.

"Yes, it is indeed Carpimon," he said, mournfully.

"The Carpimon, whom we thought safe in New York?" asked Epistemon, sadly.

"The Carpimon, whom we hoped had hanged himself?" inquired Panurge, gloomily.

"The same," ejaculated Pantagruel, and he dashed a tear from his princely eye. "Alas! in this world, how may the fairest hopes be blighted!"

We called attention last week, and, if we remember rightly, invited our readers to contribute, to a testimonial about to be presented to Mademoiselle Piccolomini, on the occasion of her retirement from the stage. We were not in a position to state what form the testimonial would take, for it is not often that any such honorific present is received by a singer, and we had no precedent to guide us. All we knew was that the offering was to be made, that some of the first music-publishers in London were ready to accept subscriptions, and that a certain sum of money had been already subscribed. How (after forwarding one cheque for a very respectable amount) we wondered whether it would be diamonds, emeralds or pearls, whether a brooch, a bracelet or a necklace, that the adorers of Mademoiselle Piccolomini, with ourselves foremost amongst the number, would present to their charming little idol! To a successful railway director, testimonialists, while things are still going on smoothly, give enough money to buy an estate. Mr. Russell of the Scotsman, only the other day, was complimented with a silver tea-service and some sixteen hundred sovereigns. Mr. E. L. Blanchard, as it were the day before yesterday, had a silver claret jug given to him by Mr. Smith. Then who has not had an inkstand presented to him, and who has not wished that it had been anything else? However, there is something in an inkstand—there ought to be ink, but we are speaking in a loftier sense; there is something in a claret-jug—there ought to be claret, but that is not precisely what we mean; and in sixteen hundred sovereigns there is eighty pounds a-year, at five per cent., supposing that the owner is weak enough not to break into the capital. But with neither and with none of these more or less valuable and appropriate gifts could we do homage to Mademoiselle Piccolomini. We should know what to give a fox-hunter or a proprietor of race-horses, and we have already told our readers what testimonials were justly considered appropriate to the editor of a Scotch newspaper and to the author of a hundred pantomimes; but this, after all, brings us no nearer to the solution of the great question—What testimonial shall be offered to Mademoiselle Piccolomini?

Let us begin, we thought, and reason from the beginning. Mademoiselle Piccolomini is a singer, therefore let us invite her acceptance of something that will be especially useful to a vocalist. That will, surely, be more reasonable than was the giving of a claret-jug to Mr. E. L. Blanchard, whose drink is pale ale at lunch and sherry at dinner; or of a tea-service to Mr. Russell, whose ordinary beverage is coffee; or of an inkstand to the present writer, to whom the sight of an inkstand happens to be a vision of terror.

Then what shall we lay at the feet of Mademoiselle Piccolomini, in her capacity of prima donna?

A box of Stolberg's voice-lozenges? That would be too cheap, far too nasty, and not in any way complimentary.

A tuning-fork of massive gold? That would be open to some of the same objections.

A piano? Every one has a piano.

Music? Mademoiselle Piccolomini sings all kinds of music, and has already music of every kind.

But the music that is not yet written, that is still in the composer's brain, or that, at least, has not yet met the public ear. Would not that be a present to set before a lyric queen?

The very idea that had occurred to us, or, rather, at which we had arrived after prodigious mental labour, had also struck the originators of the Piccolomini testimonial; and people are now beginning to understand that this testimonial has been already presented in the shape of an opera by Signor Campana, at the public production of which the subscribers—to the theatre as well as to the testimonial—were invited to be present last Thursday. We need not say here what opinion we have of Almina, except that we think that some excuse was needed for bringing it out. Perhaps we may be allowed to add, that if Almina is indeed the Piccolomini testimonial, of which we have heard so much, we are really very sorry that our popular little favourite has not received something a great deal more valuable.

New Arrivals.—Mademoiselle Anna Kull, violoncellist; M. Theodore Ritter, pianist and composer; Herr Kumpel, a violinist of distinction; and Herr Schnieder, a tenor player.

Belfast—(From our own Correspondent).—The Anacreontic Society concluded their forty-seventh season, on the 19th inst., with a concert which appeared to give much satisfaction to a large audience, although the performance was confined to the members of the Society, who are nearly all amateurs. The programme was varied, and included solos for piano, flute, and saxophone, a duo for piano and violoncello, songs and glees, &c., but the only feature in it which calls for special remark was Romberg's Symphony in E flat, which was played with spirit, and with an attention to light and shade that reflects great credit on the clever conductor, Herr Leo Kerbusch. Mr. Loveday led the violins with his usual care.

THE FRENCH ORPHEONISTS IN ENGLAND.

The good musical understanding between ourselves and England progresses every day. We have been enabled to estimate and record its progress by our relations with London. This novel kind of understanding, which has for its ministers Mozart, Beethoven, Handel, Meyerbeer, Halévy, Ambroise Thomas, Mendelssohn, Kücken, and Kreutzer, and for its ambassadors, three thousand French Orphéonists, will be settled and consolidated to the benefit of the artistic future of these two great nations. The London Sacred Harmonic Society has already given the French choral societies the tone of the intellectual and moral concert which will gloriously complete this triple choral demonstration. Our readers have read in these columns the Society's address, which was the eloquent preface of the cordial welcome that awaits our legion of singers. The information we have received, from reliable sources, and the high opinion we entertain of the English character, enable us to foresee, for this harmonious expedition, days which will ever be recollected in the history of art and good brotherhood.

The English press has just officially announced the Festival. The Times, the Observer, the Daily News, the Morning Chronicle, and the other papers of all shades and opinions, have received the announcement with favour. Nor could it be otherwise. The fatidical voice of the Orphéon is understood in high quarters; its extent and vibrations are measured by the echoes it arouses in the human heart; by the profound and sudden metamorphoses it effects in the life of nations. The London Festival will wipe out historical animosities. The historians of both countries should be present, in order to study together an event which cannot fail to leave behind it a deep impression on men's minds, and to act beneficially on our international relations. How do we outstrip, with our rolls of music, political economists, with their cold prose! How do we bequeath to the dust of libraries, and to the old remains of prejudices, the hateful legends of Pitt, of Chatham and of Jean Bart! What do we care about the politics of party, the ideal of sailors and of song-writers? The human dogma of progress, in the unity of language and of race, shines far above these rabid reminiscences, these monotonous couplets, and these sinister images of another epoch. The progress of our ideas has burst the chain of these blind, retrogressive or stationary principles. We do not think the renovation of international laws can be any longer stopped by the bitter dithyrambics of a few orators and poets, who rise in the morning, from their interviews with the god Mars, without seeing what is the hour by the dial of History. But who are we, that we should have dared, without consulting the augurs, to get up so imposing a musical demonstration, to organise the enlistment of three thousand singers—of three thousand voices, which will peal forth the hymn of brotherhood in the grand transept of the Palace at Sydenham?* Whence have we derived such boldness and such strength? We have derived it, simply, from our confidence in the Future, and in the superiority of our views on history and philosophy. We are simply men endowed with a good will and perseverance. We believe when others doubt. We watch when others sleep. We are, also, we must honestly confess, men frequently selected as the butt for sarcasm, calumny, abuse, and the insolent denials of that petty fry, who harass, with their squeaking voices, everyone who cannot behold them in their native dust, and who rises above them in heart and head. Ah! Art is not a vain ornament of youth! Art is, after all, good for something in the life of nations! Artists are not so much out of place, in the philosophic and moral movements of society, as some people are pleased to affirm!

The days fixed on for the Festival of the French Orphéonists in London are Monday, the 25th; Tuesday, the 26th; and Thursday, the 28th of June next. A circular which M. Delaporte will send, this week, to the Societies which have signified their intention of taking part in the ceremony, will contain the complete programme of the Festival. We shall, in our next number, publish a list of all the choruses, which will be executed by the three thousand Orphéonists.

Two months separate us from the solemnity. In two months' time, the steamers will carry the vocal legion to the shores of Albion. The Orphéonists must increase their exertions, and pay more attention than ever to their studies, in order to prove themselves worthy of France, and deserving the applause of England, for Great Britain will be represented by all classes at the Festival. The French Orphéonists must prepare themselves seriously to maintain their musical reputation before the people and aristocracy of the United Kingdom.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

Mdlle. Piccolomini gave her second farewell performance on Saturday, when the Traviata was represented, and, being a subscription night, the theatre was crowded. The Trovatore was given for the third time on Tuesday.

On Thursday, a new opera was produced, entitled Almina, composed by Sig. Fabio Campana, favourably known, in England, as the author of light vocal pieces for the drawing-room. Sig. Campana, too, we are informed, produced in Italy, some years ago, one or two operas, of which we know nothing. The story of Almina would not interest our readers if recounted in detail. Enough that the heroine loves one man and is married to another, that she is supposed to die of a broken heart, and is buried; that her lover, reported killed, returns from the wars and breaks open her tomb; that she is restored to life, and flies with her deliverer to a foreign land; that they revisit their native country; that the husband reclaims his wife, and that the lady takes poison, and dies. There are some good dramatic situations, of which such a composer as Signor Verdi would doubtless have made good use. Signor Campana, however, is wanting in dramatic fire, which, above all other qualities, Almina requires. Mdlle. Piccolomini was well suited in the part of Almina—being invariably earnest and passionate, and often real. The music, however, was not so suitable to her means, and her singing did not always produce its wonted effect. Signor Giuglini, as the lover, Biondello, on the other hand, sang better than ever, and carried away the vocal honours of the evening. He was encored twice, and was in finer voice than we have heard him for a long time. Signor Aldighieri sustained the part of Walter, the husband, with his customary vigour, and more than his customary judgment.

Taking applause as a criterion, the success of Almina was triumphant. After the first act, the principal singers were recalled, and then Signor Campana was compelled to appear, when he was not merely received with tumultuous acclamations, but fêted with bouquets and laurel-wreaths. At the fall of the curtain, too, he was summoned to the foot-lights twice, when the demonstrations were renewed, and no doubt the composer left the theatre perfectly satisfied that his opera had achieved a great and legitimate triumph. First nights, however, are not always precedents—the Barbiere of Rossini to witness.

Last night Lucrezia Borgia was given, with Mdlle. Titiens as Lucrezia, Madame Borghi-Mamo as Maffeo Orsini (her first appearance in the part), Signor Mongini, Gennaro (his first appearance in the part), and Signor Sebastiano Ronconi, Duke Alfonso (his first appearance in this country). Of this performance, we shall speak next week.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Fidelio was repeated on Saturday, and attracted a much larger attendance than at the first performance. Madame Csillag more than confirmed the impression she made on Thursday. The indisposition of Signor Tagliafico necessitated the omission of Pizarro's only air. In other respects Beethoven's great masterpiece was given to perfection.

Grisi and Mario made their "rentrée" on Tuesday in La Favorita. Of course the theatre was crowded, the public being always desirous to hail the first appearance of these deservedly admired performers. M. Faure, too, was Alfonso XI., and lent another attraction to the performance. Grisi still maintains her place. Her upper notes may have lost some of their brilliancy, and her execution some of its fluency; but the voice still possesses the exquisite quality of old, and her style retains all its unrivalled charm. That Grisi should act still better and better, is a matter of course. In this respect, at all events, we can discover no change, unless that she has become more subtle and more finished, as, indeed, we were inclined to think on Tuesday evening, when she transcended her former achievements, especially in the last scene, which has never been surpassed for intensity and pathos. Mario, too, appeared to act better than ever, which à priori was all but an impossibility, and to sing as nobody else but he can sing, when in the vein. The great tenor was labouring under a slight cold, which at first appeared to affect him but little. In the last act, however, immediately after the repeat of the romanza, "Angiol d' amore" (unanimously encored), a slight hoarseness was evident, and the passionate duet, "Tutto m' obblio," was deprived of a portion of its wonted effect.

M. Faure impersonated the Castilian monarch with more grace and dignity than we remember in any of his predecessors. Moreover, he looked every inch a king, and was dressed to perfection. He sang, also, finely, although occasionally with too evident a desire to shine, his extreme high notes being employed more frequently than necessary. M. Faure was encored in "A tanto amor," which he gave with irreproachable taste, showing by his manner to Leonora that, unlike many Alfonsos, he thoroughly appreciated the force of the words.

The opera was brought out with all that careful attention to detail which, among other things, has made the reputation of the theatre. The costumes were splendid and appropriate, and the scenery magnificent, the last scene—the cloisters in the monastery—almost rivalling the memorable tableau in the old house.

Fidelio was announced for repetition on Thursday, but, in consequence of the illness of Signor Tagliafico, Dinorah was substituted, the song of the Huntsman (Act III.) being omitted.

On Tuesday, Fra Diavolo will bring back Signor Ronconi as Lord Allcash, and Madame Miolan-Carvalho will make her first appearance as Zerlina.

Leeds Town Hall Organistship—(From a Correspondent).—The conditions upon which the election of an organist for the Leeds Town Hall is to be conducted have just been issued by the Committee. From the applicants it is intended to select not fewer than three, nor more than seven, who will be submitted to the Town Council as the selected list. These gentlemen will then be invited to a competitive performance before three eminent organists, who will report on their comparative ability, as No. 1, 2, and 3; and the candidate standing No. 1 will be submitted to the Council for appointment. The selected candidates will be allowed fifteen hours each for practice on the organ. (At Newcastle, recently, we believe, only one hour's practice was allowed.) Considerable interest is already exhibited in the approaching election, and it is rumoured that some of the first organists of the day intend to seek the appointment. The salary is to be £200 per annum, and after 100 performances have been given by the organist, the sum of £2 2s. will be paid for every extra performance.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE season was inaugurated on Monday evening, when a programme of unvaried excellence was provided. The Hanover-square Rooms were perhaps not so well attended as is usual on the opening night. The unfavourable state of the weather was sufficient, indeed, to have thinned the audience far more; but the lovers of good music are not to be daunted by Eurus and Boreas, even when they deal their fiercest blasts, and spout their densest rains. The following was the selection:—

PART I.

Symphony, "The Seasons," in B minor	Spohr.
Song, "A questi avventueri infami" (Il Seraglio) ...	Mozart.
Concerto, violin	Mendelssohn.
Scena (Der Freischütz)	Weber.
Overture (Egmont)	Beethoven.

PART II.

Symphony, "Jupiter"	Mozart.
Duet, "Se la vita" (Semiramide)	Rossini.
Overture (Oberon)	Weber.

Of the symphony of Spohr, we have more than once spoken at length. It is enough to say in this place, that it is not one of the most inspired works of the great master. In the movement illustrative of "Spring" there are many traces of his happiest manner and some of his brightest thoughts. The movement representing "Autumn," is everywhere spirited, graceful, and characteristic. "Summer," however, is depicted in too monotonous a tone, and "Winter"—with which, by the way, the symphony commences—is too uniformly sombre and monotonous. The execution, considering the difficulties presented, was marvellous, and Professor Bennett and his orchestra covered themselves with honour.

The violin concerto, as performed by Herr Becker, was in many respects entitled to the very highest commendation. Exceptions, nevertheless, might be taken in several instances; the reading generally was not in strict keeping with the directions of the composer. Herr Becker, nevertheless, played so splendidly, that he was recalled at the end and received with enthusiasm.

The execution of Mozart's symphony and Beethoven's overture was inimitable in every way, both performances being received with tumultuous applause, and the overture to Oberon was a splendid finale.

Signor Belletti sang the superb song from Mozart's too much neglected opera with faultless taste. Mdlle. Louise Michal, a Swedish prima donna of reputation in her own country, gave the grand scena from Der Freischütz with great power and facility, but in too studied and artificial a manner to create any unusual effect. So capable a voice as hers is not heard every day. The duet from Semiramide was more suited to the gentleman's style than that of the lady.

MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.

THE third concert was given on Wednesday, and was alike characterised by excellence and variety, as the following selection will show.

PART I.

Overture, (The Isles of Fingal)	Mendelssohn.
Air, "Jours de mon enfance," (Pré aux Clercs)	Hérold.
Symphony Concertante in B flat, Op. 68, two Pianofortes and Orchestra	Dussek.
Recit., "By him betrayed" / Air, "Thus I am doomed" (M.S. Opera) ...	J. Benedict.
Overture, (Lurline)	Vincent Wallace.

PART II.

Sinfonia Eroica (No. 3), Op. 55	Beethoven.
Duo, "Di qual città sei tu?" (L'Etoile du Nord)	Meyerbeer.
Overture, (Gustave)	Auber.

Conductor—Mr. Alfred Mellon.

The features of the performance were the Symphony and Mendelssohn's overture, neither of which we ever heard executed with grander effect. The overture, although holding by no means the enviable position of the first piece in the programme, was encored in a tumult of applause, and repeated with increased effect. Mr. Wallace's brilliant and dramatic orchestral prelude to Lurline, too, was played with astonishing power and precision. Not so the overture to Auber's opera, in which the first movement was taken too quick, and the last too slow—innovations which, in both instances, were disastrous to the effect intended by the composer. The Symphony Concertante of Dussek—too rarely heard in public—was acceptable on all accounts. The whole work is interesting; but the finale is an inspiration. Messrs. Charles Salaman and Lindsay Sloper were the pianists, and vied with each other and with the orchestra in zeal and energy.

The vocal music was excellent. Miss Augusta Thomson sang the very difficult air, from Hérold's opera, with great brilliancy; Mr. Santley gave a bold and vigorous reading of the masterly scena from Benedict's unpublished opera; and both artists gave the utmost capital effect to the admirable duet from Meyerbeer's Etoile du Nord.

The fourth concert is announced for the 9th of May, when Mr. G. A. Macfarren's new cantata, Christmas, will be given.

POPULAR MUSIC OF THE OLDEN TIME.

A COLLECTION OF

ANCIENT SONGS, BALLADS, & DANCE TUNES,

Illustrating the National Music of England; with Remarks and Anecdote. Preceded by a short account of the Minstrels, and Introductions to the various Reigns, by

W. CHAPPELL, F.S.A.,

THE AIRS HARMONIZED BY G. A. MACFARREN.

In Two Vols. Imp. 8vo., £2 8s.; or in 17 Parts, each 3s.

"The main body of the work consists of a mass of erudition, no less copious than well digested. Mr. Chappell's work is the only one of its kind."—Quarterly Review, July, '59.

"This book does every credit to the patience, intelligence, and modesty of its author."—Athenæum, August 18th, '59.

"Not two, but twenty notices could be written of this excellent and carefully wrought book"—Athenæum, August 20, '59.

"The book is indeed one which the ladies will delight in for its music, and graver readers for its curious learning."—Notes and Queries, July 9.

"The student of history, the antiquary, the reader for amusement, and the cultivated lover of sweet sounds, will come alike to Mr. Chappell's volumes in search of gratification for their several tastes, and will assuredly not come in vain."—Gentleman's Magazine, August, '57.

"In the limits of a short notice it is impossible to do justice to Mr. Chappell's volumes. They are full of pleasant matter for every class of reader."—Examiner, Sept. 17.

"'Popular Music of the Olden Time,' one of the greatest and most valuable works which have ever issued from the English musical press."—Spectator, March 5, '59.

"Antique specimens furnished by Mr. W. Chappell's invaluable work on 'Popular Music of the Olden Time.'"—Times, March, 31, '59.

"There is an enormous amount of research in Mr. Chappell's book, yet no sign of labour; no heaviness whatever; but, on the contrary, the author gives the results of his studies briefly, smoothly, pleasantly as possible."—Morning Post, Sept. 22.

"Mr. William Chappell's great collection of our national songs and ballads, is, in truth, an English classic, a standard work—distinguished not only as a vast storehouse of the treasures of genuine English music and song—but as a literary work of great learning and research, and so full of curious and interesting information relative to the music, as well as the manners and customs of our ancestors, that it may be regarded as a contribution not only to the history of music, but to the history of England."—Daily News, Dec. 7, '58.

"An invaluable history of the early music of this country, the fruit of study, at once patient and unwearying, and of investigation adequately learned and intelligent."—Morning Herald, Sept. 1, '56.

"We heartily recommend this important and admirable work to the attention, not of musical readers only, but of the whole public. It is full of interesting information, the result of great learning and deep research; while it is attractive from its pictures of society and manners among our ancestors, and from the exceedingly pleasant and animated style in which it is written."—Daily News, Oct. 11, '59.

"Mr. Chappell's collection is in all respects a remarkable work, one of those which an honest enthusiasm may, but a money-fee never can, produce."—Chambers' Journal, Oct. 23, '58.

GREAT NATIONAL ENTERPRISE

Organised in 1848, and developed at THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC BRIDGE STREET, MANCHESTER, established by him expressly as a Great National Institution to facilitate the Encouragement and Promotion of NATIVE MUSICAL TALENT, and the GENERAL ADVANCEMENT OF MUSIC AMONG THE RISING GENERATION, upon his new and effective system, also as a NORMAL SCHOOL for the training of masters to conduct CONSERVATOIRES OF MUSIC to be established throughout the United Kingdom, for LITTLE CHILDREN, the whole comprising an entirely new scheme of NATIONAL EDUCATION, by blending music with general instruction, so that the study of music shall become a branch of education in the humblest of schools of this country. To illustrate and to rouse an interest in every town and city for these institutions, Dr. Mark travels with a number of his pupils occasionally through the country—giving lectures, and introducing his highly approved and pleasing Musical Entertainment, entitled DR. MARK AND HIS LITTLE MEN, who number upwards of Thirty Instrumentalists, and a most Efficient Chorus, the whole forming a most unique and complete Juvenile Orchestra, composed of LITTLE ENGLISH, IRISH, SCOTCH AND WELCH BOYS, FROM FIVE TO SIXTEEN YEARS OF AGE, who play Operatic Selections, Solos, Marches, Quadrilles, Galops, &c., and sing Songs and Choruses in a most effective manner, and to whom Dr. Mark gives a gratuitous General and Musical Education.

APPOINTMENTS OF MASTERS AND ARRANGEMENTS OF CLASSES IN THE ABOVE INSTITUTION.

Principal of the Royal College of Music; Director, Composer, and Conductor; Lecturer to both Private and Public, Theoretical and Practical Instrumental and Vocal Classes	Dr. MARK.
Master of the General Educational Department: Writing, Reading, Arithmetic, Grammar, Dictation, History, Geography, Practical Geometry, and Book-keeping	Mr. POWELL and Two Assistant Teachers.

Concertina (German and English)	Mr. ELDER.
Vocal Classes	Messrs. POWELL and ELDER.

Dr. MARK has also made provision for the Orphans of the Musical Profession possessing musical talent, who will find the above institution a happy home, and receive a most effective general and musical education, board, and clothing, free of all expense.

Little Boys, from five to nine years of age, apprenticed for three, five, or seven years by paying a moderate entrance fee to cover the expenses of instrument and books.

Twelve appointments ready for Masters.

For Prospectuses, apply direct to the Royal College of Music, Bridge-street, Manchester.

Dr. MARK is also open to Engagements with his Little Men.

Dr. MARK begs to invite the Parents and Friends, and all those interested in his Enterprise and in the Education of the Youths of this country to visit his establishment. Visiting hours:—From Nine to Eleven, a.m., and Two and Four, p.m. Saturdays and Sundays excepted.

"THE RETURN OF MAY."

NEW VOCAL DUET, the words by Mrs. Hemans, the music by J. Herrmann.

 "It is long since we have seen a more sterling duet, than 'The Return of May.' by J. Zeugheer Herrmann. This is a dainty pastoral for two female voices. The parts are arranged with great, yet not too great ingenuity; 'the colours of the hawthorn bloom,' is on the entire composition. It is good, fresh music."—Athenæum.

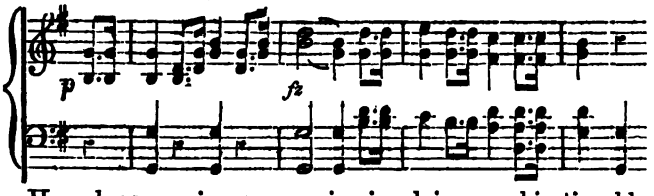
REVIEWS.

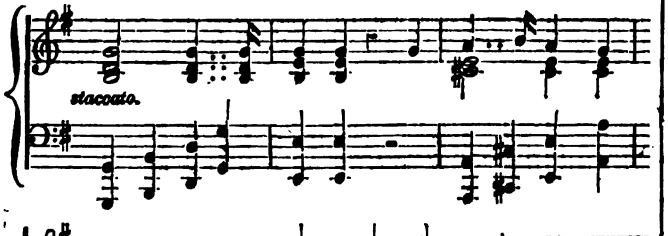
"'Marche Impériale'—Military March—graciously accepted y His Majesty The Emperor Napoleon III."; "'La Prussienne'—Valse brillante—dedicated by permission to Her Serene Highness, The Princess Marie zu Hohenzollern Hechingen"; "'La Dame d'Honneur'—Waltz—dedicated by permission to Her Grace the Duchess de Bassano"; "'L'Ambassadrice'—Polka Mazurka—dedicated by permission to The Right Hon. The Countess Cowley"; "'Gigia'—Polka—dedicated by permission to M. W. Balfe, Esq."; "'A dream'—Grande Fantaisie—dedicated by permission to Monsieur E. de Tarade"; "'L'Africaine'—Polka Mazurka—dedicated by permission to Mrs. Eugène Martin"; "'Impromptu Caprice'—dedicated to his friend, The Hon. Alan P. Herbert"; "'The Sekiar Waltz'—dedicated to Mrs. Robert Raikes (East Dale Hall, Yorkshire)"; "'Une Pensée'—Fantaisie—dedicated to Mrs. Richard Tillstone"; "'Grand Nocturne'—dedicated by permission to Monsieur Emile Prudent"; "'Nocturne'—dedicated to Mrs. Maximilian Behrend, née Balfe, (Rudall, Rose, Carte, and Co.)

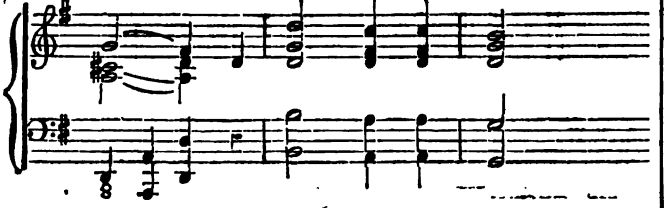
The "Marche Impériale" is spirited and evidently martial in character. It opens well :—



Here, however, is a progression involving an objectionable confusion of keys :—

The trio, in the relative minor, also begins well ; but there are several points in the march, which in a rhythmical sense smack so oddly of "Rule Britannia," (although the notes are not precisely the same), that it is doubtful whether Napoleon III. (until he has completely fitted out his Channel fleet) might relish it. For example :—

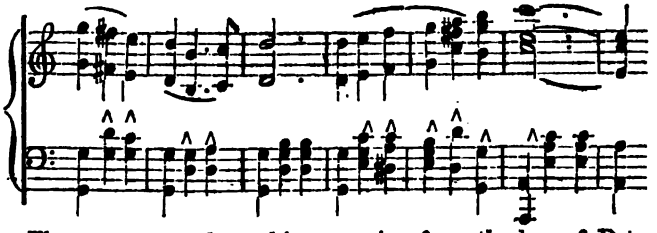




and again, for example :—

The musical reader will perceive that the notes are not identical with those of our great naval hymn, but that the rhythm, at the same time, is so resolutely anti-gallican, that a dedication of the Marche Triomphale ("Triomphale" is a significant word), to the Regent of Prussia, or the King of Sardinia, or perhaps to the Swiss Republic, (the Swiss being têtes-montées, if not pieds-montés), would be more appropriate than to the French Ruler.

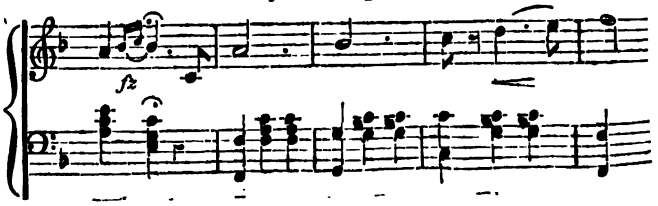
"La Prussienne," though it has some good points, is less musically meritorious than the preceding. The subject, however, (in the Strauss and Lanner vein), is graceful, and but for one or two questionable progressions, the whole might pass without criticism. The subjoined is one of the least defensible points :—



The return to the subject, passing from the key of D to that of B flat, is not more unrhythmical than uncanonical :—

"La Dame d'Honneur" is a really nice waltz; but would be much nicer if its pretty first theme were harmonised otherwise than as below :—

The substitution of dominant for tonic, in the third bar would render the harmony unexceptionable :—



The trio (page 3) is charming, and but for the consecutive octaves between melody and bass (subjoined)— would be irreproachable. The second part of the trio, beginning as follows—is extremely graceful, and well worked out to the end.

"L'Ambassadrice" sets out with one of the most elegant themes ever invented in polka measure—so elegant and so fresh in the bargain, that it is afflicting to find its easy progress impeded by such uncouth progressions as the following:—

A "wit" once said that amateur composers should never leave the key without taking the key, in order to get back again when necessary—a condition, however, which it would be somewhat difficult to fulfil. Here, in a very simple transition, Mr. Raikes gets involved in an unpleasant "false relation:"—

"L'Ambassadrice" is well written in spite of these blemishes, which, though slight, serve materially to deface her beauty.

"Gigia" is another very attractive polka, and (which by no means lessens its attractions) with scarcely a violation of good harmony to notice. Mr. Raikes should invariably endeavour to write thus correctly.

"The Sekiar Waltz" has a pretty and engaging episode (page 5), but the first part contains points too objectionable to pass over. As for example:—

And for example:—

And for example:—

"Une Pensée" is a fantasia, in the course of which the composer has traced some really graceful passages, damaged here and there by such transitions as the following:—

"L'Africaine," another polka, may be classed with "Gigia," both for prettiness of thought and correctness of execution.

"A Dream," is a fantasia on a more ambitious scale than most of its companion-pieces, and marked by a higher sort of musical aspiration. Mr. Raikes, however, is not quite so successful, we think, either with this or the "Grand Nocturne," dedicated to M. Emile Prudent—nice as is the feeling—occasionally evinced in both—as in his less pretending effusion, of which both the "Impromptu Caprice," a light and brilliant piece in polka measure, and the Nocturne in G major (dedicated to Mad. M. Behrend), are very attractive specimens. The last especially—but for one or two progressions, such as—would be as unassailable by criticism as it is charmingly melodious.

To conclude—there is so much of good in the foregoing essays at composition, that we have a right to hope for something a great deal better from the same pen.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

HARMONIES OF PSALM AND HYMN TUNES.

SIR,—You will oblige by inserting answers to the following queries in your next impression:

1. Did C. H. Rink or J. S. Bach leave any separate works of harmonies of psalm and hymn tunes? If so, by whom are they published?

2. Whose harmonies of psalm and hymn tunes* are most elaborate and full?

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

Devonport, March 12th, 1860. ST. MICHAEL'S.

TENOR OR TREBLE.

SIR,—Now that the French have set us so good an example of musical unity in fixing, by regulation, the pitch of instruments, I beg to suggest that you would kindly lend your aid towards determining a point I have always considered to be a weak one in our musical notation—i. e., whether music to be sung by a tenor voice should be written in the tenor or the treble clef?

I can answer for having found, in my own experience in teaching, great difficulty to arise from both clefs being made use of. My tenor singer, whose part I may be teaching him for Sunday's service, will stand me out, occasionally, that C sharp is D sharp, and, in consequence, views the system of semi-tones as a perfect chaos! He can ill spare one night in the week for practice for Sunday, much less time to learn the whole system of clefs, being a hard-working man.

With regard to which clef is to be chosen for general adoption I confidently recommend the use of the tenor C clef; and am surprised to observe that Mr. Novello, to whose better judgment I ought, perhaps, to bow, writes the treble G clef, which is likely to give a tenor singer a false notion of what he is doing. I am aware that an objection to this may be raised, that thereby treble voices would be shut out from singing songs originally intended for the male voice. But then, Mr. Editor, how much better this would be; for our taste would not be constantly offended, as at present, by hearing ladies render pathetic appeals from an Arture to his loved one!

I feel I have already occupied too much of your valuable space, so will only add that if you can help in abolishing this musical grievance, I am sure you will receive the thanks of the whole existing musical world, in addition to those of,

Sir, your obedient servant,

A COUNTRY (but not the less earnest) ORGANIST.

April 24th, 1860.

MR. RANSFORD'S CONCERT.

SIR,—I shall be much obliged if you will allow me, through the medium of your columns, to request Mr. Wm. E. Ransford to read my letter a little further than the words he has quoted. He will find that what I said, was, Miss Ransford did not (as stated) sing an Italian aria and one or two English songs; by this I do not deny that she sang the Italian aria, I am perfectly aware of having had the pleasure of hearing her. I merely contradict the statement that she sang both, that and the one or two English songs alluded to; my letter then continues "but one solo only and the duet," this solo was "Fatal Goffredo," that Mr. Ransford is so desirous of knowing what I call it. If Mr. Ransford will allow me to borrow his own words, I will advise him that before he attempted to "contradict" or "correct" my letter, it would have been better to be "first perfectly acquainted" with what I "actually" said.

With thanks for inserting my former communication, I remain, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

London, April, 28*th* 1860. H. T. A.

EXETER.—(From a Correspondent).—On Tuesday evening (the 26th ult.), the members of the Exeter Oratorio Society, under the direction of Mr. Rice, the society's conductor, performed Handel's oratorio, Judas Maccabæus. The principal vocalists were Miss Banks (soprano), Madame Laura Baxter (contralto), Mr. W. G. Way (tenor), and Mr. C. Jennings (basso). Miss Banks, an established favourite, delighted all by her chaste and intelligent singing. Madame Laura Baxter, who appeared in Exeter for the first time, displayed her fine voice and vocal skill to eminent advantage.

MADAME CLARA NOVELLO.

THE father of this esteemed songstress, Mr. Vincent Novello, was among the most highly respected musicians of his generation in this country. Why should we say was? The respect he first earned, some half a century since or more, is still due and still paid to him, though the advance of years now checks the active exercise of those talents which have called it forth. Mr. Vincent Novello is one of the most highly respected English musicians of the age in which he flourished, and he lives in the full enjoyment of his honours, and the proud witness of those won by his daughter. He lives, one of the last of those worthies who maintained the art in this country during the first half of the present century. Attwood, Crotch, the elder Horsley, the still older Callcott, S. Wesley, F. Cramer, and his far more famous brother, J. B. (famous for playing and teaching the pianoforte, for his eternal book of studies, and for the embellishment of the facia of a great house in Regent-street with his name), Bishop, Cooke, and how many more of his co-labourers, have passed from the field of their activity. Mr. Novello is the composer of many admired, chiefly vocal, compositions; the best known of which are those written for the service of the Roman church. His name is even more familiar as an editor, his arrangements of Haydn's and Mozart's Masses being in use in every Romanist chapel throughout the kingdom, and in every family circle in which, whether with a religious or an artistic feeling, this class of music is practised; and his arrangements of Handel's Oratorios being in circulation by thousands and thousands of copies. He was one of the original members of the Philharmonic Society, an institution which has had an influence above all value upon the progress of music in England; in the old days, before the functions, or even the title, of a conductor were known among us, he used, in turn with his compeers, to "preside" at the pianoforte (as the phrase went) in this society's concerts; in later times, when, through his exertions and the efforts of others, music had made some advance, he filled the more honourable, because the more responsible, office of conductor. He has stood high among organists, having been engaged for very many years in this capacity, at one or other of the chief Romanist chapels in the metropolis, and having been one of those who filled the post at the great Westminster Festival of 1834. It is said that his father was an Italian, who came to London in the capacity of cook to one of the royal family; that, having set many a dainty dish before the king, he retired from office, into the privacy of a confectionery shop, gladdening there the taste of the British public by the fabrication of those same delicacies which had erewhiles delighted those princes and rulers, and that, while he still practised the art of pastry the infant Vincent emulated rather that of the blackbirds, which may or may not have been sung at the opening of the kingly pies his sire had been wont to amalgamate. It is said that in a back parlour of the confectory, young Vincent used to practice the pianoforte, and that being overheard in his pursuit of intellectual sweets, through the world of physical sweets that surrounded him, by a frequenter of his sire's emporium of dainties, this man of twofold taste perceived his talent and encouraged it, became his patron, and furnished the means for his receiving the best musical education the country could afford. We vouch not for the truth of either of these sayings, though we know of no reason to disbelieve them; if they be true, however, so much more creditable are they, both to the talent and assiduity of Mr. Novello, to whom such faculties have been as wings, whereupon he has soared into a position of high consideration in an art which makes the greatest demands upon the intelligence of its votaries. Mr. Novello throve in his profession, gained the esteem of men, married an English wife who was the very main-spring of the family activity, and begat sons and daughters. These, his progeny, are all, more or less, distinguished in one or more department of intellectual cultivation; Mr. J. A. Novello is known as a vocalist, still more as the secretary of the society for abolishing taxes on knowledge, and most of all as the originator of the reduction of the price of musical publications; Mrs. Cowden Clarke is a novelist of deserved repute, and she has rendered a still greater service to literature, than by her clever original works, in the production of her elaborate "Concordance of Shakspere;" Mrs. Serle was a singer at the English Opera House, when it was directed by Mr. S. J. Arnold, and she closed her rising career, on her retirement into private life, when she married, but too early to prove to the world the extent of those abilities which her friends knew her to possess; Miss Sabilla Novello made considerable progress as a vocalist; since she resigned which profession, she has been successfully occupied in translating theoretical works upon music; and, chief of her fraternity, Madame Clara Novello needs no comment of ours to prove her pre-eminence in the art she brightly adorns, and from the practice of which she is too soon to retire. Thus much for the parentage of our heroine, which proves her to be both of English and of musical origin, which shows her family to have risen by the merit of its members to that most honourable of all aristocracy, the nobility of their own creation; and which evidences the influence they must mutually have shared, whatever it may have been, the influence that prompted all of them to aspire, and neither of them without success. It is now to pursue the third section of our preliminary investigation (having dismissed her birth and her parentage), the education of Madame Clara Novello.

Education—how all importantly comprehensive a chain of connection between a human being and the inner circle of his immediate social relationship,—between the same living and stirring personality, and the outer round of the world, with which though unknowing its manifold constituences, possibly unknown by them, he exchanges influence! It is quite beyond the limits of this notice to do justice to the circumstances and the surroundings which combined to develope the rare qualities, social and artistic, moral and intellectual, of the distinguished lady whose career we have undertaken, however imperfectly, to chronicle. We must briefly state then, as a point of far too great consideration to be disregarded, that her father's house was a gathering place of many of the most eminent literary men of that notable literary period in which her early years were passed, from whose sparkling, imaginative, and profound discourse, her mind must have received impressions that may well have affected its entire constitution. Leigh Hunt, Hazlitt, Keats, the transcendent Shelley, were the more or less frequent guests of her paternal home, and others, not less renowned for wit and wisdom were members of the brilliant circle; Charles Lamb, for one, as unmusical as he was humorous, enjoyed the meetings, though he had no sense for the occasional music, which, to some, was their chief attraction, and, in his wonderful "Chapter on Ears," describing these very reunions, has everlastingly immortalised his own unimpressibility by that art, of whose effects, poets as a race, are, as they should be, always most susceptible. In avowing his own total unorganisation for music, the exquisite Elia gives testimony to the character of the parties at the residence of Mr. Novello, (the N of his irresistible essay to which we have alluded) and proves them to have been the occasion of such an intermixture of all that a lover of intellectual beauty would most wish to have witnessed, that we may well believe them to have constituted the most valuable school for our young artist's budding mind. Reared in an atmosphere of which poetry, and music, and love were the component gases—the hydrogen, oxygen, and carbon of the soul—should it be wondered that the powers of the future songstress were stimulated by the nourishment they inhaled, drawing thence a quickening impulse which may well have induced their utmost expansion?

SOCIETY FOR THE ENCOURAGEMENT OF FINE ARTS.

THE third conversazione was held last Thursday evening, in the Suffolk-street Gallery. The Hon. Sec., Mr. H. Ottley, to whose energetic exertions this society is mainly indebted for the position it has attained, read a very interesting paper upon the patronage and status of art in this country. It was with justness he proved that, although foreign States and Governments bestowed its honors and decorations upon successful artists, yet, that England did give somewhat more than its bare tribute of praise, and that something was reduceable under the vulgar initials, £ s. d. Mr. Ottley drew a comparison between the value of works of art in the year 1860 to what it was a century ago, detailing most forcibly the fact that portraits painted by Sir Joshua Reynolds were charged £25, being one-tenth of the amount that is now paid for similar works to any artist of eminence now. All this was owing to the public taste having been awakened to the charms of design, and the best interests of artists would be promoted by anything which would enable the public in greater numbers to flock to the exhibition of their works. That the artists were aware of this, that they wished to promote the growth of a feeling of sympathy towards them in the minds of the public, was evinced by the handsome readiness with which the directors of some of the principal exhibition galleries of the season had thrown open their doors to the members of this society at their reunions. This was their second visit to the Society of British Artists, whose works ornamented the walls around them; and, looking at them, he thought they could say that they formed a display of which the country had reason to be proud, and which evinced a marked and important advance upon the style of art of thirty or forty years ago. He referred delicately to the disputed points in the case of the Royal Academy, in which he suggested a conciliatory course of procedure, in the interests of the great fraternity of artists as a school—a school which, with properly directed energies, might hold its own in comparison with any in Europe.

These observations were listened to with great attention, and were greatly applauded; at the termination of which, Mr. Ottley then announced that the Earl of Ellesmere had become the President of the Society, and that a conversazione would take place in the Bridgwater Gallery under his Lordship's kind auspices, on Friday, May 25th; an announcement which was received with loud applause.

A concert followed, under the able direction of Mr. Alfred Gilbert, in which a numerous array of talent lent their assistance. The vocal department included the names of Mdme. Gilbert, who sang Donizetti's cavatina, L'Amor suo, as also a ballad composed by Wallace, with considerable expression and feeling. Miss Palmer's fine contralto was likewise much admired in Gordigiani's "Cangione speranza del mio cor" and Schubert's Ave Maria was classically rendered by Miss Teresa Jefferies. The remaining artists, M. Deprit, Mr. Wallworth, Mr. Freame Rielly and Mrs. Cunningham, Mr. Leonard, and Herr Herman, contributed much to the success of the concert. Mdlle. Marie Wieck and Mr. Alfred Gilbert performed Moscheles' grand duet for two pianofortes, Hommage à Handel, with spirit and brilliancy of execution. The fair pianist herself likewise interpreted the Cradle Song of Schumann (her brother-in-law,) and a Rondo of Weber, with much expression, and was deservedly applauded. Mr. B. Wills on the flute, and Mr. Scotson Clarke on the harmonium, added variety and effect to the entertainment.

PROVINCIAL.

LIVERPOOL.—The fourth grand subscription concert of the Philharmonic Society, took place on Tuesday night. The great feature in the programme, was Handel's Acis and Galatea, with Mozart's additional accompaniments; Madame Hayes, Miss Huddart, Mr. Perren, and Mr. Weiss, and a full and efficient orchestra and chorus. Madame Hayes took the part of Galatea; Mr. Perren that of Acis; Miss Fanny Huddart, Damon; and Mr. Weiss, Polyphemus. Mr. Weiss, in the recitative, "I rage, I melt, I burn," was most effective. Mr. Perren's "Love in her eyes sits playing," was tastefully sung. That charming air, "As when the dove," sung by Madame Hayes, was rendered in that rich expressive style for which she is so remarkable. The instrumental music throughout the serenata was of the very best description, and nothing could be finer than the manner in which the accompaniments to Mozart's duet from Il Seraglio, (sung by Mr. Perren and Mr. Weiss) was performed by the orchestra. Miss Huddart, in Hullah's

"Storm," received a well-deserved encore. Of Madame Hayes' singing of "The last rose of summer," it is needless to speak. A "fantasia violoncello," by Mr. Collins, was very much applauded. The manner in which the overture to Dinorah was performed testified to the ability of Mr. J. Z. Hermann as conductor.

DUBLIN.—The entertainment presented yesterday evening by the members of the Madrigal Society, drew together thronged and highly-fashionable attendance in the spacious hall of the Ancient Concerts. The Right Hon. the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress were present, and many distinguished patrons of the society well known as lovers of musical art. The leading vocalists included Miss Julia Cruise, Miss Herbert, Mr. John Keane, Mr W. Tracy, Mr. A. Talbot, Mr. J. O'Rorke, Mr. R. Smith, and Mr. W. Talbot. Mr. J. Keane assisted by Mr. O'Rorke, presided at the grand pianoforte. The opening madrigal, "Ye sinners all," was rendered in a most pleasing style, and "The Curfew," newly arranged by Mr. Levey, was brilliantly executed Miss Julia Cruise gave the aria, "Batti, Batti," from Don Giovanni, with effect, which was enhanced by the very tasteful violoncello obligato by Herr Ellsner. Mr. Richard Smith, in a ballad from the opera of Zurline, was loudly encored. The rare alto voice of Mr. Abraham Talbot was never heard to better advantage than in the favourite Scottish ballad "My ain fire side." The quintet from the opera of Lucia—"Chi mi frena," was rendered with great precision by Miss Cruise, Miss Herbert, Messrs. O'Rorke, Tracy, Smith, and William Talbot, with full chorus. We should not omit to mention the brilliant solo of Herr Ellsner on the violoncello. His execution of a difficult fantasia was marked by extreme sweetness and delicacy of touch as well as by a happy style, peculiarly his own, in the rendering of harmonic passages. Herr Ellsner was loudly and cordially applauded. One of the gems of the concert was Mrs. B. Mullen's song "Whither." It was sung by Miss Julia Cruise with pathos and feeling, and enthusiastically encored.

IBID.—The University Choral Society's Concert took place on the 17th instant; the programme was made up of Jephtha, the last oratorio of Handel; Spohr's 84th Psalm (first time in Ireland); Mozart's motet "Ave verum corpus" (adapted to English words), and also his fugued chorus "Pignus futuræ" (from the Liturgy in B), together with the following pieces by Mendelssohn, "Da nobis pacem," "It is enough" (Elijah); "Be thou faithful" (St. Paul); three sacred songs with chorus, from the catalogue of Simrock, in Bonn, adapted to English words, by Mr. Broadley. Mr. Lockey was brought on to sing the tenor music; the soprano and bass were allotted to Miss Julia Cruise and Mr. R. Smith, of Dublin; Dr. Stewart conducted. As so much interest seems just now to be felt in Dr. Spohr's music at your side of the Channel, it will be pleasing to you to hear that his "Hymn to St. Cecilia," which was produced at the previous University Concert, and the 84th Psalm at the present one, were given with effect, and were hailed as great additions to the stock of available choral music.

BELFAST ANACREONTIC SOCIETY.—The concluding concert of the forty-seventh season of this musical association took place on Thursday evening, the 19th instant. On this occasion the committee had decided that no professional musician, who was not connected with the society, should be engaged. The orchestra was conducted by Her Leo Kerbusch, with his usual ability, and played Romberg's symphony in E flat. The overture (Jessonda), by Spohr; overture, L'Italiana in Algeri, and the coronation march from Le Prophète. There was a solo for the piano, one for the flute, one for violoncello, and one for the saxophone, all of which were highly applauded by the audience. There were also several glees and a chorus, a vocal quartet and some songs, the entire being performed most creditably by the members of the society, and received with great approbation. The music hall was completely filled with a distinguished and attentive auditory.

CHATHAM.—On Monday evening, Mr. Gilbert, of Maidstone, gave a performance of his new oratorio St John, at the Lecture Hall, under the patronage of the High Constable of Chatham, Captain Brock and the Chatham Volunteers; there were also several of the Rochester Corps present. We must congratulate Mr. Gilbert upon his oratorio, of which he may justly be proud. There are many beautiful choruses, amongst which we would more particularly mention, "That was the true light," "His fulness have we all received," "In all thy ways." "He that believeth not the Son," "Great is the Lord," "I will sing unto the Lord," "The Lord is righteous." Miss Stabbach was suffering from a severe cold, but sung several recitatives and airs in excellent style, amongst which were, "There was a man," "He came to bear witness," "And the Angel said unto him," "And thou child shall be called," "Jesus began to say unto the multitude," "What went ye out into the wilderness for to see," and "Thou wilt keep them in perfect peace," Mr. Armes, lay-clerk of Rochester Cathedral, sang "He was in the world," "He came to his own," (recit. and air), and "O generation of vipers" (recit. and air) was deservedly encored. Mr. Taylor sang several recitatives and airs in a pleasing manner, but he appeared to be suffering from a cold. The orchestra and chorus consisted of about fifty, amongst whom were several of the choristers of Rochester Cathedral, and the admirable manner in which the various choruses were given reflects great credit upon all who took part in them.—Maidstone Journal.

MAIDSTONE.—THE NEW ORATORIO.—The new oratorio, entitled St. John, composed by Mr. W. B. Gilbert, of this town, organist of All Saints, was performed on Friday evening, at the Corn Exchange, and we are happy to say with, on the whole, decided success. The spacious apartment was filled in every part, and most of the leading families of Maidstone and its vicinity were present. As there were amongst the audience many gentlemen of acknowledged standing in the musical world, a more competent tribunal to judge of the production of our townsmen could not be desired. The orchestra included 107 performers, and the principal singers were Miss Stabbach, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. Armes, assisted by the members of the Maidstone and the Rochester and Chatham Choral societies. The bands also of the Depôt and of the Royal Engineers added much to the efficiency of the instrumental department. The words of the oratorio are almost exclusively those of Scripture, and the whole interest therefore, rests upon the music—the particular passages of Holy Writ being wedded, as it were, to music of a character which produces in the mind similar ideas. Thus the music of the passages "What went ye out into the wilderness for to see? —a reed shaken by the wind! &c.," would convey to the mind ideas at once of the fickleness of popular favour, and the nobility and grandeur of the prophet's character as described by our Saviour—"Yea, and much more than a prophet." The opening movement in D, which introduces the chorus—"Behold, God will send you Elijah"—both of which were well performed—brings the subject on the stage with a solemn dignity which well befits the lofty mission of the Forerunner. We do not, however, propose to go through the whole oratorio—our space will permit us only to notice the execution of the various parts and choruses. Mentioning, then, that Mr. Lockey's first piece "And he shall turn the hearts of the fathers, &c., was well sung, and at once produced a favourable idea of the composer's success in the solo parts, which was by no means weakened by the way in which Miss Stabbach rendered the really beautiful music of "There was a man sent from God." From this moment the failure of the oratorio was out of the question; and when the first part closed with "And thou, Child," splendidly sung by Miss Stabbach, and the chorus "To give light to them that sit in darkness," &c., both very striking compositions, the plaudits of the assembly announced its perfect triumph. The second part, opening with an adagio movement, introduces a recitative "The word of God," and the aria "O generation of vipers!" both of which were sung most effectively by Mr. Armes, and which deserve special notice. The chorus "And now the axe," is a beautiful composition, and was most effectively sung, and which we were surprised did not obtain an encore. In this part Mr. Lockey sang two arias and a recitative, which were much applauded. The recitative given by him "And Herod laid hold of John," introduced the "Funeral march," which must be spoken of in terms of great satisfaction. It is most expressive and solemn, and had the advantage of being admirably performed. The recitative aria "What went ye out for to see?" sung by Miss Stabbach, was admirable; and the selection of those eulogistic words of our Lord following the final scene in the life of St. John appeared to come in most appropriately, as, indeed, did all the succeeding selections. In this part, however, we must give the pre-eminence to the aria "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace," and the chorus "The Lord is righteous in all his ways." The oratorio of St. John will, we doubt not, at once take a good place amongst the standard compositions of the English school. It has many beauties, and but few faults. Some of the choruses appeared to us to want breadth; and there were one or two parts open to criticism, but as they suffered from defects in the rendering, we pass them over. These, however, were exceptional faults, and on the whole the performance was excellent. We trust that Mr. Gilbert will give us another opportunity of hearing this beautiful composition.—Maidstone Journal.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—To-Morrow (Saturday), First Night of IL DON GIOVANNI. On Tuesday, May 8, will be performed (for the first time this season) Bellini's opera of NORMA. Pollione, Signor Mongini; Oroveso, Signor Vialetti; Flavio, Signor Soldi; Adalgisa, Mdlle. Vaneri; and Norma, Mdlle. Titiens. To conclude with the new Ballet Divertissement, in which Mdlle. Pocchini, Mdlle. Morlacchi, and M. Durand will appear. On Thursday, May 10, will be repeated (second time this season) Mozart's chef-d'œuvre, Il Don Giovanni, with the powerful cast of to-morrow. Mdlle. Maria Brunetti has arrived, and will make her first appearance on Saturday, May 12. Box-office open daily from 10 to 5.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—First Night of DON GIOVANNI—Titiens, Borghi-Mamo, Vaneri, Everadi, Vialetti, and Giuglini.—To-morrow Evening, May 5, will be performed (for the first time this season) Mozart's chef-d'œuvre, IL DON GIOVANNI, with the following cast: Donna Anna, Mdlle. Titiens; Donna Elvira, Mdlle Vaneri (her first appearance this season); Zerlina, Madame Borghi-Mamo (her eighth appearance in this country); Don Giovanni, Signor Everardi; Leporello, Signor Vialetti; Masetto, Signor Aldighieri; Il Commendatore, Signor Castelli; and Don Ottavio, Signor Giuglini. Conductor—M. Benedict. The Minuet will be danced by Mdlle. Pocchini and Mdlle. Morlacchi. Pit tickets, 8s. 6d.; gallery stalls, 5s.; gallery, 3s. The opera will commence at 8 o'clock.

JULLIEN FUND.

THE illness of M. Jullien having, with fatal rapidity, terminated in death, it has been resolved that the donations to the JULLIEN FUND shall be applied in the manner which would have been most in consonance with the wishes of the deceased, had it been permitted him to express them, viz., to the relief of his widow and family, who, by his loss, are left totally unprovided for.

Committee for the distribution of the Jullien Fund.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 5TH, 1860.

IT is generally conceived that the year 1860 will make everybody's fortune. In our musical sphere this persuasion obtains more strongly, perhaps, than in any other. With how much reason time will show. For our own part, we have no great faith in the result. Out of the vast tribe of foreign artists who project a trip to London, during the period of the Great Orpheonic Gathering at the Crystal Palace, how many will return home satisfied? How many indeed, will realise even so much as would amount to the expense of their journey here and back? A contemporary prints a list of composers, singers, and instrumental performers who have expressed their intention of coming to London this season. We shall not reproduce it, since it would occupy nearly a column of our space, and further, because the advent of not a few of them is, to use a mild expression, apocryphal. Imagine Mdlle. Clauss, Madame Schumann, Mdlle. Marie Wieck, Liszt, Leopold de Meyer, Rubinstein, Lubeck, Thalberg, Henselt, Dreyschock, Döhler, Wilmers, Bulow, Prudent, &c., all in London at the same time! What an army of pianists hors ligne! What a shower of fantasias.

But where will they give their concerts?—where find their pianos? Ay, and where find their audiences? When they come—if come they do—they will find the Hanover-square Rooms, and Willis's Rooms, and Wornum's Rooms, and Blagrove's Rooms, and the Princess's Concert Room, and Collard's new Concert Room, and Exeter Hall, and St. James's Hall, and St. Martin's Hall, and even Crosby Hall, already engaged for entertainments of various kinds well nigh up to the end of September. The "natives" will have forestalled them. They cannot hire a church, like Barnum. Mr. Gye will not let them Covent Garden, nor Mr. E. T. Smith Her Majesty's Theatre; while the last-named impresario keeps the keys of Drury Lane, doubtless ruminating, even at the present moment, on some gigantic scheme, some embryo triumph of his teeming imagination, which, once busy, acts upon events as the Sun of old upon the muddy Chaos, breeding monsters.

Allowing all the music-rooms of London to be open to their disposal, where, we repeat, are their pianos? Will Broadwood, or Collard, or Erard, with generous zeal, submit their instruments to the wear and tear of ninety fingers, each as finger as ten? It is scarcely probable. Enough to withstand the brunt of one lion-pianist at a time, as any tuner will attest. The hammers themselves would rebel at the reiterated thumps, and, not waiting to be disabled, refuse to assail the wires; while the sounding-board, struck mute with wonder, would cease to be a conductor—like the haunted Rhenish cliff, under the influence of a thunder-storm.*

However, to drop metaphor, let the pianofortes be accorded. Broadwood empties his vast manufactory of its choicest wares; Erard sends to the Paris establishment for foreign reinforcements: allow this for argument's sake; and where are the audiences?

Some new Madame Pleyel, in all probability, would "make the town run," as the French say (faire courir la ville), as the famous pianist, of then not more than thirty summers, did in 1846, and divert the attention of some thousands of amateurs from the doings in the Park and Rotten-row. But Madame Pleyel, who was a handsome woman, and a woman of esprit, her prototype, without venturing on comparisons, which might tell equally in her favour, would have the game all to herself. The remaining pianists, unless inclined to exhibit themselves as "echantillons" of modern mechanical skill, at the Scientific Department in the Crystal Palace, would be compelled to walk about London with their hands in their pockets, or to give lessons to aristocratic young ladies, ambitious to shine in the drawing-room, by scrambling through impossible fantasias, for the edification of their friends, admirers, and parents. It is true, this pays better than concert giving; but there is no glory in it, and a "lion" biped without glory, is no better than a lion quadruped without a tail.

We shall not discuss the claims of the violinists, vocalists, harpists, flautists, cornists, oboists, trombonists, violoncellists, contrabassists, &c., who are all packing up their instruments and preparing for England. Let them rest assured, however, that the only part they will be able to play, in the great gathering, will be the simple one of spectators. If they be fond of sight-seeing let them come. But, if they look for gold in exchange for their notes, let them go to Australia, where the "diggins" hard by will doubtless present a far more curious spectacle than anything to be found in the Crystal Palace. If one out of twenty return home richer than he came—if one out of ten do not find himself poorer—if one out of five can boast of having earned a hundred pounds—or if one alone be lucky enough to reap a harvest worth his "travel" and his honour, we consent to break our wand, like Mother Goose, scatter the pieces to the winds, and give up prophesying. Time will show.

"SUBLIME Nature! when we see thee and love thee, we more warmly love our fellow men; and if we are compelled to mourn or forget them, thou remainest near us, reposing before our tearful eyes, like a verdant chain of mountains tinted with the ruddy hue of evening. Ah, for the soul that has seen the morning dew of its ideal change into a cold dreary rain; and for the heart that, in the subterranean passages of this life, regards the men it meets as dried crooked mummies leaning upon their staff in a catacomb; and for the eye, that is bereaved and deserted, so that the sight of no human being can give it joy; and for the haughty son of the gods, whom his unfaith and his solitary unsympathetic heart, have riveted to an eternal irradicable pain; for all these, dost thou, invigorating Nature, with thy flowers, and thy mountains, and thy cataracts, stand as a faithful consoler, and the bleeding son of the gods mutely and coldly dashes the drop of pain from his eyes, that they may repose brightly and broadly upon thy volcanoes, and thy springs, and thy suns."

The above rhapsody, which is translated with tolerable fidelity from the "Titan" of Jean Paul, was uttered by Panurge, in no very low tone of voice, as he stalked through Great St. Andrew's-street, and felt his ears titillated and his heart refreshed by the songs of the innumerable warblers that decorated the doors and windows of the bird-fanciers. Another manifestation of nature was the strong scent of the rabbits and guinea-pigs, that inhabited the same premises, very comfortable to his nostrils. Of such consolations did he stand greatly in need, for his life, and the life of all our friends had been much less happy since the discovery of Carpimon,—who had a very ugly habit of borrowing small sums, and if he had set his mind on half-a-crown or half-a-sovereign, would resort, not only to supplications, but even to tears and menaces, in order to gain his object. At one time, his favourite menace was of suicide, and he threatened, in the presence of Pantagruel, to swallow a dose of prussic acid, on a stern refusal of the latter to advance him 15*s.* 6*d.*; but Pantagruel's conviction, that Carpimon's self-extermination would be rather desirable than otherwise, was so strongly expressed in every line of his princely countenance, and so completely were the views of their master entertained by Panurge and Epistemon, that Carpimon abandoned this mode of proceeding as diametrically opposite to his interests. Instead of the prussic acid, which, by the way, was only a solution of cream of tartar, he would now produce the first six books of his epic poem "King Lud," which opened:—

and begin to read it aloud in an exceedingly dolorous voice, till his unhappy auditors were fain to purchase their freedom at his own price. It was just after enduring five hundred lines of "King Lud," and buying himself off from the rest with half a-crown, from which he had promised himself many plates, pints, and quarterns of exquisite enjoyment, that Panurge began to "Jean-Paulize" in the manner above described.

With what amazing facility can everybody fit the words of a favourite author to his own case! When Lobscum-Briggs, Esquire, sees the well-known lines of Horace:

"Exegi monumentum ære perennius."

he thinks it perfectly applicable to his own farce, though the week's duration of that miserable production was simply occasioned by the economy of the manager, who would not incur the expense of printing a new bill. And in the same manner did the rhapsody of Jean Paul, though supposed to be uttered on one of the islands in the Lago Maggiore, seem to Panurge a perfectly apt expression of his thoughts, as he wandered through the lovely, but less romantic region of Seven Dials. He was himself the son of the gods, and Carpimon was the incarnation of all the woes for which nature was to supply a balm. Thus, while the half-crown was the morning-dew of the ideal, the expenditure of that precious coin by Carpimon was its conversion into an unseemly drizzle. Carpimon waiting on the mat, was the crutched mummy in the catacomb; indeed worse than the mummy, for the stick which he invariably carried seemed to have been procured, not so much for the support of his person, as with a view to the enforcement of his demands. Carpimon was also one of those human beings, the sight of whom affords no joy.

Followed by a considerable train of blackguard boys, who composed a perpetual, but by no means elucidatory, comment on his loudly expressed thoughts, Panurge at length reached the Edinburgh Castle, where he found Pantagruel and Epistemon, with a mild, dignified sorrow written on their countenances. Two days, at least, had elapsed, since the former had lent ten shillings, the latter eighteen-pence, to Carpimon, and they had therefore had time to sooth their aching hearts with the balm of philosophy.

* Lorelei, on the Rhine, celebrated for its echo, and which promised to acquire a still higher renown, had Mendelssohn lived to complete the opera which was to bear its name.

"What a lovely unanimity exists in the mind of America!" said Epistemon, with an amiable sigh.

"Dost thou allude to the last fight in Congress, and to the universal delight in riot there manifested?" asked Panurge.

"No, I allude to those American farces, which are supposed to enlighten us as to the female peculiarities of New England. Here we have a new comic drama at the Adelphi, wherein Miss Julia Daly playeth a Yankee gal, and it looketh to me exactly like some dozen farces in which Mrs. Barney Williams appeared, and which were all exactly like one another, and also like the play, in which Mrs. Florence first introduced us to the State of Maine. The "Yankee Gal," by whomever played, also goeth through precisely the same functions. She is ignorant of the conventionalities of life, and she inculcateth the belief that her own ignorance is superior to the knowledge by which she is surrounded. She telleth a too-forward lover to "git out," she half-frighteneth and half-amuseth an old gentleman, she persecuteth a fop, she discourseth largely of Jerusalem and molasses, and she endureth not contradiction. Whatever be her name she doeth exactly the same things, and meeteth exactly the same personages. Now I am convinced that the countless farces in which this type appeareth do not owe their similarity to each other to any imitative process, but that they are the result of a certain community of mind that existeth among American dramatists. Thou hast heard perchance of the doctrine of Averrhoës, to the effect that we have not separate souls, but are, as it were, so many oozings of a grand universal soul"——

"And a cursed heresy it is!" exclaimed Panurge. "Dost thou think that I could ever espouse a theory that made me the partner in a soul with such as thou art. Dost thou think I will term thee 'Animæ dimidium meæ.' Monstrous!"

"Believe me, I shrink from the partnership quite as readily as thou," replied Epistemon, gravely. "I limit my Averrhoëism to the case of the American dramatists, not having any other hypothesis to account for. the marvellous phenomenon to which I have just referred."

"There is much in what thou sayest," said Panurge. "I know not why a soul should not be in half-a-dozen places at once, when we know this is possible with a body. Our own archives prove that at the very moment, when Carpimon was borrowing 3*s.* 6*d.* of me in St. Martin's Lane, he was cajoling thee out of 1*s.* 4*d.* within view of Whitechapel church."

"And reading his accursed epic to me at Deptford," added Pantagruel.

"That day should be marked after the fashion of the ancients, with the very blackest of stones," sighed Panurge. "It was doubtless the anniversary of the occasion on which the churl planted the tree, that was within an ace of breaking the head of Horace."

"And if there be any truth in the Pythagorean doctrine of transmigration," said Epistemon, "that churl was Carpimon:

> "'Illum et parentis crediderim sui
> Fregisse cervicem, et penetralia
> Sparsisse nocturno amore > Hospitis.'"

"But while we theorize about this similarity of American farces," said Pantagruel, "let us not omit the opportunity of paying our tribute of commendation to the very original actress who is now performing at the Adelphi. Though Miss Julia Daly speaketh words, and appeareth in situations that we have heard and seen over and over again, yet do I find something entirely novel and unborrowed in the mode of her delineation. She rather subdueth than heighteneth the caricatures of her own countrywomen, it is her mission to embody, but she is ever pointed and shrewd, and though she plainly indicateth the presence of that strong will, which belongeth to the New England ideal, yet doth she deport herself, not like the torrent that recklessly upsetteth every obstacle, but rather like the calm stream, that quietly weareth its way, even through granite. I find in her a mild intelligence that qualifieth greatly the coarseness of the parts she represents, and is particularly soothing and refreshing to my mind, suffering as it is under the irritation produced by the accursed Carpimon. Let us, therefore, bring this discourse, which is somewhat of the dullest, to a close, and proceed to the Adelphi Theatre, that we may witness once more the performance of Miss Julia Daly."

THE Illustrated Times published last week a portrait of Madame Borghi-Mamo, accompanied by an article which was in the form of a memoir, but, in substance, was an examination and eulogium of that artist's talent. Some interesting particulars in Madame Borghi-Mamo's life have since reached us, which, instead of forwarding to our contemporary (to whom, for the rest, they would probably be of no use), we keep for the benefit of our own readers.

Madame Borghi-Mamo—or rather Mdlle. Borghi—manifested at a very early age a genius for dramatic singing. She was not twelve years old, when, having taken her to a representation of Rossini's Tancredi, her parents were astonished on the following morning to hear her repeat all the most striking melodies from that opera, among which we may be sure the celebrated "Di tanti palpiti" was not forgotten. Nor did the little girl recollect the music alone. Every scene, with the dramatic action appropriate to each, had impressed itself upon her memory; and a few days after this visit to the Opéra, which must be regarded as one of the most important events in Mdlle. Borghi's life, her father and mother, returning home unexpectedly, found their drawing-room converted into a theatre, and their child declaiming and singing on that portion of it which represented the stage.

The youthful Adelaide's passion for the Opéra was so evident, that her parents, who had no sort of liking for theatrical pursuits, resolved, if they could not restrain it, at least to do nothing that could in any way stimulate it. But Adelaide studied in secret, and, one happy day, succeeded in prevailing upon a friend to take her to the house of Rossini, where the great master heard her sing several of his compositions, himself accompanying her on the piano. The young artist—which by instinct and intelligence she already was—trembled with excitement, as she awaited the decision of the illustrious composer respecting her capabilities and chances of success in the career for which she felt so strong a vocation. Rossini did not keep her long in suspense, but, embracing her affectionately, said with enthusiasm—"You will one day be a great singer!"

The Borghi family, however, seemed determined to prevent little Adelaide from following the path she had chosen. Rossini was informed of this, and consoled the interesting aspirant by explaining to her that her parents, when they became sensible of her great talent, would see the propriety of abandoning her resolution. They were more inflexible, however, than the maestro had supposed, and did their utmost to impede the child in what was really the fulfilment of her destiny.

Adelaide Borghi's passion for singing was so strong, and it was so obstinately thwarted by her father and mother, that the consequence was a nervous fever, beneath which the poor girl was near succumbing. In her delirium she constantly repeated the name of Rossini, and exclaimed, in accents of despair, that he had told her she never would be a great singer. Adelaide's interview with Rossini appears to have been kept a secret from her relations; but the doctor, finding that her brain was tormented with ideas which Rossini alone could dispel, called upon the composer, who lost no time in returning with him to his patient's bedside. There he repeated to her, again and again, that she would indeed be a great singer, and his assurances and general kindness had the effect of allaying the delirium of the sick child. Rossini then convinced the parents of the inutility, not to say cruelty, of ignoring—from a feeling which, however conscientious, was, after all, but a prejudice—an inclination that was irresistible, and which, properly directed, might lead to the happiest results.

Thus the admirers of Borghi-Mamo owe a double debt of gratitude to Rossini; first, because it was in his operas that she learnt to sing; secondly, because, but for Rossini's personal influence and interference, she would probably never have lived to be, in his own words, "a great singer."

After opposing their daughter's wishes until it was unreasonable to do so any longer, Adelaide's father and mother showed their parental affection by carefully watching over her during the difficult period of her débûts. She had been singing, however, only a few years when she lost them both, and she was already an orphan, then in Malta, where she had a three years' engagement to fulfil, when she accepted the hand of M. Mamo, a member of one of the most respectable families in the island. Madame Borghi-Mamo left the Malta Theatre, where she had very lucrative "appointments," for the Scala at Milan. Here she received a smaller salary, but at once established a reputation which has since become European.

For several years after her first appearance, Mdlle. Borghi, naturally of a delicate fragile organisation, was so slender, being at the same time somewhat diminutive in stature, and her voice was so powerful, that she used to say of herself "La Borghi is heard, but is not seen." Fortunately however, she is heard and seen too, for she is not only one of the most accomplished singers, but also one of the finest actresses on the lyric stage.

LEIPSIC.—SUCCESS OF ENGLISH MUSICIANS IN GERMANY—(From a Correspondent).—At the great public performance given by the Conservatorium of Leipzig in the Saale des Gewandhauses, on Monday evening, the 23rd April, in the presence of 2,000 persons, amongst whom were the most distinguished of the professors and dilettanti of Germany; the two daughters of the English composer, John Barnett, carried away all the honours of the institution, both for their performance upon the piano and their singing. The eldest has already been mentioned by the Press for her fine contralto voice and great promise as a vocaliste. The Leipziger Journal of the 24th April, and the Allgemeine Zeitung of the 26th, bestow the most flattering encomiums upon these two young ladies' performance. They were both recalled—and at the termination of the concert, received public acknowledgments from the directors, a compliment which has never before been paid to any pupil of the Conservatorium.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

THE first performance of Lucrezia Borgia, on Friday night last week, although not belonging to the subscription, attracted a full attendance. Signor Everardi was the Duke; Signor Mongini, Gennaro; and Madame Borghi-Mamo Maffeo Orsini. Mdlle. Titiens' Lucrezia was as grand as ever. Her "M' odi, m' odi," in the last act, as an example of brilliant vocalisation, could hardly be surpassed. Signor Mongini was eminently successful, and earned well-merited laurels in an interpolated air (Act III.). which was enthusiastically encored. Madame Borghi-Mamo was, of course, obliged to repeat the brindisi, which she sang with the utmost animation. The trio in the second act (Lucrezia, Gennaro and Alfonso), "Guai se ti fuggi," was, as usual, encored. Lucrezia Borgia was repeated on Thursday, this time Signor Vialetti representing the Duke.

On Saturday Almina was performed for the second time, and on Monday, for the third and last time—the occasion being Mdlle. Piccolomini's farewell appearance. The theatre was not so crowded as might have been expected. Every place, however, was paid for, and the stalls, pit, amphitheatre, and gallery, were filled. It is to be regretted that Mdlle. Piccolomini did not take her leave in the Traviata, with which she has so closely identified herself. Had Signor Verdi's opera been given, the house, we have no doubt, would have been crammed. The heroine of the evening, notwithstanding, had no reason to be discontented with her reception. The applause was genuine and legitimate, the display of bouquets tremendous, while wreaths, laurels, and garlands were not wanting. At one time, indeed, Mdlle. Piccolomini had to call in the aid of Signors Giuglini and Aldighieri, to assist her in carrying off the floral contributions. But the climax was not reached until after the duet from the Martiri, which terminated the performance, and in which Mdlle. Piccolomini and Signor Giuglini created a furore, the last movement being encored with vehement applause. The audience now became furiously enthusiastic, and called for Mdlle. Piccolomini oftener than we remember, each time covering the stage with bouquets. Mdlle. Piccolomini contrived at last to make her escape, and the curtain was drawn for ever between her and the public.

Mdlle. Piccolomini's career has been equally brilliant and unaccountable. Perhaps no artist with such slender means ever before achieved so great a reputation. That a good deal of the sensation must be attributed to her energy and command of expression will be admitted; but still more, we fancy, should be referred to the entire originality of her style. It was impossible to compare her with any one else, and thus she was exempt from a judicial process often dangerous to questionable reputations. Mdlle. Piccolomini may not perhaps be greatly missed from the lyric boards; but years are likely to elapse before so decided a favourite with the general public is seen again. For our own parts we are sorry to lose her, since, whatever her short-comings, she had undoubted genius, and this, allied to youth and indomitable will, might in the end have made her a thorough artist.

Otello was given for the second time on Tuesday, and attracted a full attendance. Madame Borghi-Mamo sang even better than on the first night, and was again rapturously encored in "Assisa à pie d' un salice." Signor Mongini (Otello), was as striking and vigorous as before, and the quick movement of the duet, "Non m' inganno," with Signor Everardi (Iago)—was encored with acclamations.

Don Giovanni is announced for to-night—Signor Everardi as the hero; Madame Borghi-Mamo as Zerlina; Mdlle. Vaneri, Elvira; Mdlle. Titiens, Donna Anna; Signor Vialetti, Leporello; Signor Aldighieri, Masetto; and Signor Giuglini, Don Ottavio.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

ON Saturday, La Favorita was given for the second time. The performance offered no new feature, with the exception that Signor Mario sang with greater command of voice than on Tuesday.

On Tuesday, Fra Diavolo, presented for the first time since 1858, brought back Sig. Ronconi as Lord Allcash. The cast has undergone some changes, Mad. Miolan-Carvalho being substituted for Mad. Bosio in Zerlina, and Mdlle. Corbari for Mdlle. Marai in Lady Allcash. The other characters are sustained as before. While some parts of the opera went to perfection, we confess to have heard a better performance of Fra Diavolo at the Royal Italian Opera. Mad. Miolan-Carvalho feeling, perhaps, the responsibility of coming immediately after Mad. Bosio in one of that lamented singer's best parts, and consequently did not do her eminent talents justice. Nevertheless, she evidenced her supremacy as a bravura singer of the French school, and created the greatest sensation of the evening, in an interpolated air (Act II.), her execution of which for brilliancy and fluency could not be surpassed, and which obtained the only encore of the evening. Why the original air in this scene, however, should be rejected, we are at a loss to conceive, as it is one of the most beautiful in the opera.

Signor Ronconi's Lord Allcash is not only one of the most remarkable impersonations of modern comedy, but certainly the most varied. It is no use specifying its points on any given nights; the next performance presents something entirely new and undreamt of. It is, however, invariably artistic, and, although occasionally exaggerated, irresistibly comic. To describe what Signor Ronconi did on Tuesday might only lead to expectations never to be gratified, so seldom does he repeat himself. We need say no more than that his acting was never more instinct with fun and drollery, and that the audience was kept in a roar of laughter wherever he was on the stage. Sig. Ronconi modified in some respects the costume of the English nobleman. The last dress, as a caricature of the outré taste of some English travellers, is a masterpiece.

Signor Gardoni sang the music of the Marquis with exceeding grace and finish, and acted with his accustomed ease and intelligence. He gave the serenade "Young Agnes," with infinite sweetness, and was applauded with the warmth due to his merits. Mdlle. Corbari is by far the best Lady Allcash we have seen. She not only sings the music more effectively, conscientiously adhering to the text of the composer, but acts with greater animation and esprit, and looks the pseudo fashionable lady to the life, assuming languishing airs and graces when in repose with true artistic instincts, in every instance displaying an amount of dramatic intelligence for which she has not hitherto been credited. The Giacomo of M. Zelger, the Beppo of Signor Tagliafico (two such thieves are almost enough to engender a certain degree of respect for the profession), and the Matteo of Signor Polonini were, as usual, incomparable in their way; and Signor Neri-Baraldi was correct and painstaking in the music of Lorenzo. The saltarello in the third act was danced to perfection by Mdlle. Zina Richard and her associates.

The house was full, though not crowded, but the applause was hardly so enthusiastic as might have been desired by the lovers of the greatest masterpiece of the Opéra-Comique. Why, too, was the overture taken so fast, from end to end?

CRYSTAL PALACE.

GRAND PERFORMANCE OF MENDELSSOHN'S "ELIJAH."

MANY and various were the opinions expressed as to the result (musically speaking) of the performance of Elijah by an orchestra and chorus on the Handel Festival scale. The work itself, containing some of the broadest and most colossal choruses extant, would, it was universally admitted, gain much by the multiplicity of performers, but the delicacy and intricacy of the greater part of the work would prevent the version of the "Three Thousand" attaining its proper effect, and the audience (of about 20,000) would not do justice to a masterpiece of the last giant of the art, as it is far removed from the ad captandum style of writing, which, generally, obtains with the masses, as it is possible for a creation of unshackled genius to be. These three of the multifarious expectations were exactly realised. The performance of both band and choruses was beyond all praise; the "Help Lord" and its clear transparent coda "The deeps afford," the bold "Yet doth the Lord," and the solid and sublime mountain of harmonic effect, "For He the Lord our God;" the melodious and graceful "Blessed are the men;" the three "Baal" choruses; and the hymn of joy, "Thanks be to God," were done with an effect unsurpassable. Yet the instrumental parts of these pieces were in many places undistinguishable by the audience, which was, despite the deficiency, of a remarkably apathetic character on this occasion. The choruses of the second part, which are among the most difficult passages ever written for a large body, were, to the musical ear, the most effective achievements of the day. This alone shows that no further practice of the choir will do more for the work. The "He watching over Israel" and "Behold God the Lord" were very striking, the one from its delicacy and the other from its difficulty.

The soloists exerted themselves to a degree commensurate with the area. Mdlle. Parepa was particularly successful in the enormous room. Her "Hear ye, Israel," deserves particular notice, as it is with us a test, and a severe one, of a singer, being the most splendid piece ever written for a soprano voice. She has fully appreciated its grandeur; and, after a few more times of performance, will vocalise it better than at this, her first attempt. Madame Sainton-Dolby delivers the Jezebel recitatives "O, rest in the Lord," as she alone can. The whole range of musical expression is within her grasp; in all, from the tragedy Queen of Ahab to the soothing notes of the Angel, Madame Sainton is unapproachable. The encores awarded by the elsewhere unenthusiastic listeners were to the last-named aria, and to "Then shall the righteous." Mr. Sims Reeves, the only tenor singer living who can produce an effect on so large an audience, was more than ever admirable. In the two airs written for him, he was inimitable; and his recitative delivery was as forcible as ever. The prophet, by Signor Belletti, well sustains his great reputation as a master of the vocal art. The quartets and minor pieces were done by the clever and musicianly Miss Fanny Rowland, Miss Palmer, of the rich voice, Mr. Lewis Thomas, our real bass, and almost our only one.

What shall we say then? That Elijah is more effective in Exeter Hall than at Sydenham, granted; but we would not have missed the performance yesterday for any temptation that might offer. It is still, as ever, the grandest production of a mind replete with the experience of all who had gone before, of a genius the most original and prolific, of an invention the most ingenious. It will always rival any work we have by any composer whatsoever; and as a masterpiece of instrumental management and colouring, it stands alone.

In the evening the statue of Mendelssohn was unveiled, and a poor affair it is; and a selection from his works was performed by a military band, with some peculiarities as to tempo that were in keeping with the sculptor's achievement.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

THE programme of last Monday was not only quite as unexceptionable as any of its predecessors, but had the additional recommendation of novelty in its favour, no less than four pieces out of the eight being presented for the first time at the Monday Popular Concerts, and one, indeed, for the first time in this country. The directors are earnestly working the rich and apparently inexhaustible vein of good music, much of which has but too long been neglected, under a false notion that the public is incapable of appreciating anything more elevated than ad captandum "odds and ends." However, we may safely say, nous avons changé tout celà and most effectually indeed have we changed it, so far as the Monday audiences at St. James's Hall are concerned.

The Concert opened with a welcome novelty. Dussek's stringed quartet in E flat, which had never before been heard in England, executed to perfection by Messrs. Becker, Ries, Doyle, and Piatti. It was listened to with profound attention, and the applause at the end of each movement showed how thoroughly the work was enjoyed. The other two quartets from the same pen are equally interesting, and equally worthy of the attention of the directors. Flourishing at an eventful period in the history of music, a contemporary of Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, besides being the centre of a circle of pianists, the most illustrious of whom were Clementi, John Cramer, Field, Stiebelt, Woelfl and Pinto, Dussek easily assumed the position to which his talents entitled him; and now that the public of the present day are beginning to be familiarised with his music, we have little doubt that the name of Dussek will speedily become as well known to lovers of classical music, as that of more modern composers. The term "genial" has been much hacknied (tabooed under a fine in some quarters); yet there is no other that so well expresses the character of Dussek's music, and nowhere is it more forcibly illustrated than by the stringed quartet in E flat, stamped as it is with an individual freshness, combined with perfect scholarship, delightful no less to the uninitiated amateur than to the connoisseur and professed musician. The remaining novelties were the recitative and air of Mozart's, and "Non so donde viede," sung by Mdme. Sainton-Dolby, with the genuine feeling of an artist. Beethoven's sonata in D, Op. 10, No. 3, for pianoforte played (without book) with masterly skill, by Mr. Charles Hallé. Mozart's sonata in B flat, for piano and violin (No 15),(the one composed for Mlle. Strinasacchi, under the romantic circumstances narrated in Oulibicheff's Biography), in which M. Hallé associated with Herr Becker, gave a reading, which left nothing to be desired, and Mr. Hatton's "Day and Night," sung by Mdme. Sainton-Dolby in her most effective manner. M. Hallé and Herr Becker were recalled at the end of Mozart's sonata.

By special desire, Mr. Sims Reeves repeated the recitative and air from Jephtah, which had caused so marked a sensation at his benefit. Anything more touching than the pathos infused into the recitative, "Deeper and deeper still," and the air, "Waft her, angels, through the skies," it would be impossible to imagine. An enthusiastic recall was the result. Again did Mr. Reeves entrance his hearers with that bouquet melody of flowers, Beethoven's Lieder Kreis, as Schumann says, "the deepest, most soulful, most wonderful of love-songs,"—with whom for once in a way, we can cordially agree. Beethoven's trio in E flat (No. 1) brought this capital concert to a close. This was also given for the first time, and its reception should encourage an immediate reference to the other three.

Next Monday, the performance will be exclusively from the works of Mendelssohn; Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Charles Hallé, M. Sainton, and the London Glee and Madrigal Union being engaged.

AMATEUR MUSICAL SOCIETY.

THE crowded state of our columns will not allow us to do more than briefly chronicle the proceedings of last Monday evening. The following was the selection:—

PART I.—Symphony, in D—Beethoven. Song, "The beating of my own heart," Miss Fanny Rowland—G. A. Macfarren. Trio, for violin, violoncello, and contrabasso, No. 5, Hon. Seymour Egerton, Mr. Henry Robley, and Rev. Dr. Rowden—Handel. Glee, "Once upon my cheek," Miss Fosbroke, Mrs. Dixon, Mr. Henry Regaldi, and Mr. Hodson—Callcott. Aria, "Casta Diva" (Norma), Madlle. Werner—Bellini. Overture (Ruy Blas), Mendelssohn.

PART II.—Concerto, in G minor, for the Pianoforte (Pianoforte, Madame Piatti)—Mendelssohn. Song, with Chorus, "Onward," Miss Fanny Rowland—Hon. W. Ashley. Aria (Stabat Mater), cornet-à-piston, Mr. A. B. Mitford—Rossini. National Swedish Melodies, Madlle. Werner. Glee, "My love is like the red, red rose"—W. Knyvett. Overture (Le Part du Diable)—Auber.

Conductor—Mr. Henry Leslie.

Madame Piatti fairly astonished us by her admirable performance of Mendelssohn's Concerto, for we had no notion she possessed such talent as she displayed. She was much applauded, and most deservedly so.

The only other feature calling for particular notice was the charming singing of the glee party.

The last concert of the season will take place on Monday week.

CONCERTS.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The performance of Israel in Egypt on Friday week does not call for any lengthened comment, inasmuch as its right to rest on the same basis as the Messiah has long been accorded by the public, who evidence their appreciation of its excellence by the enormous attendance invariably present whenever and wherever it is performed. Exeter Hall, therefore, presented its usual appearance on the night in question; every part being densely crowded long before the commencement of the oratorio. To speak first of the choruses, which occupy by far the largest share of the work, it is sufficient to remark that they were given generally with that precision, combined with due attention to light and shade, to which their recent training under Mr. Costa has led us to expect, and produced the customary effect upon the audience, who loudly encored the "Hailstone chorus," and were frequent in their applause. Mr. Sims Reeves declaimed the terribly trying air, "The enemy said," with such tremendous energy that it was impossible to resist the calls for its repetition. Mdlle. Parepa did her best with the only air affording her an opportunity for display, "Thou didst blow," but, whether it was owing to the recollection of Madam Clara Novello (whom we are so soon to lose), did not altogether satisfy the critical ear. Mdlle. Parepa has fine natural gifts, but has not yet learnt all that is necessary to make a Handelian singer. Of Madame Sainton-Dolby we have only praise to utter, delivering the air, "Thine hand brought forth," in her most ingenious and finished manner. Miss Fanny Rowland sang with excellent skill and judgment, although her voice was somewhat overweighted by the more powerful organ of the composer. The duet, "The Lord is a man of war," met with the customary encore, and was sung by Signor Belletti and Mr. Santley without straining after that violent effect which generally makes this piece a shouting match rather than a vocal performance. Perhaps it might have been owing to the fact that neither gentleman can be considered a "basso profundo," being, strictly speaking, baritones. At the next performance Haydn's Creation is to be performed.

SOCIETY OF BRITISH MUSICIANS.—A trial of new music took lace at St. Martin's Hall, on Saturday last.

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S CHOIR.—The programmes of these entertainments have been occasionally blameworthy for sameness and repetition; the selections at the last two, however, exhibited novelties which relieved the monotony, and by their own intrinsic value raised the character above the somewhat trivial standard of former concerts. The Op. 78, No. 2 of Mendelssohn, a motet, for an eight part choir (given for the second time), is a work abounding in the most beautiful effects that the art of music can attain. The contrast of the unisonous opening with the harmonised close in each of the three first verses is as felicitous as the splendid and masterly counterpoint of the part writing throughout the work is ingenious and skilful. The eight parts are mostly "real" parts; and like many other works from the same pen, vocal and instrumental, reminds one frequently of the works of J. S. Bach, the emperor of the motet world, past, present, and to come.

The other great attraction of the evening was the "Paternoster," of Meyerbeer. While it is a great, and not ineffective, contrast to the work of Mendelssohn, it is replete with elegant musical idea, skilfully treated. It is also a model of construction, which prominent attraction impedes the flow of the melody in no single point. A song, by Mr. Henry Smart, "The Rhine is gently flowing," deserves especial mention, as one of the best of all his excellent works. A glee, of Callcott, "Once upon my cheek," was perfectly sung by Miss Fosbroke, Mrs. Dixon, Mr. Regaldi and Mr. Hodson.

The remainder of the programme presented no feature of interest or novelty, but the execution of the works showed no falling off in the capabilities of the choir. The Misses Leffler were announced for a vocal duet by Mr. Henry Leslie, but did not appear. The arrangement, by the same composer and conductor, of "Rule Britannia," was substituted, and most vociferously encored. The same distinction was accorded to the motet (Mendelssohn), and the glee "Once upon my cheek."

Mr. J. G. Calcott, the useful pianoforte accompanist of the solo pieces at the performances of Mr. Leslie's choir, played the well-known "Study in A minor," of Thalberg, and a Polonaise, by Weber, L'Hilarité. Mr. Calcott's playing in solo is, however, we think, a mistake.

MR. AND MRS. HOWARD PAUL re-appear at St. James's Hall on Monday, in their clever illustrations of character, with a variety of new songs. At the end of this month the present entertainment will be discontinued in London.

ISLINGTON.—Mr. H. Carvill gave his third annual concert on Wednesday evening, the 11th inst. at Myddleton Hall. In connection with the Islington Choral Society, he had a select madrigal choir, the Quartet Glee Union, and the following vocalists:—Miss Harrington, Miss E. Horder, Mrs. Robert Paget, R.A.M.; Mr. C. Henry, Mr. A. Lester, and Mr. Suchet Champion, with Mr. P. Watts, the concertina player, and Herr Albert Pieczonka and Mr. C. W. Jordan, pianists. Conductors, Messrs. G. W. Martin and H. Carvil. Some part songs and glees received every justice from the Choir and Glee Union. Miss Harrington sang Meyerbeer's "Robert, toi," and, with Mr. S. Champion, Wallace's "O, Maritana." Mrs. R. Paget, the favourite contralto, sang with artistic feeling "Rocked in the cradle of the deep," and Wallace's "Gentle Troubadour,' (Lurline); Mr. A. Lester, in Balfe's "Sweetheart," made a favourable impression. Miss E. Horder, in "Yarico to her Lover," and Bode's air, sang effectively; Mr. S. Champion, in Reichardt's "Thou art so near," and "My love is like the red, red rose," was loudly applauded. The concertina playing of Mr. P. Watts pleased much; and the pianoforte solo by Herr Albert Pieczonka gave satisfaction to all present.

FOREIGN.

BREMEN, April 3rd, 1860.—Our cyclus of "private concerts" was brought to a close last Tuesday, on which occasion we had an eminently classical programme, Haydn and Mozart, Beethoven and Cherubini, Spohr and Weber, being represented in it. The old master, Bach, also, was included in the band of illustrious deceased composers, and only one piece reminded us that we belonged to a later age. We allude to the violin concerto, performed by our visitor, Herr Joachim. This valuable and comprehensive composition has not long been completed. It was performed for the first time, not a fortnight since, before a large audience in Hanover. But it is not merely written in the Present, and conceived in the spirit of the age; it will, also produce its effect on the public of the Present; it is far from being Music of the Future, inasmuch as it will not have to wait till the Greek Kalends before its success is decided. There are, perhaps, not many modern musical compositions which, while so conscientiously carried out, and so carefully avoiding claptrap, produce so immediate and constantly increasing an effect. But there is also a future in store for it. We feel that this composition contains many treasures, which will be completely appreciated by the hearer only when he has heard it repeated several times, and since, on account of the great technical qualification it demands, qualifications which few of our present violinists, besides its author, possess, it cannot be repeated very often, it will not soon cease to be new. This concerto, which bears the title "Nach Ungarische Weise," consists of three movements—an allegro, a romance, and a finale, "alla zingarese" ("in the Zingaro fashion"). The last transports us, by its very title, to Hungary, but, even on the second movement, the Hungarian rhythms are perceptible, while, in the first allegro, as well, the motives present the same character. As is well known, Joachim was born in Hungary, and thus it was an easy task for him, guided by the reminiscences of his youth, to give the music a natural colour, without borrowing any particular melodies. The work is far from being calculated for the exclusive display of virtuosity, as the composer has done full justice to the claims of the orchestra. In the first movement, indeed, the orchestra, to a certain extent, predominates, expressing, in a pleasing introduction, nearly the whole melodious substance of the movement, before the violin chimes in and developes what has been thus performed; even in the interesting and elaborate cadence the solo instrument feels lonely, and calls to its aid some gentle sister instruments from the band. In the romance, however, this subordination ceases, and the orchestra and violin, as equal powers, enter on a course of beautiful melodic rivalry, at last combining in graceful harmonic unity; while, finally, in the third movement—the impulsive, sparkling, foaming presto, as restless as the inconstant Zingaros themselves—the violin, as a matter of course, assumes completely the upper hand; it decidedly takes the lead, although, even here, a few strains from the orchestra, now and then, mingle most charmingly in the musical maze. Both the composition and its rendering were received most warmly by the audience, and, after the second piece played by our guest—the songful adagio from Spohr's seventh concerto, given with the most feeling tenderness—the applause was so unusually great, that, in return, he could not avoid making such a return as only he is capable of making. He played one of Bach's chaconnes—the same which he introduced on a previous occasion. Whenever Herr Joachim performs one of these compositions, we think that greater perfection of execution is impossible, but every repetition seems to prove that such an opinion is erroneous. Even in the chaconne, the delicate threads of this marvellous weft of tone appeared finer and clearer than ever.

The selections from Mozart and Haydn were again confided to Madame Engel, who sang, with good taste and her usual neatness, an air from the latter composer's Creation, and an air from the Idomeneo of the former (an air which is easily recognisable from its similarity to the Tamino air in Die Zauberflöte). The concert opened with Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, in which our orchestra is well up, and which it played once this winter at one of the "Symphonieconcerte." The symphony was admirably rendered. Of the two overtures, that of Cherubini to Medea was but coldly received, while that of Weber to Der Freischütz, enthusiastically executed, produced its accustomed exciting impression.

All's well that ends well! Thus may we conclude our concert-notices for a time, while looking back on the evening when the star of our greatest and most genial master of the violin shone in the musical firmament.—Weser Zeitung.

PARIS.—Alary has returned to Paris after a brilliant season at Madrid. At St. Petersburg, it is said that, amongst the artists engaged for next season, are Mesdames Nantier-Didiée, Bernardi, Zoretti; Signors Tamberlik, Calzolari, Mongini, &c.; and, it is said, Mdlle. Carvalho has been offered 20,000 francs a month. Madame Rosati has also returned to Paris.

VIENNA—(Extract from a Letter).—At the Theatre à la Wieden, Italian operas are being given with Madlle. Grua, Madame Charton, Mdlle. Lafont, and MM. Graziani, Fagotti, Ballerina, &c. Il Barbiere, the opening performance, with the exception of Madame Charton's Rosina, and Signor Fagotti's Figaro, was by no means first-rate. Mdlle. La Grua will make her début in Norma shortly.

GREAT NATIONAL ENTERPRISE

Organised in 1848, and developed at THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC BRIDGE STREET, MANCHESTER, established by him expressly as a Great National Institution to facilitate the Encouragement and Promotion of NATIVE MUSICAL TALENT, and the GENERAL ADVANCEMENT OF MUSIC AMONG THE RISING GENERATION, upon his new and effective system, also as a NORMAL SCHOOL for the training of masters to conduct CONSERVATOIRES OF MUSIC to be established throughout the United Kingdom, for LITTLE CHILDREN, the whole comprising an entirely new scheme of NATIONAL EDUCATION, by blending music with general instruction, so that the study of music shall become a branch of education in the humblest of schools of this country. To illustrate and to rouse an interest in every town and city for these institutions, Dr. Mark travels with a number of his pupils occasionally through the country—giving lectures, and introducing his highly approved and pleasing Musical Entertainment, entitled DR. MARK AND HIS LITTLE MEN, who number upwards of Thirty Instrumentalists, and a most Efficient Chorus, the whole forming a most unique and complete Juvenile Orchestra, composed of LITTLE ENGLISH, IRISH, SCOTCH AND WELCH BOYS, FROM FIVE TO SIXTEEN YEARS OF AGE, who play Operatic Selections, Solos, Marches, Quadrilles, Galops, &c., and sing Songs and Choruses in a most effective manner, and to whom Dr. Mark gives a gratuitous General and Musical Education.

APPOINTMENTS OF MASTERS AND ARRANGEMENTS OF CLASSES IN THE ABOVE INSTITUTION.

Principal of the Royal College of Music; Director, Composer, and Conductor; Lecturer to both Private and Public, Theoretical and Practical Instrumental and Vocal Classes	Dr. MARK.
Master of the General Educational Department: Writing, Reading, Arithmetic, Grammar, Dictation, History, Geography, Practical Geometry, and Book-keeping	Mr. POWELL and Two Assistant Teachers.

PRACTICAL ASSISTANT TEACHERS.

Flute, Piccolo, Oboe, and Clarionet	Sig. CORTESI.
Cornet and other Brass Instruments	Mr. H. RUSSELL.
Concertina (German and English)	Mr. ELDER.
Vocal Classes	Messrs. POWELL and ELDER.

Dr. MARK has also made provision for the Orphans of the Musical Profession possessing musical talent, who will find the above institution a happy home, and receive a most effective general and musical education, board, and clothing, free of all expense.

Little Boys, from five to nine years of age, apprenticed for three, five, or seven years by paying a moderate entrance fee to cover the expenses of instrument and books.

Twelve appointments ready for Masters.

For Prospectuses, apply direct to the Royal College of Music, Bridge-street, Manchester.

Dr. MARK is also open to Engagements with his Little Men.

Dr. MARK begs to invite the Parents and Friends, and all those interested in his Enterprise and in the Education of the Youths of this country to visit his establishment. Visiting hours:—From Nine to Eleven, a.m., and Two and Four, p.m. Saturdays and Sundays excepted.

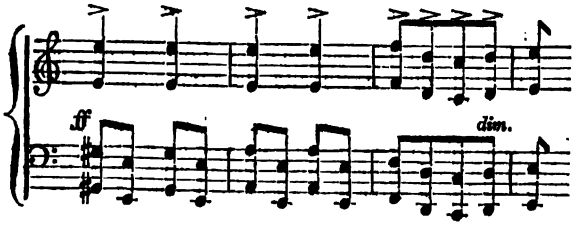
REVIEWS.

"The Quick Step Galop;"—"The Sea-Wave Waltz"—by M. Kiko (A. W. Hammond). The "Quick Step Galop" has a very well-marked and animated subject, which sets out as follows :—

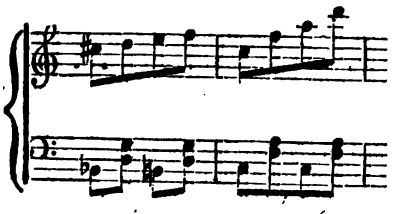
The second part, in A minor, is somewhat vague, especially at the point subjoined :—



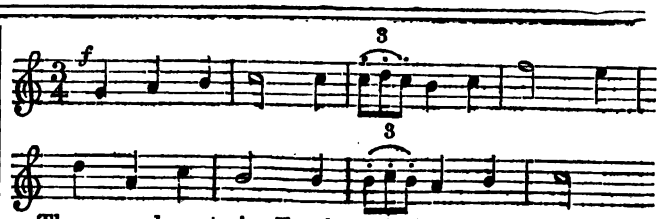
This, however, by adding harmony to the single notes, in the right hand, might easily be amended. There are one or two more points that demand revision—such, for example, as the following :—

And the following :—

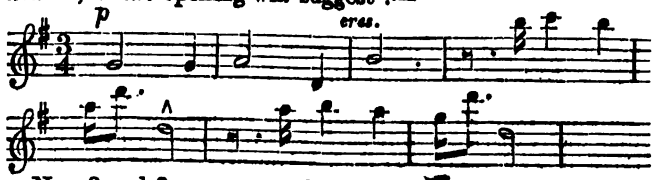
The last would be better thus :—



Though even that might be purified. The Galop deserves reconsideration, for it is a right spirited and vigorous Galop of its measures. We have adduced enough to show that Kiko has something to acquire in the way of technical proficiency; on the "Sea-Wave Waltz" we shall therefore not be critical. The theme of the first figure is quite enough to prove that its composer is not ungifted with melodic invention. We can only find room, however, for eight bars :—



The second part, in E minor, is just as pretty. No. 4, too, has a quiet unpretending tune which cannot fail to attract, as the opening will suggest :—



Nos. 2 and 3 are not nearly so good as their companions. The introduction is à la Herz (Herz facilité), and not bad; while the coda, but for such points as the subjoined—(you see, reader, we can be nothing if not critical—so it's of no use promising to be lenient) :—

and the subjoined :—

and the subjoined :—

would be as irreproachable as it is spirited. Va, donc, pour Kiko.

"'The Winter being over,' part-song"—composed by Ellen Avery (Charles Jefferys). The words of this part-song—written in 1653, by one Ann Collins, offer a quaint mixture of matter-of-fact and poetry,

The music is melodious, characteristic, and remarkably well written. Miss Avery should be encouraged to proceed; her feeling and taste being alike unquestionable.

"The Singer's Library of Concerted Music"—edited by John Hullah (Addison and Hollier). No. 23 of the Secular Division contains a part-song, the words by Charles Swain, the music by Maria Tiddeman—"If thou speak'st though snows surround thee." This is quite as neatly written as the part-song of Miss Avery; but the melody is hardly so attractive. In addition to the foregoing, the same number includes Samuel Webbe's catch, "Zephyr, I can tell you where," which was scarcely worth reviving.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

THE first performance of Don Giovanni, on Saturday, was, in more than one respect, a remarkable one. The discovery of even a tolerable Don Giovanni was an unlooked for event, so many had been the failures since the retirement of Tamburini. Signor Everardi, who now impersonates the libertine nobleman at Her Majesty's Theatre, if not a perfect representative of the character, is by many degrees the best we have seen of late years. His voice is rich, mellow, and flexible, and, although not an Italian, sings like a genuine Italian artist. Signor Everardi looks the part, moreover, extremely well, and acts with great intelligence. His deportment is natural and graceful, and his movements and gestures are easy and unconstrained. That Signor Everardi has something yet to acquire before he can be thoroughly pronounced master of the most exacting character in the whole range of the lyric drama, is unquestionable; but that time and experience will perfect what has been so well begun, there is good reason to expect. However, at any rate, viewed even as it stands, the Don Giovanni of Signor Everardi is entitled to very high praise. It is gentlemanly, spirited, and free from all exaggeration as an histrionic portraiture, while as a display of vocal art it is irreproachable. The duet, "La ci darem," (with Madame Borghi-Mamo), and the serenade, "Deh vieni alla finistra," both given with infinite taste and propriety of expression, was unanimously redemanded. Madame Borghi-Mamo has added materially to her reputation by her performance of Zerlina, which has hardly been surpassed in our recollection. More exquisite singing could not be heard than the incomparably beautiful air, "Batti, batti," and "Vedrai carino," the latter of which was encored with acclamations, and the former only escaping an encore through an injudicious departure from the text, in order to "round off" the cadence (we suppose) in accordance with Mad. Borghi-Mamo's (not Mozart's) idea of finish. Such singing requires no clap-trap to recommend it. In the duet with Don Giovanni (encored, as we have said), Mad. Borghi-Mamo was admirable. Of Madlle. Titiens' Donna Anna we can only reiterate the high encomiums expressed last year. It is, perhaps, his grandest performance. Signor Vialetti sang the music of Leporello with remarkable vigour and correctness. Madlle. Vaneri gave that of Elvira carefully, but exhibited little acquaintance with the business of the stage. Signor Castelli surprised everyone in the Commendatore, which must have satisfied the manager that his talents have heretofore been underrated. Signor Giuglini sang "Della sua pace" to perfection, and would have been as successful in "Il mio tesoro" but for certain alterations (by no means improvements) of the text of Mozart. The house was crowded to suffocation.

On Tuesday, Norma was given for the first time, and attracted an overflowing audience. Madlle. Titiens, as the High Priestess, and Signor Mongini, as Pollio, achieved their accustomed success. The other characters call for no especial notice.

Don Giovanni was repeated on Thursday, and to-night Rigoletto will introduce Madlle. Brunetti as Gilda, and Signor Sebastiani Bonconi as the jester.

MRS. MATHEWS' FRIENDS FOR THE FIRESIDE.—Any book from the widow of the celebrated Charles Mathews would be favourably received by the public. This work will take its stand upon higher ground than personal respect—it will be esteemed one of the most valuable additions to literature that has for a long time appeared. It is rich in anecdote—it is replete with wit—its fund of recollections of men and things is unsurpassed—its notings and selections evince a refined mind and good taste—its gravities will be appreciated by all thinking people. In fact, the book will prove a mine of wealth to every class—to the wit—to the men of the world—to the clergy—to the politician—to old and young of both sexes—above all, to the literary man. —Globe.

ORGANIST APPOINTMENT.—Mr. J. M.Roberts, organist and choir-master of Chapeltown and Moorallerton Churches, and formerly articled pupil of Mr. Spark, has been appointed organist and choir-master of the Parish Church, Thirsk. The selection was made by competition, the candidates having their abilities tested in various ways by Dr. Monk, organist of York Minister.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

ONE of the best representations of the Trovatore ever witnessed at this theatre took place on Thursday night week, when the zeal and energy exhibited on all hands were the more remarkable, inasmuch as the audience, though numerous and fashionable, was, in a great measure, one of the most frigid and apathetic of the season. The third of Madame Grisi's "farewell appearances," it seemed the fixed resolve of the unequalled lyric tragedian to persuade the house of the difficulty of ultimately replacing her. From the opening air, "Tacea la notte"—the slow movement of which was rendered with genuine pathos, and the "allegro" with wonderful brilliancy—to the final scene, where the self-poisoned Leonora succumbs in the presence of her lover, just at the moment of convincing him that she is innocent, her performance was admirable alike from a dramatic and a musical point of view. Signor Mario, too—who has now recovered from the temporary indisposition that, year after year, memorializes his passage across the Channel—was quite himself, and, as a natural consequence, his Manrico was as nearly faultless as could be imagined. The song of the Troubadour (behind the scenes); the graceful apostrophe to Leonora ("Ah, si bien mio") and its fiery sequel, "Di quella pira," where Manrico hastens to the rescue of Azucena; the plaintive appeal from the prison ("Ah! che la morte") in the scene of the "Miserere;" and last, not least, the concluding duet, in which the indignant malediction, "Va, ti abbomino, ti maledico," yields to a burst of tenderness when the fatal effects of the poison begin to show Manrico how cruel and unjust had been his suspicions, were, without reservation, displays of the highest excellence. Only once during the evening was there even a hint at failure; and this happened in the "cadenza" at the close of "Ah, si ben mio" (not a very striking ornamental passage, by the way), which somewhat weakened the impression that otherwise would have been produced by a thoroughly perfect example of cantabile singing. When Grisi and Mario, thus well disposed, are encouraged by an unrestricted command of physical resources into a resolute determination to gratify their hearers, it is not easy to over-estimate the value of their combined exertions. Anything more splendid, anything more touching and appealing, than the duet between Leonora and Manrico, has rarely been witnessed on the Italian stage. Madame Csillag, by the manner in which she sang the melodious phrase, "Ai nostri monti ritorneremo," materially enhanced the artistic effect, her skilfully subdued tones in the dream of the sleeping gipsy contrasting exquisitely with the accents of the hero and heroine, whose passionate and absorbing grief makes them altogether oblivious of the presence of a third person. This lady's Azucena has not been equalled as a picturesque and vigorous conception since Madame Viardot first impersonated the character in London. The scene in which, while narrating to her pretended son the story of her former life, the gipsy gives utterance to the despair that accompanies her remembrance of its most terrible and fatal incident, was a masterpiece of vocal declamation, made doubly impressive by its dramatic truthfulness. Here and there a vestige of Teutonic exaggeration may have possibly been detected, but the whole was too intensely real, too vividly and poetically portrayed, not to extort the liveliest and most unanimous sympathy. Without touching on other points—in their way no less entitled to praise—we may add, that by her performance of Azucena, Madame Csillag has entirely justified the favourable opinion solicited by what was, of course, a far higher intellectual effort—her Fidelio. The first appearance of Signor Graziani—whose Conte de Luna chiefly resolves itself into the most musical, and in all respects satisfactory delivery on record of the popular air "Il balen del suo sorriso," was another event which contributed to the general attraction of the performance. This gentleman's voice—neither absolutely barytone nor absolutely tenor, but an agreeable fusion of the two—is as fresh and as beautiful as ever. His method of singing reveals no sign of modification; but that it was as acceptable as on previous occasions was evidenced in the warm reception accorded to "Il balen," which gained one of the two encores of the evening—the other being awarded to Madame Grisi and Signor Mario in the "Miserere." After bestowing such unqualified commendation, it would be superfluous to speak of "recalls" and such-like manifestations of courtesy on the part of the public, which the habit of the age having made conventional, are too often indiscriminately awarded.

On Saturday, instead of Fra Diavolo, which had been announced, Dinorah was substituted, by desire of Her Majesty, who with the Prince Consort visited the theatre for the first time this season.

On Tuesday the first representation of Il Barbiere for two years attracted the most brilliant audience of the season. The fact of Mario having resumed his old part of Count Almaviva—his most finished and admirable impersonation in the opinion of many—gave additional interest to the performance; while the first appearance of Madame Miolan-Carvalho, in Rosina, was anticipated with general curiosity. On no former occasion have we heard the great Italian tenor sing the music so exquisitely. So thoroughly does it suit him, that it is unaccountable how, under any circumstances, Mario should have resigned the part of Almaviva to another. As well might Tamburini in his best days have resigned the part of Don Giovanni to a barytone of less renown. The secession of Mario robbed the Barbiere of the chief among its very many attractions, and this, no doubt, was the reason of its being abandoned last season, for the first time since the institution of the Royal Italian Opera. The subscribers and public may be thankful for any cause which brought him back to his post, for he positively never sang better than on Tuesday, and never produced a greater effect. From "Ecco ridente," to the trio, "Ah, qual colpo," his voice not only displayed its unrivalled quality, but his vocalisation that ease, grace, and flexibility which have made him perhaps the most accomplished singer of Rossini's music the stage has seen. Another powerful attraction was Ronconi's Figaro, a masterpiece of a different kind, but no less incomparable than Mario's Almaviva. The singing and acting of the two in the famous duet, "All idea di quel metallo," could not have been surpassed; and without entering into further details about the performance of the prince of Figaros, we may say that Ronconi was in the true vein, and sustained the character of the mercurial barber with wonderful animation and esprit from "Largo al factotum," to the end. Madame Miolan-Carvalho was a charming Rosina, acting with infinite naïveté, and singing with wonderful brilliancy; but her voice being a high soprano, she was scarcely so much at home with the music as with that of Dinorah. The transposition of "Una voce" from E to G is by no means without precedent, but the ornaments in many instances were far more elaborate and redundant than Bossinean. Mad. Carvalho's success in Rosina, nevertheless, was decided. Signor Tagliafico gave a bold and vigorous sketch of Don Basilio, and M. Zelger did his utmost to render Bartolo amusing. The overture was encored with acclamations, and the same compliment paid to the terzetto, "Zitti, zitti," in the last scene.

MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.

AT the fourth concert of the second season, which took place on Wednesday night in St. James's Hall, this new and flourishing society—which counts among its members nearly all the chief professors and amateurs of music, foreign and native, residing in the metropolis—furnished a programme in strict consonance with that element of its constitution which principally distinguishes it from other associations of the kind. It will be seen, by the following, that a new work of importance, from the pen of an eminent living composer, was one of the prominent features in the selection:—

PART I.

Symphony in G minor	Mozart.
Cantata, "Christmas" (First time of performance)	G. A. Macfarren.

PART II.

Concerto in G, Pianoforte, Mr. Charles Hallé ...	Beethoven.
Aria, "Cangio d'aspetto" (Admeto), Madame Sainton-Dolby	Handel.
Grand Air, "Je suis sauvée enfin" (Le Domino Noir), Madame Lemmens Sherrington ...	Auber.
Overture (Guillaume Tell)	Rossini.

Conductor—Mr. Alfred Mellon.

A finer execution of Mozart's incomparable symphony in G minor (the minuet and trio of which was encored), or more faultless indications of the times of each movement than those expressed by Mr. Alfred Mellon, we do not remember. The introduction of a symphony by Mozart was a happy idea, and never was perfect music more thoroughly appreciated. Another rich treat was the masterly performance of Beethoven's superb and romantic pianoforte concerto by M. Charles Hallé, who played his part without book, with a readiness for which he is proverbial, and achieved a brilliant success. The orchestral accompaniments, so original, so elaborate, and so overflowing with rare fancy, were given by the band to perfection. The least admirable feature of the evening was the overture to Guillaume Tell, in which the noise of the wind instruments completely drowned the stringed instruments.

To the execution of Mr. Macfarren's new cantata, and of the work itself, we have alluded in another page.

The aria of Handel (though admirably given by Madame Sainton), and the song from the Domino Noir, did not create any particular impression. Madame Lemmens was by no means so perfect in Auber's florid as in Mr. Macfarren's legato music, and we doubt very much if bravura is her forte, notwithstanding the flexibility and compass of her voice.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

THE Hanover-square Rooms were crowded on Monday night, at the second concert, and yet the programme contained scarcely a new feature, as the following will show:—

PART I.

Sinfonia, No. 7	Haydn.
Recit., Aria (Figaro), Mr. Santley	Mozart.
Concerto, No. 1, pianoforte, Herr Ernst Lubeck	Mendelssohn.
Scena (Oberon), Mdlle. Parepa	Weber.
Overture (Euryanthe)	Weber.

PART II.

Sinfonia Pastorale	Beethoven.
Aria (Siège de Corinthe), Mdlle. Parepa	Rossini.
Berceuse, Tarantella, pianoforte, Herr Lubeck ...	Ernst Lubeck.
Duetto (Agnese), Mdlle. Parepa and Mr. Santley	Paer.
Overture (Pré aux Clercs)...	Hérold.

Conductor—Professor Sterndale Bennett, Mus.D.

If any proof were wanting that the Philharmonic Concerts owe their fame, and must be indebted for continued longevity, to the influence of a certain series of acknowledged great works, the success of last night's entertainment would suffice. Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, Cherubini, Weber, Spohr, and Mendelssohn—with proportionate examples from the vocal music of the Italian masters, and occasionally, where incontestable merit warrants the innovation, an instrumental or vocal piece by one of our best English writers—would suffice to sustain the Philharmonic Society for another half century. The Musical Society of London and the New Philharmonic Concerts may find it in their interest to produce novelties, while the Monday Popular Concerts—the most remarkable institution of the kind ever established in this country—can afford to be universal, and to ransack the libraries of chamber-music, both ancient and modern; but the Philharmonic Society has an exclusive mission—that of periodically affording its subscribers the opportunity of hearing, well executed, the most unblemished masterpieces of the art. And, after all, it is hardly too much to listen to the symphonies of Mozart and Beethoven (not to go further into particulars) once a year, or once in four-and-twenty months.

Haydn's No. 7 (of the Saloman set)—the finale of which is one of its composer's most genial, characteristic, and spontaneous effusions—was played somewhat roughly, somewhat—as the French significantly express it—"en robe de chambre." On the other hand, Beethoven's magnificent musical poem was given to perfection, the second movement especially (the Rivulet), with a scrupulous exactness of detail which, amid their many striking qualities, is not often observed in our English orchestras. The times of every movement—thanks to the refined musical taste of the conductor—were irreproachable. Another grand performance was that of Weber's overture to Euryanthe—an inspiration which appears on all occasions to exercise as potent a sway over the executants themselves as over the audience. The orchestral prelude to Le Pré aux Clercs is one of the feeblest specimens of its school that could possibly have been selected—not to travel back to Méhul, or even to Boieldieu, Auber has composed at least a dozen overtures to which this pale essay of Hérold's is in no way comparable.

The new pianist, Herr Lubeck, was well received. Nevertheless his execution of Mendelssohn's familiar concerto was not altogether satisfactory. The first movement was loud (louder playing, indeed, we do not recollect), but had little of the vigour, less of the poetry, which other pianists, imbued with the spirit of the composer, have known how to impart. Strange to say, too (the prevailing fashion of "hurrying borne in mind), it was taken too slow. The same reproach applies to the finale, which, however, was in other respects more to the purpose, and while devoid of that indefinable something which goes by the appellation of "charm," did not fail to impress by its force and brilliancy. The slow movement was the least attractive feature of Herr Lubeck's performance. In his own music the new pianist shone to much greater advantage. His Berceuse and Tarantella are both fair specimens of the peculiar modern school now most in vogue, and were both admirably played. In short, if not (to judge him by this one performance) a strictly "classical" pianist, Herr Lubeck is at any rate a "virtuoso" of the first rank.

The singing was excellent—that of Mr. Santley in the splendid air of Figaro (too frequently omitted from the operatic representations) more particularly. Mademoiselle Parepa was wonderfully successful, not only in "Ocean, thou mighty monster," but in the florid bravura from Rossini's Siège de Corinthe, which hardly comes within her means so readily as its companion.

CONCERTS.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—The entire programme of last Monday was devoted to Mendelssohn, and as the musical public but a few days previous had been presented with a performance of the immortal master's Elijah, on by far the most important scale that has yet been attempted, so the selection of this evening formed, as it were, an appropriate pendant, by affording an opportunity of listening to some of the choicest selections from the chamber music of the ever-to-be-lamented musician. The instrumental portion comprised, among other things, two quartets, E flat major (Op. 44) and F minor, No. 6 (posthumous) —the latter for the first time at the Monday Popular Concerts; together with the trio in D minor, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, also for the first time. Sainton, Goffrie, Doyle, Piatti, and Charles Hallé (pianoforte), as executants, were a guarantee for a performance of the highest excellence, and the hearty applause of the audience bore testimony to the thorough appreciation of their efforts. In addition to this, Mr. Charles Hallé gave two solos in his most masterly and finished manner—the fantasia in F sharp minor, dedicated to Moscheles, and a selection from the Lieder ohne Wörte, played so exquisitely that the second and last were unanimously redemanded. Mr. Sims Reeves was also encored in "The Garland," and "The Hunter's Song," both, we need hardly say, sung to perfection. A like compliment was also paid to Miss J. Wells and Mr. Cumming in the duet, "Zuleika and Hassan." The London Glee and Madrigal Union, under the direction of Mr. Land, contributed "The Lark's Song" and "The Nightingale," and, the former being encored, most unaccountably substituted a glee by the late Mr. Horsley. Mr. Benedict, as usual, showed himself a first-rate accompanyist. On Monday, May 21st, the selection will be from various composers, when Herr Ernst Lubeck, the new pianist, is to make his first appearance at these concerts.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—Haydn's Creation was given last night for the first time this season. The principal solo singers were Miss Parepa, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Signor Belletti.

THE VOCAL ASSOCIATION.—At the performance of the Vocal Association on Wednesday evening next, May 16th, St. James's Hall, the principal artists from Her Majesty's Theatre will appear, by the kind permission of E. T. Smith, Esq.

WOODFORD (ESSEX).—A concert was given in the Lecture Room on Thursday week. The following artists assisted:—Miss Clari Fraser, Miss Leffler, Mr. John Morgan and Mr. Allan Irving, vocalists; Mr. Langton Williams, pianist, the last named gentleman also officiated as conductor. Miss Clari Fraser created a marked impression in her two solos, Mr. Balfe's song, "There is a name we never breathe," and the old Scotch ballad, "Huntingtower," both of which were encored, and both repeated. Encores were also awarded to Miss Leffler in the jacobite song, "Bonnie Dundee," and to Mr. Allan Irving in "The White Squall." Mr. Glover's duet, "The Cousins," sung by Miss Clari Fraser and Miss Leffler, was also bissed and repeated. Mr. Langton Williams played Madame Oury's sparkling fantasia on airs from Rigoletto with good effect.

MYDDELTON HALL, ISLINGTON.—A concert was given at the above hall on Wednesday evening week, at which there was by no means a large attendance. The programme was of the tedious miscellaneous kind, and all vocal except one pianoforte performance. The artists were Miss Clari Fraser, Miss Chipperfield, Miss Grace Delafield, Madame Laura Baxter, Mr. Gadsby, Mr. Suchet Champion, Mr. Barrett, and Mr. Weiss. Among the pieces worthy of mention were Beethoven's song, "Know'st thou the land," and the Irish comic song, "Barney O'Hea," by Miss Clari Fraser—the former charmingly sung, the latter given with great point and rapturously applauded; the canzonetta from Dinorah, "Ye maidens in spring-time," and the popular ballad from Lurline, "Gentle troubadour" (encored), by Madame Laura Baxter—both sung to perfection; and Mr. Weiss's song, "The slave's dream," rendered by himself with great power and redemanded. Mr. George Lake presided at the pianoforte, and with musician-like ability.

DUBLIN—(From a Correspondent).—Most of the amateurs of music who come to Ireland pay an early visit to the two cathedral establishments which Dublin contains: to such folks it may be matter of interest to know that one of these buildings, the cathedral and collegiate church of St. Patrick, is about to be restored, at the cost of £18,000 or £20,000, all of which is in the gift of one individual, the present Alderman Guinness, an inhabitant of the city. The building (a fair specimen of the early English style) has been under repair for some time; it is computed that at least four years additional will be required to carry out the proposed restorations, which are to be in accordance with the plans of Mr. Carpenter, a distinguished English architect. However, what more nearly concerns the Musical World and its readers, are the repairs and additions to the organ of the Cathedral, an old specimen of Renatus Harris, and an organ which ill deserved the high repute it long enjoyed; these additions, which were entrusted to Mr. Bevington, of Greek-street, Soho, comprise some three or four new stops to replace the damaged or out-of-date portions of Harris's instrument. The removal of the old swell (itself an extension of an "echo") and the erection of a new one to double C, containing the following stops:—1. Double open diapason and Bourdon bass; 2. Open diapason; 3. Stopt ditto; 4. Principal; 5. Clear mixture (2 ranks); 6. Sharp mixture (3 ranks); 7. Oboe; 8. Cornopean; 9. Clarion. The great organ has been reinforced by a new claribel (8 feet pitch in place of a huge mounted cornet); a wald-flute (to replace a tierce) and a bell-cramba (in place of a twelfth of colossal scale, which was indeed of larger dimensions than similar pipes in the open diapason). The great organ, thus amended, now contains:—1. Open diapason; 2. Small ditto; 3. Stopt diapason (metal); 4. Claribel (wood) to middle C; 5. Bell-gamba (throughout); 6. Wald flute; 7. Principal; 8. Fifteenth; 9. Sesquialtera (3 ranks); 10. Tourniture (2 ranks); 11. Trumpet. The choir organ, after the manner of Harris, borrows 3 stops from the great organ, namely, 2 diapasons and principal; and contains, in addition, a small-scaled stopt diapason, a dulciana, a flute and a fifteenth. The pedal organ (added some 30 years ago, by Fleetwood, of Liverpool) consists of 2 open diapasons of 8 and 16 feet pitch, respectively: Couplers—1. Swell to G; 2. Ditto sub-octave; 3. Ditto to pedal; 4. Great to pedal. A tremulant to the swell completes what is now a very effective instrument. Messrs. Bevington are considered to have added to their reputation on this side of St. George's Channel, by the above works, an account of which will perhaps be acceptable to your organ amateurs.

MUSIC AND THEATRES IN PARIS.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

Paris, April 18th.

THE lyrical season here, like a dying Phœnix, is slowly passing away, while from its ashes the much more brilliant season of London is emerging. The rival opera houses there are, doubtless, as much a subject of conversation as they are here; and columns of the various theatrical papers are filled with the correspondence from London, relative to the various doings and chit-chat of the drama and opera; while Paris, like a giant refreshed, after a short respite of the last days of Lent, is plunging into a fresh series of balls, dinners, private theatricals. A propos of the latter, a rather sudden check has been given to the fashion of having the artists of the Théâtre-Français, to play in private drawing-rooms those charming little "proverbes" of Octave Feuillet, Alfred de Musset, &c. As it was found to exercise an injurious influence on the interests of the theatre, and also on the acting of the artists, so, by "decree," they are forbidden, for the future, to exercise their talents in a way that, though lucrative for them, would have ended by materially affecting the interests of the Théâtre-Français. The engagements entered into before this "degree" was passed will be allowed to be fulfilled, but no others incurred. A plan is talked of by some enterprising company, to remedy, next winter, the deficit this would cause in the winter amusements. They propose engaging, from various theatres, good artists, and keeping them as a troupe to be exclusively devoted to the acting in private drawing-rooms. The theatres, meanwhile, are rather languishing. The performances at the Grand-Opéra, of Pierre de Médecis, have been interrupted for a short time, by an indisposition of Mad. Gueymard-Lauters. Guillaume Tell was given last week. Meanwhile, the sisters Marchisio have arrived in Paris, and the rehearsals of Sémiramis have commenced. There is some talk of Mdlle. Marie Sax, of the Théâtre-Lyrique, being engaged here. The Chateau Trompette, of M. Gavaert, that had been put back at the Opéra-Comique in its rehearsals by the serious illness of M. Couderc, is now rehearsing, with Mocker in Couderc's part. The Roman d'Elvire is being played. The Belle Chocolatière, in one act, by M. Paul Dupuch, is also in rehearsal, and there is also some talk of the Petit Chaperon Rouge, of Boieldieu, being given ere Madame Faure-Lefèvre leaves. Mdlle. Marmion, of the Théâtre-Lyrique, has been engaged at this opera. The privilege of the Théâtre-Lyrique, which was to have expired in a year, had recently been renewed by M. Carvalho till February, 1867. M. Réty will thus have nearly seven years of managerial career before him; and more, in 1861, he will inaugurate the new Théâtre-Lyrique, as the foundations of this building are already begun, and it is to be terminated by the 12th of next December. Madame Viardot's benefit will soon take place, and Tamberlik will probably sing at it. Madame Viardot is going to sing one act of Armide, and the sleep-walking scene in the Macbeth of Verdi, with Graziani. After Beethoven's Fidelio, the Reine Balkir, of Charles Gounod, will be given. The Gymnase has no cause to complain of the new piece I gave you the sketch of last week, Jeanne qui rit, et Jeanne qui pleure. At the Vaudeville a little one-act piece of M. Ponsard, and another by M. Charles Hugo, have been accepted; meanwhile, La Tentation, of M. O. Feuillet, goes on successfully. The Odéon has given a five-act drama by M. Charles de Courcy, entitled, Daniel Lambert, rather heavy and very French in style. The Gaîté (why this name to a theatre where such lugubrious pieces are performed?), not to be outdone, has given a kind of Anne Radcliffe melo-drama, turning on the rivalry of two brothers—the one, of course persecuted innocence, that triumphs in the end; the elder brother, the prosecutor, and the one who has the power, of course succumbing, dying in the end. Season the whole of the five acts with a liberal amount of battles, assassinations, poisons, antidotes, and some masked statues, that only appear when one of the family of the Farnese (to which the two brothers belong) are to die, and a few other horrors, with a grand dénouément in the end of the triumph of persecuted innocence, and you have the Aventuriers (M. Victor Séjour's five-act drama) before you. But these terrible pieces seem at present almost an epidemic. The Porte St.-Martin has given another that out-Herods Herod, not so much in horrors as in improbabilities. And to go through the five acts of the Roi des Iles, and the wonderful events MM. E. Rollin and E. Wœstyn (for they are the joint authors) have heaped pêle-mêle one a-top of the other, would require something more wonderful than the thread of Ariadne to extricate from the labyrinth they are in. The ever-wonderful Mdlle. Déjazet, who decidedly does not intend to get old, has been playing in a little piece she played so well in long ago, The Marquis de Lauzun.

The concerts are still going on, though with less brilliancy, and there are fewer of them. A pianist that, as almost a child, the Conservatoire crowned at the same time as Jules Cohen, as first prizes of the Marmontel class, Wieniawski, has returned here after an absence of ten years. Like his brother, Joseph Wieniawski the violoncellist, he has acquired a good reputation in Germany. He now returns to Paris, and will give a concert in the Salle Herz, Thursday 26th. Mad. C. Remaury gave a very good concert in the Salle Herz, with the assistance of M. Kruzer, M. and Mad. Lefébure-Wely, and Jules Lefort, who sang his song, "Chanson d'amour," very well.

Death has again been busy in the dramatic world: Amant, the comic actor of the Théâtre du Palais Royal, has expired suddenly from inflammation of the lungs. A few days before he had been forming projects of retiring from the stage. Amant had been for thirty years on the stage, and was as much liked for his private character as for his talent. The widow of Talma, the Countess de Chalot, has also just expired.

A very interesting ceremony took place in the church of St. Eustache, last Thursday. It was the inauguration of the pictures done in this church; the Archbishop of Paris, the Prefect of the Seine, and the members of the municipal body of the town were present. The performance on the organ was remarkable, and Tamberlik sang in his best style a motet, "Domine Deus," of M. Bonetti. Meanwhile, the public works and improvements are going on as actively as ever, the click of hammer and the noise of the mason's saw resounds through; and these horrid March winds, that are not yet over, throw clouds of brick and mortar dust into one's eyes. The ball at the Duchess d'Albe's, to be given on the 17th (yesterday), is put off till the 24th, on political motives. Two cousins of the Empress were taken with Ortega, in the last émeute in Spain, and of course, till their fate was known, no ball could have much charm for a relation. However, they have been, or are to be, pardoned. The gorgeous costume talked of, and that has been exciting so much talk, is going to be changed. And the Diana that was to have been will be invested in a domino. One of the quadrilles is to be composed of the elements: M. de Morny and the Princess Metternich will represent air—then there will be earth, air, fire and water.

April 26.

The great question as to the building a new opera-house for the French operas is at length quite decided. The building will be erected at the beginning of the Rue de Rouen and a street that is to run between the Boulevards des Capucins and the Chaussée d'Antin. The direction of the works is confided to M. Ronault de Fleury. The general plan was deposited the 15th of this month, at the Mairie of the Ninth Arrondissement, in the Rue Drouot, and where for twenty days all observations of the public relative to the plan of the building will be received. As it is an undertaking that will probably cost twenty millions of francs, the pros and cons of the site chosen cannot be too attentively studied. Meanwhile, in what will be some months hence the old Grand-Opéra house, all goes on actively. Mad. Gueymard, who has recovered from her late indisposition, is gaining fresh laurels in Pierre de Médecis. The Sisters Marchisio are already studying their parts in Sémiramis; the part of Assur is definitively given to Obin: indeed it is probable that the singers will be ready long ere the scenery is. The latter is on a scale of unwonted magnificence, and Ancient Babylon is to be resuscitated in all her splendour in this modern Babylon. We can thus judge, which is the most preferable—I should say the latter. Decidedly; operas written by princes are windfalls to a theatre. The illustrious composer of Pierre de Médecis has presented M. Dietrich, the leader of the orchestra, with a magnificent platina chain; to M. Vaudrot, leader of the singing, a diamond ring; and to M. Victor Massé, director of the choruses, diamond sleeve buttons. Such brilliant tokens of gratitude are not to be disdained, though often a few words of heartfelt acknowledgment possess greater weight and more real value. Amongst such, we must cite the letter of Mad. Girard, the widow of the late chef-d'orchestre, at this house, to the artists of the Conservatoire, thanking them for the concert they gave for her benefit, and in memory of the old chief. In a short time the Italian Opera will be deserted, and the foreign nightingales, that have so often charmed us there, will have taken wing. Last week, Tamberlik appeared in the part of Saliuto, in Donizetti's opera of the same name; Mesdames Penco and Merly filling the other characters. It was a grand "succès" for Tamberlik, who, with Mad. Penco, was recalled several times. Last Friday, Mad. Viardot's benefit took place at the Théâtre-Lyrique. Mad. Viardot sang the duo and sleep-walking scene of Verdi's Macbeth with Graziani, the third act of Gluck's Armide, and an air of Sonnambula. It were needless to add how brilliant was the success of her benefit, the many recalls, or the frantic applause—due, not only to her great talents, but also to the courage with which she has fought against the invasion of common-place and second-rate music on the stage. Who, after her fine creation of Orpheus, or her acting and singing in Armide, could tolerate the evanescent trash with which we are overwhelmed.

The concerts are still going on. Last week Duprez gave a concert, in which an opera entitled Jeanne d'Arc, the music by himself, the words by M. Edouard Duprez, was given. It was in three acts, with choruses, orchestra, decorations, &c. Mdlles. Marie Bennet, Battu, and Monrose, and M. Lefranc, sang the chief parts; the whole evening went off very successfully. The Association of the Musical Artists of France are preparing a solemnity of a new kind, to begin at the end of this month. It consists—not of a concert, but of a series of concerts, to be perpetuated from year to year. M. Beaulieu, of Nivet, is to be at the head of this. By his wish the concerts are to consist of the vocal music of the great masters, not usually performed in public, because it is not thought attractive enough. The music will be drawn from all schools, styles, and kinds, and the execution will be as fine as is humanly possible.

The weather here has been atrocious—snow, hail, wind, and rain. But so it is, apparently, all over the world. In Algeria snow has been falling, followed next day by siroccos. In Marseilles the same thing. But bad weather here never hinders gaiety; and as the time to leave Paris approaches, the fever grows fast and furious. Suppers, quite in the English style, are the fashion now. The other night a ball was given at the Marquis d'Aligré's, and dancing was prolonged all night: two suppers took place, and the guests departed at eight o'clock in the morning. That beats England. The grand ball, that has been as much talked of as a state affair, has come off, and nothing now remains but the brilliant recollection. The Empress did not wear her much-talked-of costume of Diana, but was in a domino. The great affair of the evening was the quadrille of the "Elements," composed of sixteen of the greatest ladies of the court and court society, with a beautiful Polish lady as the goddess of the Earth. But what fairy pen can describe the scarlet, and gold, and diamonds of fire; the ethereal blue of air (in which element Madame de Morny appeared) the pale translucent green and silver of water—the fruits and flowers of earth, whose fair representatives, more wonderful than Atlas, bore the globe on their heads. They performed a fancy quadrille, with, of course, the grace and charm only great ladies can. It is to be hoped such balls are not, in the interests of the Opera, to be given often, as the beau monde would quite desert that temple to gaze on the drawing-room performances of their fairer brethren. Imagine, however, all that is fairy-like, all that taste could devise or money procure, in the decorations of the room, the wondrous costumes of all nations and ages, animated butterflies, Spanish flies, &c., and you will have a faint view of the fancy ball. They say there is no romance left in France; but the little anecdote I now give you would contradict the saying: A very charming young widow, and a lady of high family, was walking some short time since towards home, when she heard a voice call two or three times, "Madame! Madame!" She turned round, thinking she had perhaps dropped something, when she found her accoster was a handsome and elegantly dressed young man, She was turning away, when he said, "For pity's sake, listen to me: I am dying of hunger." The lady gazed in astonishment at him. "It is not possible," she said, "dressed as you are." "It is all I have left," said he; "everything else I have sold." The lady reflected a moment, and then said, "There is my father's address; I am going home now, you can call in an hour." She went home, related the tale to her father, who at first thought she had been imposed on, but the entrance of the young man himself changed his ideas. He related his history. His father had been a minister under Louis Philippe, and left him a good fortune, which he had run through, and he was now in the state of extreme poverty he had described. The old gentleman asked him to dinner, went the next day and ascertained the truth of the history, asked him to his house two or three days running, got him a good appointment, and also got so attached to him, that he would no longer do without him. The lady's little boy, and the lady herself, shared the sentiment. The gentleman, it were needless to add, became deeply attached by gratitude and admiration, and, being of a good family, the dénouément is easily told—they have just been married.

JULLIEN FUND.

THE illness of M. Jullien having, with fatal rapidity, terminated in death, it has been resolved that the donations to the JULLIEN FUND shall be applied in the manner which would have been most in consonance with the wishes of the deceased had it been permitted him to express them, viz., to the relief of his widow and family, who, by his loss, are left totally unprovided for.

We may take this occasion of requesting our correspondents to aim at a little more clearness—not so much in their style as in their manuscript.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 12TH, 1860.

THE cantata of Christmas (produced for the first time at the last concert of the Musical Society of London*), will undoubtedly add to the high reputation already enjoyed by its composer, whose May-Day (originally produced at the Bradford Festival of 1856) created so lively an impression at one of the performances of the Musical Society of London, last year. That May-Day was a work of remarkable ability was universally admitted; but that Christmas has still greater merit is, we think, unquestionable. On the whole, it may be unhesitatingly stated, that no English musician, from the time of Purcell to the present epoch, has written anything in its way more genuine and masterly. With the poem, Mr. Macfarren has been quite as fortunate as in the instance of the Bradford cantata. The subject may be less essentially dramatic, but it has been treated by Mr. Oxenford so ingeniously that, in the absence of any bond fide story, we have a stirring dramatic scene, every incident of which is more or less interesting. The cantata opens with an antiphonal chorus, in which the two choirs alternately celebrate the dark and the bright side of winter. The grumblers begin:—

2nd Choir.—"The trees lift up their branches bare
Against the sky:
Through the keen and nipping air,
For spring's return they seem to cry,
As the winds with solemn tone
About them sadly moan."

Whereupon the advocates of the frosty period retort:—

1st Choir.—"Old Winter's hand is always free
He scatters diamonds round,
They dart their light from every tree,
They glisten on the ground.
Then who shall call the branches bare
When gems like those are sparkling there."

At the conclusion of this Penillion-like contest, the opponent minstrels chime together—in song, at least, if not in sentiment:—

2nd Choir.—"Come in, and closely shut the door
Against the wintry weather;
Of frost and snow we'll think no more,
While round the fire we sit together."

1st Choir.—"Rush out from every cottage door,
'Tis brave and bracing weather;
A madder throng ne'er met before,
Than those who now have come together."

The music expresses with great felicity the contending feelings suggested by the words—the strains allotted to the proselytes of winter being as energetic and jovial as those in which its detractors give vent to their antipathy are lugubrious. This fine choral introduction is succeeded by a recitative and romance for soprano, "Welcome blest season"—an apostrophe to Christmas, the general tone and purport of which may be gathered from the opening lines of the second division:—

"Christmas comes; and friends that long have parted
Meet to change the loving grasp once more;
Many who have wandered, weary hearted,
Gladly seek the old familiar door."

The soft and soothing character of this piece is in thorough keeping, and rarely have the endearing associations connected with the subject been wedded to more graceful melody. The romance gives way to the famous old English "carol," first given in unison by the chorus; then with harmony, on which two sections of the choir are engaged, while the other two sing the tune; and lastly, in combination with a new subject, in a different measure, allotted to the orchestra, the theme of the "carol" being sustained by the entire choir as a plain song. The effect of all this is as fresh and vigorous as the contrivance is masterly. The next division consists of a "Christmas tale"—for contralto solo, with chorus—

* Wednesday, May 9th.

"A bleak and kindless morning had broke on Althenay, Where, shunning Danish foemen, the good King Alfred lay."

This is built upon the story of King Alfred, on the eve of a victory over the Danes, relinquishing his last loaf of bread in favour of a mendicant pilgrim—and is so admirably treated in the poem, that had we space we should be tempted to cite it in extenso. We must be content, however, to add that the music is worthy of the poetry, and that in the introductory recitatives the imitation of the old English style of melody—which, by the way, is a prevalent and characteristic feature of the whole cantata—is here most signally successful. The burden, at the termination of each verse,—

"The heavenly King who reigns on high Bless him who hears the poor man's cry," first delivered by the solo voice, and then echoed, in full harmony, by the chorus—has something analogous to the response of the people in Mendelssohn's Elijah (Part I.), when the prophet petitions for rain, the serene loveliness of which, however, it modestly emulates, without in the slightest degree being open to the charge of plagiarism. An exquisite little duet for women's voices—"Little children, all rejoice"—agreeably contrasts with the foregoing. The words remind us that to manhood the enjoyment of to-day may be checkered with anxious thoughts for the morrow, while, to childhood, the happiness of the moment is all in all, tempered by no sad experience, weakened by no conflicting doubt. The contrast is well presented in the last four lines :—

"There is not a joy so true,
But we dread its change to sorrow;
Ah, it is not so with you,
Having days without a morrow."

Nothing can be more unaffected and spontaneous than the music to which Mr. Macfarren has wedded this duet. The finale—in chorus throughout—represents a festive celebration of the Christmas day's amusements, the various incidents that makes up the sum of its substantial cheer and innocent sports being successively portrayed in brief and appropriate terms. The mistletoe, with its envied privileges, is, of course, not overlooked. Here the chorus again assumes the antiphonal form, the first choir giving a (useless) warning :—

"Nay, be cautious, gentle maid,
As you pass that hanging bough
With the berries white arrayed;
For there's one has made a vow
That those lips he will invade;
And he'll keep it, we're afraid."

To which the second choir emphatically retorts by repudiating the idea of mistletoe-law ever being abolished. Perish the thought! The wassail-bowl, blind-man's buff, snap-dragon, &c., ad infinitum, are all remembered; and the subjoined "general chorus" brings this merry cantata to an end :—

"Varied sports the evening close,
Dancers form in busy rows;
Hoodwink'd lovers roam about,
Hope to find the right one out,
And when they fail how merry is the shout!
Round yon flickering flame of blue
Urchins sit—an anxious crew;
Dainties rich the bold invite,
While from the fire the timid shrink with fright.
Welcome all, welcome all,
'Tis merry now in the vaulted hall.
The mistletoe is over head,
The holly flaunts its berries red,
The wassail-bowl goes gaily round,
Our mirth awakes the echoes round,
All eyes are bright, all hearts are gay,
Thus ends our Christmas day."

In setting this concluding scene, Mr. Macfarren has produced a most effective and exhilarating climax to a composition that does him equal credit in an artistic and a national sense; the thoroughly English tone which he has maintained from first to last—while only interpolating one existing melody (the "carol")—being no less worthy of admiration than its abstract musical beauties, or the ingenious contrivance and successful treatment for which it is everywhere remarkable. A question might be legitimately raised as to whether, when—the subject-matter being national—the aim of a composer is to preserve a strictly national feeling, the point of view should be, invariably and as a sine qud non, taken from the English melody of between two and three centuries ago? No one will deny that the Italians, French, and Germans, have a national style of music at the present time; and yet Rossini, Auber, and Weber—who may fairly be accepted as types of their respective nationalities—have little or nothing in common with their harmonious ancestors of ages back. Christmas is as appropriate to the nineteenth as to the sixteenth century; and Mr. Oxenford might with quite as much justice have parodied the vernacular of Spenser and Jonson as Mr. Macfarren the melody that prevailed in the time of Elizabeth, or during that which succeeded the Restoration. We are bound to add that in Christmas this imitation of the elder melody is not slavishly done, and that several numbers—instance the romance (for soprano), the song about King Alfred (for contralto), and the charming duet for women's voices—while quite as English as the rest, are the unquestionable inspirations of an Englishman, by the side of whom even Sir Roger de Coverly would figure as an ancient. But in his choruses, Mr. Macfarren seems to have considered it indispensable to seek his tune at the same well as his forefathers. Were we not convinced that this gentleman is one of the few capable of writing music, neither Italian, French, nor German, nor even a mixture of the three, but purely English, and at the same time English of the period in which we live, we should have refrained from these remarks, and indeed from any critical objection, satisfied with awarding well-earned praise to a composition of distinguished merit and originality.

The performance on the whole was remarkable—considering that the work had only the benefit of a single rehearsal (a fact, by the way, of which the Musical Society of London, while professing so much, has no reason to brag). The principal singers—Madames Lemmens Sherrington and Sainton — were all the composer could possibly have desired, both in their solos and in their duet. The band, too, under Mr. Alfred Mellon, as usual, did wonders; but the chorus was by no means as efficient as might have been wished on such an occasion as the first public trial of a new and important work by an English composer. The audience, however, thoroughly delighted with the music, were not merely indulgent but enthusiastic in their applause. There is, indeed, every reason to believe that this performance will prove the forerunner of others, and that Christmas is destined to add one more to the brief catalogue of lasting musical works which our national repertory can boast.

IT was exactly a quarter past ten by the clock of the Edinburgh Castle, when in walked Panurge, with a thick book under his arm, looking so wondrously important, that even Pantagruel involuntarily touched his hat at his approach, and Epistemon bowed his head with reverence. As for John the Waiter, he executed an Oriental salam.

"I am going," said Panurge, "to write a comedy."

"Oh, is that all," said Pantagruel, cocking his hat on one side, and looking as insolent as possible, to compensate for his involuntary act of humility, while Epistemon took a pinch of snuff, and John the Waiter perked up his head, as if he thought himself a great deal better than his company.

"And mark," proceeded Panurge, not a whit daunted, "my comedy shall be original—ay, British original,—and it shall have a title such as no one hath ever devised. Yes, my comedy shall be called Borough-English; or, last come first served."

"Truly," said Pantagruel, restoring his hat to its normal position, "thy title is recondite and conceited."

"I like the humour of it much," observed Epistemon, while John the Waiter took up an empty tumbler, and, slowly cleansing it, listened to Panurge with almost idolatrous attention.

"Look ye, how I fashion my fable," continued Panurge, I have a designing Yorkshire mother."

"Hast thou, indeed?" said Epistemon.

"I mean I introduce such a personage in the play," said Panurge. "Now this designing Yorkshire mother contriveth that her daughter, Callirhoe, shall be engaged to the eldest son of a wealthy man of Kent, deceased before the commencement of the fable."

"Then she hath her way," observed Epistemon, "and, snapping her wicked fingers to the multitude, she may say:—

> '——— Populus me sibilat; at mihi plaudo, > Ipsa domi; simul ac nummos contempla in arca,' or she may place her thumb on her nose and extend her little finger, a form of mockery that, as perhaps thou knowest, correspondeth to the antique indignities enumerated by Persius, when he saith:—

> 'O Jane! a tergo quem nulla cicoria pinsit,
> Nec manus auriculas imitata est mobilis albas,
> Nec lingua, quantum sitiat Canis Appula, tantum.'

"Ay, ay," cried Panurge, "but this vile woman of Murcia, whom I pelt with the whole first satire of Horace, having first reduced the same into peas of wit, to be shot through the shooter of intellect,—this base Yorkshire mother shall find the truth of that sound maxim of Publius Syrus (the pet author, as thou knowest, of the Entr'Acte)—

> 'Cito improborum læta ad perniciem cadunt.'

"Which," remarked Pantagruel, with much affability, "is thus Hellenized by Joseph Scaliger:—

> 'ὡς εἰς κακὸν πίπτουσιν αἱ κακῶν τύχαι.'

"For mark you," resumed Panurge, "when she hath irrevocably bound her daughter to the man of Kent, she shall discover that the lands of the aforesaid man are subject to the ancient law of gavelkind, and that therefore he is compelled to divide his estate with his thirteen brothers."

"Gavelkind," murmured John the Waiter to himself, with intense respect, while a conveyancer's clerk, who had been devouring a chop with much vulgar noise, moved his jaws quietly, that he might the better attend to the discourse of Panurge.

"Her second daughter," continued Panurge, his cheeks swelling, and his eyes brightening with infinite pleasure, "she marrieth to the eldest son of another great family, which owneth half a county, and when the wedding is over she shall discover that the estates are all held by the tenure called 'Borough-English,' by virtue whereof they descend to the youngest son, to the exclusion of his seniors. Yea, and she shall be further mortified by the marriage of the younger son, whom she hath missed, with an humble girl, of whom she hath refused to purchase a ha'porth of lucifers."

"Thou dost grandly indicate the solemn tricks of the Goddess Fortune," remarked Epistemon, "whom thou reverently clothest with a judicial wig. This amalgamation of destiny with Coke upon Littleton is new."

"Panurge," said Pantagruel, "thy work is pregnant with sound morality. I respect thee as I never respected thee before. If thou studiest hard—if thou plungest deep into the comedies of Aristophanes, Plautus, and Terentius, feeding thy fancy with fragments of Menander, thou mayest in course of years write a play like the Goose with the Golden Eggs."

"Nay, nay," said Panurge, "I attempt not such sublimities. But I have not yet done. The designing mother marrieth her third daughter to the only son of a man who is possessed of two-thirds of a county, and whose estate is entailed."

"Egad!" cried Pantagruel, "thou hast well guarded thy astute Murcian against further freaks of fortune. She may burn Littleton with a fire made of his own coke. Ha! ha! blind goddess, what has become of thy Gavelkind and thy Borough-English now?"

"Yet," said Epistemon, "if the Yorkshire-woman triumpheth thy moral will be bad, and thou wilt have ill served the cause of virtue."

But she will not triumph!" shouted Panurge, while John, the waiter, rubbed his hands in a furor of expectation. "No, the entailed estate is limited to the issue of the father by his first marriage, which produced no increase to the population. The son is the result of a second marriage, and therefore will not touch a square foot of ground—beyond so much as is required for his burial—the father being what the jurists call a tenant-in-tail, after possibility of issue extinct, which is virtually the same thing as a tenant for life."

At this announcement Pantagruel and Epistemon, rising from their seats, gave a deafening cheer, in which they were joined by John the Waiter and the conveyancer's clerk, and after which, they (with the exception of John the Waiter), sat down.

"All these three vials of black-letter wrath," proceeded Panurge, "I pour at once on the head of the Yorkshire mother in the third act; but that the audience may not be too violently shocked and startled by the simultaneous explosion of Gavelkind, Borough-English, and possibility-of-issue-extinct, I break the fall, as it were, by the distribution of scraps of legal learning over the entire play. In every act a barrister shall come on, and read apposite portions from the second volume of Blackstone, winking, meanwhile, at the audience, and pointing to the crafty female."

"I think," said Pantagruel, reflectively, "that on the appearance of that barrister I shall retire for a while from the theatre, and take beer."

"The skeleton of the play is marvellous," said Epistemon. "I could say it is an exceedingly well-boiled skeleton; it is so amazingly dry. But with what flesh dost thou purpose to clothe it?"

"Here is flesh enough," exclaimed Panurge, opening the big book he had carried under his arm—"here is flesh enough to stock Leadenhall-market. This book containeth a vast treasury of phrases, which apparently combine the pungency of the jest with the virtue of the moral precept, and yet convey no meaning whatever. Thus do I take the shape of a Juvenal, but I really hit nothing, and thus everybody is pleased, while none are offended. I shall not have to say, like Horace—

'Sunt quibus in satira videor vincis acer;'

Nor on the other hand, shall I, like Horace, be pronounced 'sine nervis,' when they see how vigorously I use my scourge."

"I will liken thee to a boy," said Epistemon, "who lustily playeth at whipping-top without the top."

"Give us a taste of thy tragical mirth," said Pantagruel.

"Why, for instance," said Panurge, turning over his book, "a man shall say in a pointed manner, 'Virtue is like a gooseberry; the soundness of the pips doth not prevent the exuberance of the bristles.' To this another shall retort, 'Then compare it rather to the green gooseberry than to the red, for virtue is more allied to the verdure of innocence, than to the crimson of wrath.' Then a lady shall interfere and say—'Rather let virtues be compared to currants, for they grow on one stalk—and happy is the gardener who knoweth the position of the root. These be my playful conceits—but at times I will speak doctrinally. Thus my philosopher shall say: 'Love can no more exist without animosity than propinquity without fortitude;' and on another occasion, he shall remark:—'The universe is so balanced, that though vice kicketh the beam, the index trembleth at the ruddy glow of virtue.' But this is my crack sentence—my bonne bouche. An exceedingly venerable party shall say:—'In my early youth I heard a child cry for the moon, and I exclaimed, 'Fractious innocent, thou knowest not how soon the moon may cry for thee.'"

"Set down this in thy book," said Pantagruel, "Although the clock of the Edinburgh Castle seemeth to go backwards, when reflected in the looking-glass, yet need we not, on that account, send for the clockmaker."

"Add this," said Epistemon; "Those who open a book upside down, must not be astonished if they find the title-page at the end."

"Perhaps you will condescend to add this," suggested John, "He who gives exactly a shilling, when he is served with a shilling's worth of brandy and water, can scarcely expect the gratitude of the waiter."

"Thank ye, John," cried Panurge, "I will give that to my low comedian."

"And thy barrister may say this," observed the conveyancer's clerk, "A tenant without a joint for his dinner may nevertheless be a joint-tenant."

"But is there no probability that folks will grow weary of this discourse," asked Pantagruel. "I feel that the thought of it already inclineth me to slumber. Methinks thy play, read to Argus, would have answered the same end as the soporific lyre of Hermes."

"I have provided subtle antidotes against the possible tedium of mine own wit," answered Panurge. "Thus, whenever the dialogue in my first act shall be found dull, my second young man shall accidentally set light to a window-curtain, and occasion a vast consumption of red fire. The second act endeth with the explosion—very loud—of a gas-pipe."

"And the third act?" enquired Pantagruel.

"Ah, the third act will be safe enough, through the spice I shall put into the metrical tag, which will be somewhat in this fashion:—

'Although our scenes of ancient tenures treat,
Without your favour, they are incomplete;
From Gavelkind some int'rest we have sought,
But yet, if you're not kind, our gavel's nought;
Still, with this mighty thought, our hopes we clench,
That Borough-English is not Borough-French.
Our Act of Parliament contains this clause,
And pass it must, when back'd by your applause.'"

"On the night when thy play is acted," said Pantagruel gravely, "I will sit here, and thou shalt come and tell me of its fate."

"I," said Epistemon, "shall pursue the same course as my noble master, satisfied that I cannot go wrong in following so bright an example."

"And, Master Panurge," said John, "if you have any tickets to give away, let me have them for another night."

EATING is one of the pleasantest things in this world, especially when it is combined with drinking. It is certainly the first, and probably, also, the last of our enjoyments. As infants, we cry for food; as children, we fight for it; as youths we, for a time, perhaps, do not think so much of it as of less nutritious though more poetical delights; but when once the age of dreams has passed, the taste for eating reasserts itself, and does not again desert us until the banquet of life is fairly at an end, and our mouths are shut for ever.

Full of these solemn thoughts, three travellers might have been observed, the Friday before last, wending their way towards St. Martin's Church cab-stand.

"Hansom?" inquired five sonorous voices.

"No," answered the travellers, for there were three of them, "we want a four-wheeler."

Joyfully, and with tolerable appetites, the trio caused themselves to be driven to the London Bridge station, where, having provided themselves with tickets, they entered a train about to start for the Crystal Palace. For three hours they listened to the solemn strains of the Elijah, and thought how much better they had heard it performed at Exeter Hall. Then there was a talk of dinner, for the three were outrageously hungry; but the least voracious of the party having suggested that it would be as well to see the statue of Mendelssohn uncovered before dining, the wished-for meal was postponed until, to the discordant accompaniment of a military band, a cloth was removed from the head of the marble Mendelssohn. The unimposing ceremony having been completed, "Let us dine!" said the three amateurs.

"Let us dine!" responded each to the voices of the two others, and the only question now was, where the dinner could be procured.

"It must be good!" said one, for he was not only a-hungered, but was now faint and weary from much pushing, and in urgent need of a succulent and stimulating repast.

"It must be particularly good," added the second, bent upon compensating himself for his long abstinence.

"It must be infernally good!" exclaimed the third, whose delicate stomach was suffering from a vacuum which it abhorred.

There are four categories of dining places at the Crystal Palace, corresponding more or less to the four estates of the realm; with the notable variation, however, that the press—which all who are treated civilly by it admit to be the fourth estate—makes it a rule to regale itself in the first dining-room. The three lovers of music did or did not belong to the press, but, at all events, they determined to feast in the first or five-shilling banqueting hall, where, for a crown, you may have soup, fish, entrées, toasts, salad, ice-pudding and desert — if you can only prevail upon the waiter to bring them to you. Our would-be diners could not even prevail upon the waiters to find them seats, which, it is true, would have involved the ejection of those already sitting down. Indeed, the only advance made to them was from the man who sat at the receipt of custom, and who kindly proposed that they should pay their money, and take their chance. This liberal offer was not accepted.

"Go we," said he of the delicate stomach, "to the second dining-place, where, for four shillings, joints reeking hot, vegetables, salad, and a species of pastry may be obtained."

"But no," said the more Epicurean of his two friends; "for where there is a best and a second best, the best alone is for such as we; and though Strange be an honest man, yet surely he is no fool, and for four shillings would not give one anything worth the eating."

"Let us eat of what we can get," urged the third, piously; "Men have dined for four shillings before now; besides," he added, "we can have extras."

The money-taker at dining-place No. 2, did not positively object to take their double florins from the hungry men, but as the tables were full the opportunity was not allowed him.

Then the enemy of four-shilling dinners cried out in his adversity (for his appetite sorely troubled him), that a two-shilling dinner was good enough for the like of him, and by force of entreaty prevailed upon his not really unwilling companions to follow him to the two-and-twopenny establishment—the twopence, we must explain, being a tax levied for the special benefit of the waiter.

For two shillings?—no, not for twenty pounds, could the unfortunate three have obtained eating-room in the dining-place of the third category.

There was now only one course open to them—to those men who longed for three courses. It was a terrible alternative, but they had to make up their minds either to enter the eighteen-penny saloon devoted to the consumption of cold meat, and attack such beef and ham as might be within their reach, or to depart dinnerless from the Crystal Palace.

Four and sixpence was paid, or rather five shillings, for here, as at the other refectories, it is found advisable to secure the waiter's fee beforehand. And the precaution is intelligible enough, for who, with a full knowledge of a waiter's incapacity, would, of his own free will, give him twopence for not being waited upon? However, the three tickets were purchased, the vendor saying politely, as he handed them to the hungry ones, "You must get your dinners as you can."

The recommendation was both sensible and kind, but it was all very well to say "Get your dinners as you can;" these men could not get them at all. They admit, it is true, that after a delay of a quarter of an hour, some pieces of bread in a fossil state, two knives with blots of mustard on the blades, three pewter forks, and an apology for having no clean tankards for bitter ale, were brought to them. They affirm that ten minutes afterwards three platefuls of whitish beef were laid before them, and further aver that the said and so-called beef was in flavour by no means bovine.

The three travellers having now tried in vain every possible means of obtaining a dinner, hot or cold, cheap or dear, at the Crystal Palace, had evidently nothing to do but to confound the tardy waiter and the tasteless beef and travel back to London, where they dined and (by the blessing of Moet) drank in a style of befitting luxury.

After the second bottle, one of the three said—"I thought Strange managed the refreshment department so admirably?"

"D—— Strange!' exclaimed one of the others.

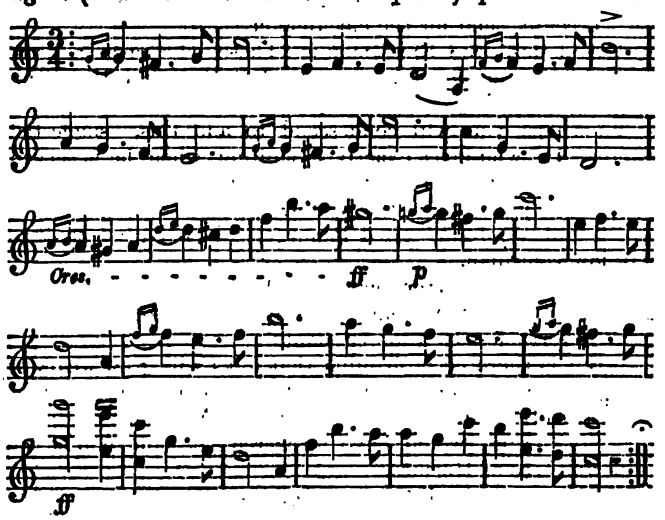
"I quite agree with the last speaker," remarked the third; "but why," he inquired, "do they publish such things as this about him?"

And taking up an evening paper, he read aloud one of the well-known paragraphs in which the abilities of Mr. Strange, as a caterer for the public, are set forth.

"I'll tell you," said the gentleman with the weak stomach; but, as the waiter at this moment made his appearance with a fresh bottle, he omitted to explain.

JULLIEN'S LAST WALTZ.*

WE are much in error if the publication just issued by Messrs. Boosey, under the above title, fails to cite universal interest. As we have seen the manuscript, we can testify to the genuineness of its authorship; and assuredly this last production in his especial line of one who wrote such a multitude of charming dance-pieces, deserves the attention of all upon whom this genial and attractive form of music exercises a sway. In premising that "Jullien's Last Waltz" is quite worthy of the pen that traced the Rosita Waltz, the Original Polka, the Prima Donna Waltz, the Moldavian Schottische, and a dozen more things as perfect in their way, we bring forward enough to prove that Jullien's melodic invention was as bright and happy towards the end as at any earlier period of his life. We cannot afford room for more than a short extract; but let the first theme of the first figure (of which we must cite the top line) speak for itself:



A more graceful, gentle, unaffected tune was never found by composer to set the feet in motion. It is as pretty, too, as it is graceful, and once heard, will for ever remain a pleasant consoler, when, the heart being depressed, the mind's ear conjures it up from the hidden recesses of the memory.

Poor Jullien! he should have lived to write a hundred such. He was a Strauss in his way, although those who knew him well are aware that he had that within him of which a Strauss, however gifted, could never have dreamed.

* "Jullien's Last Waltz," (Boosey and Sons.)

ARTIST'S VOLUNTEER RIFLE CORPS.—At a general meeting of the corps, held on Tuesday last, the following nominations were made for officers:—A. J. Lewis, Esq., F. Leighton, Esq., and A. Nicholson, Esq.; Lieutenant Phillips to be Captain of the 2nd Company; Ensign Millais to be Lieutenant. By the untiring exertions of Viscount Bury, Captain Commandant, the corps has made rapid progress towards efficiency, in company and battalion movements, and the various exercises with the rifle are gone through with remarkable steadiness. Amongst the musical members of the corps already enrolled are Messrs. H. Blagrove, R. Blagrove, Barnby, Cusins, Ciabatta, Wilbye Cooper, Cummings, Deichmann, Deane, Hullah, T. Harper, C. Harper, jun., Malsch, Nicholson, Newsham, Perugini, Payton, Perks, Radcliff, Sims Reeves, Severn, Montem Smith, Schroeder, J. Thomas, H. Thomas, Lewis Thomas, Turner, Watson, Waltzig, A. White, Winn, &c.

MOZART—CHILD AND MAN.

The Same to the Same.

Milan, October 20th, 1770.

We arrived here on the 18th, after staying a whole day at Padua. The Philharmonic Academy of Bologna has unanimously admitted Wolfgang among its members, and delivered to him the letters patent. This was done without all the usual forms and preliminary ordeals. On the 9th September, at four o'clock in the afternoon, Wolfgang was obliged to appear in the hall of the academy. There the princeps academiæ and the two censors (who are all old-chapel masters) gave him an anthem from the antiphonary, which he had to arrange for four voices in an adjoining apartment to which he was conducted, and shut up under lock and key by the apparitor. When he had finished, it was examined by the censors and all the chapel masters and composers, and the votes were taken with black and white balls. All the balls came out white. He was called in; at his entrance the applause was general, and congratulations greeted him from every side. After the princeps had intimated to him his admission, he returned thanks, and the thing was done. During this time I was shut up in another direction, in the library of the academy, with the persons who accompanied me. Everyone was astonished that he should have executed his task so rapidly, seeing that many have been three hours finishing an anthem of three lines. But you must know that it is by no means an easy matter; for this species of composition excludes a number of things which cannot be admitted into it, of which he was informed beforehand. He had finished in something more than half-an-hour. The apparitor brought us the diploma of the establishment. Among other things it contains these words—"Testamur Dominum W. A. M. inter Academiæ nostræ MAGISTROS compositores adscriptum fuisse."

P. S. from Wolfgang.—My dear Mamma, I cannot write, my fingers ache with writing recitatives. I beseech, you dear mother, to pray for me that my opera may succeed, and that afterwards we may all happily meet together. I kiss your hands a thousand times, and to you, dear sister, I shall have a thousand things to say. But when? God knows, and God alone. If it be God's will I will open my heart to you, and that ere long, I hope. Meanwhile, I embrace you a thousand times. And so we have lost poor Martha. We shall join her, with God's help, in a better world.

The Same to the Same.

Milan, October 27th, 1770.

We shall leave Milan, with God's help, after the middle of January. We shall proceed to Venice by way of Brescia, Verona, Parma, Vicenza, and Padua, and await at Venice the end of the carnival and a few concerts during lent, which is, they say, the best time for making one's appearance. I should like to return through Carinthia, for I have seen the Tyrol, and have no pleasure in travelling the same road twice, like the dogs.

We often had a visit from Misliwetschek, at Bologna, and frequently went to see him. He wrote an oratorio at Padua, and is starting for Bohemia. He is a man of honour, and we have contracted a sincere friendship with him.

P. S. from Wolfgang.—All-beloved sister! Thou knowest I am a great chatterbox, and that nevertheless I have abandoned you. What is to be done? I no longer speak, and only make signs, for the son of the family is deaf and dumb. But my time is chiefly spent in writing my opera. I am very sorry I cannot serve you for the minuets you desire; however, if it be God's will, you shall receive them at Easter and myself into the bargain. I know nothing more. Adieu, pray for me.

The Same to the Same.

Milan, November 3rd, 1770.

Wolfgang thanks you for all your good wishes on his anniversary, and he hopes, when God shall permit, to see each other again to become your joy and happiness, by realising all that you desire concerning him.

For the rest there is nothing new. We await with impatience the new year, or at least Christmas. Until then there will ever be something to be done, something to think of, something to apprehend; a failure may perhaps await us—oranges instead of bouquets—and consequently anxious and agitated days. Patience! So many enterprises have succeeded with us, God be praised, and have turned to our honour. We shall, in like manner, with God's assistance, pass safely through the annoyances and inevitable grievances which every chapel-master has to endure from the rabble of virtuosi (virtuosen-canaille).

P. S. from Wolfgang.—All beloved little sister of my heart, thanks for your good wishes! I am consumed with longing to see you again at Salzburg. To return to the subject of your congratulations. I almost suspected it was M. Martinelli who had drawn up your Italian phrase. But as you still preserve your character of Mother Prudence, and have had the sense to subjoin immediately after, in Italian, the compliments of M. Martinelli, I was ashamed of my suspicions, and I said to papa, "Good Heavens, when shall I possess as much wit and wisdom as my sister?" "Yes," replied my father, "it is true!" Whereupon I rejoined, "I am sleepy," "Well," said he, "then lay down your pen;" The which I am doing. Adieu. Pray God my opera may succeed. I am, your brother, tired of writing.

No. 88.

The Same to the Same.

Milan, November 10, 1770.

When from time to time my kind friends add, as they lately did, a piece of pleasantry to their letters, they really perform a work of charity, for Wolfgang is at this moment so seriously occupied, and, therefore, so serious, that I am glad when anything amusing falls into his hands. Let my friends pardon my silence. I am less apt at writing than ever. Thou wilt be astonished one day at the large share of presence of mind, prudence, and foresight required of us to escape safely out of the storm. We have, God be thanked, gained the first battle, and beaten an enemy who betook himself to the prima donna, with the pieces which she was to sing, persuading her to refuse those of Wolfgang. We have all these pieces here. They are quite new. Neither she nor ourselves know who has composed them. She refused them all at the hands of this plotter, and she is beyond herself with joy at the pieces which Wolfgang has composed for her according to her wishes and desires; her Maestro Lamprignani, who has rehearsed her part with her, praises it unceasingly to the skies. Another storm is gathering in the theatrical horizon, which we can descry afar off. We shall weather it with a little dexterity and help from Above. But do not get wondering at all this; these are inevitable occurrences which happen to the greatest masters. Provided we keep our health, the rest is nothing. All this is not to be taken too much to heart.

No. 89.

The Same to the Same.

Milan, November 17, 1770.

Wolfgang has had his usual cold.

Between this and yesterday we have encountered the second storm. Whatever may yet happen, and all sorts of difficulties are likely to arise, we are full of hope. It is a rare piece of good fortune to see in Italy an opera gain the approving votes of every one. Too many factions exist to prevent it. One thing is certain, however, that we have surmounted many obstacles. We shall also get over the storm actually raging. We usually go out a-walking in the afternoon, for I will not have Wolfgang write after meals, except under the most pressing necessity.

You imagine the opera is finished—you are greatly mistaken. As regards our son, he would have had time to finish two operas. But in Italy everything goes to the devil's content. The primo uomo does not arrive till to-day. Wolfgang is waiting for him to write his second air; he does not want to have double work, and prefers that he should be here, in order to make the coat to his measure.

GREAT NATIONAL ENTERPRISE

Organised in 1848, and developed at THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC BRIDGE STREET, MANCHESTER, established by him expressly as a Great National Institution to facilitate the Encouragement and Promotion of NATIVE MUSICAL TALENT, and the GENERAL ADVANCEMENT OF MUSIC AMONG THE RISING GENERATION, upon his new and effective system, also as a NORMAL SCHOOL for the training of masters to conduct CONSERVATOIRES OF MUSIC to be established throughout the United Kingdom, for LITTLE CHILDREN, the whole comprising an entirely new scheme of NATIONAL EDUCATION, by blending music with general instruction, so that the study of music shall become a branch of education in the humblest of schools of this country. To illustrate and to rouse an interest in every town and city for these institutions, Dr. Mark travels with a number of his pupils occasionally through the country—giving lectures, and introducing his highly approved and pleasing Musical Entertainment, entitled DR. MARK AND HIS LITTLE MEN, who number upwards of Thirty Instrumentalists, and a most Efficient Chorus, the whole forming a most unique and complete Juvenile Orchestra, composed of LITTLE ENGLISH, IRISH, SCOTCH AND WELCH BOYS, FROM FIVE TO SIXTEEN YEARS OF AGE, who play Operatic Selections, Solos, Marches, Quadrilles, Galops, &c., and sing Songs and Choruses in a most effective manner, and to whom Dr. Mark gives a gratuitous General and Musical Education.

MUSICAL NEWSPAPER

REVIEWS.

"Six Songs, with English and German words," (Op. 2)—C. A. BARRY, M.A. (Ewer and Co). There is very decided merit in all these songs, and some few traits of originality. To begin with the most laboured and least genial (though by no means without good points); Heinrich Heine's ballad, "Du Schönes Fischermädchen" (No. 6), had been already set so well by Meyerbeer, that Mr. Barry would have done wisely, in this instance, to choose some other text. Compare the two melodies. Mr. Barry sets out as follows:—

Du schö-nes Fischer-mädchen, trei-be den Kahn an's Land, Komm zu mir, und set-ze dich nie-der wir Ko-sen Hand in Hand, komm zu mir, und set-ze dich nie-der, wir Ko-sen Hand in Hand.

M. Meyerbeer as follows:—

Which is the freshest, simplest and most genuine, our readers will not take long, we think, to decide. Mr. Barry has set the passage, "Leg' an mein Herz dein Kopfchen," beautifully—something, indeed, after the manner of Schubert. No. 1—"Nachtreise" ("night-journey")—words by Uhland—has a plaintive melody, from which (as from the harmony) the style of Schubert again peeps out. The alteration of melody and harmony in the last verse, is both happy and ingenious. No. 2—"Ich hab im Traum geweinet," (poet not named), is charming from first to last—charming alike in harmony and expression. No. 3—"Des knaben Berglied" (poet not named)—is even more striking, the most original, perhaps, of the series; unless, perhaps, exception be made in favour of No. 4—"Du bist wie eine Blume" (poet unnamed), one feature of which is of the two-four and six-eight measures. There are some exquisite points in this little song; and, among others, the entire progression to the words—"Betend das Gott dich erhalte so rein und schön und hold." A passage near the end is well worth quoting:—

No. 5—"Lebewohl" (poet unnamed)—although strongly tinged with the Mendelssohnian feeling, is lovely from end to end; but as really every bar is more or less worthy praise, we must abandon any idea of quoting examples. It is long since we have seen so much to admire in a new set of songs.

"The Worcestershire Rifles' March"—for the pianoforte—MATTHIAS VON HOLST (Boosey and Sons)—is inscribed to the "Volunteer Corps of the City and County." Why did not Herr von Holst begin (while about it) thus:—

The reminiscence of the so-called clock-movement, in one of Haydn's symphonies, would, by the addition of the four semiquavers in bar 2, have been still more frank and genuine. The best part of this march is the trio, in the dominant—pages 4 and 5.

"La Nadiejda, polka gracieuse"—for the pianoforte—MATTHIAS VON HOLST (Cramer and Co., Boosey and Sons, and Mills). This is an extremely graceful and well-written piece from end to end, and none the worse for the tendency it occasionally exhibits to Spohrish harmony. There is one passage, however, occuring several times, which we cannot admire:—

On the repetition of this progression the D's are invariably marked natural, and the effect is infinitely purer.

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.

"PROPOSAL" FOR A 64 FEET ORGAN.

THE present Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's are deserving of the highest commendation for the praiseworthy efforts they are making to embellish and furnish the interior of the cathedral church, and thus in some measure repair, not only the omissions and shortcomings of the niggard, arbitrary, and obstructive building commissioners, but the utter neglect of successive deans and chapters through the century and a half that has intervened, in allowing (whilst having vast funds at their disposal, uncontrolled by any other body), the noble edifice to continue the mere shell it has done up to this day. But to decorate the interior of St. Paul's in a manner suitable to the character of the edifice and becoming to its position as the Metropolitan Cathedral of the British Isles—and subscription the only source of the wherewith to do it—no small task is before them, and I say God-speed to their purpose.

In a former paper (Musical World, December 17th), I mentioned the circumstance of the gratifying announcement that the old organ had been made one of the earliest matters of solicitude by the chapter, a thousand pounds—or perhaps fifteen hundred pounds—of their already subscribed funds having been resolved to be expended in renewals of certain worn out portions of old Father Smith's work, and augmenting the powers of the instrument by the addition of much other new. But the same announcement conveyed the intelligence that the recently oft-repeated cause, Architects versus Cathedral Organ Screens, had also been argued here, and decision given on the plaintiff's side, consequent on which verdict the organ is, after all, to be sacrificed by being cleared away from its own admirable position, and stuck up in a place out of sight, where, from the massy dead walls with which it will be hemmed in, it can produce but very poor effect—in the body of the Cathedral at least—however glorious an instrument Mr. Hill's work may leave it.

The screen still stands in its place, though the organ is taken down off it. And it would seem there exists in the chapter some hesitation as to the adherence to their verdict. There is also some talk of their getting another organ expressly for serving the dome and services. In the interim of this unsettlement of purpose, I would call attention to the circumstance of an old "proposal" for an organ for St. Paul's, which seems to me particularly apropos to the present time.

The choir of St. Paul's was the first portion of the edifice that was finished; this was opened some ten years before the main building was completed. The first service was on the day of thanksgiving for the peace of Ryswick, December 2, 1697, and the present organ—the most celebrated work of the celebrated "Old Father Smith"—was in its place, and used on that occasion. When afterwards the building of the main edifice was drawing towards a finish, and the body of the cathedral thrown open, it was intended that there should be a second organ in the church, and which was to stand in a loft on the parclose of the morning chapel (a little-known sanctuary in St. Paul's occupying the north-west angle of the building, approached by the north aisle, and in size about one-third that of the choir), and an organ was made for the purpose also by Father Smith, but from some cause or other the design was not carried out, and the instrument went to Trinity Church, Hull, where it still is.* It would appear that Renatus Harris, better known as "René Harris"—perhaps the most original genius in the organ-making line that ever practised the art in this country, contemporary with, and ultimately the rival of the aforesaid Father Smith, was a candidate for employment on this occasion. His proposition was to construct an instrument for St. Paul's that should in appearance be on a scale in keeping with the vast and glorious building itself, and of power sufficient to resound throughout the whole of the cathedral. Some particulars of the circumstance is handed down to us by a paper in the Spectator of the time (No. 552) by Mr. Steele, purporting to be a "recommendation of a proposal by Renatus Harris, organ builder," wherein are these words:—"The ambition of the artificer is to erect an organ in St. Paul's Cathedral over the west door, at the entrance into the body of the church, which in art and magnificence shall transcend any work of the kind ever before invented. The proposal in perspicuous language sets forth the honour and advantage such a performance would be to the British name, as well that it would apply the power of sounds in a manner more amazingly forcible than perhaps has yet been known, and, I am sure, to an end much more worthy. Had the vast sums which have been laid out upon operas without skill or conduct, and to no other purpose but to suspend or vitiate our understandings, been disposed this way, we should now, perhaps, have an engine so formed as to strike the minds of half the people at once in a place of worship with a forgetfulness of present care and calamity, and a hope of endless rapture, joy and hallelujah hereafter."

René Harris, doubtless, had in view a 32-feet organ—at the period a thing wholly unknown in England; and the expressions made use of in "the recommendation" would seem also to imply that something in the way of our modern tuba work was contemplated. But 32-feet organs have since that epoch become common, not only on the Continent, but in England also: hence a work that is at this day to "transcend any work of that kind ever before invented"—realising the spirit of René Harris's proposal—must be constructed on the 64-feet scale—such scale never having been (practically, at least) attempted.

It occurred to me that there was much in this "proposal" that renders a revival of the project at this time worthy of serious consideration, and the object of the following is an endeavour to show that the measure is practicable, and, accomplished, would be useful, and "pay."

The great cathedrals of the Continent are generally supplied with at least two organs,* one for the accompaniment of the ordinary services of the choir, and the other a larger one (usually situated at the west end of the nave) for use on special occasions only. This is just how it should be at St. Paul's; and what a grand position the western end of the nave there presents for the erection of an extraordinary work of the kind! How a loft may be erected for the reception of an organ, at a height of eighteen feet from the floor of the church (that is obtaining three feet more of headway for passage underneath than is under the old screen through which the choir is entered), having a clear height thence to the vaulting of the nave of seventy feet sufficient for taking the pipe of the 64-feet register. Nor need the erection interfere with the light of the great west window, for such an arrangement in the "planting" of the pipes in the interior of the instrument might be observed—the design of the exterior case being made to partake in its form of the same—as would not only allow of the view of all the chief existing architectural features of the building being preserved, but also of the great window being seen through the structure of the organ. A successful example of which arrangement exists in that grandest of all organ works, the abbey church of Weingarten in Germany. And this provision in the form of the case would at the same time neutralise the effect of an apparent shortening of the nave of the church which the advance of the body of the instrument, some thirty feet as its length, might be supposed to cause to the detriment of the symmetrical proportions of this limb of the church. An organ of the magnitude here implied, set in a case of artistic form, with florid adornment in keeping with the architecture of the building, presenting a front of towers composed in gigantic diapasons with intervening tiers of buffets tastefully worked in smaller pipes, would form a termination of the vista of the interior of the cathedral westward, grand and imposing, ornamenting and furnishing a part of the great church, now a mere wilderness. In order to economise space, the mechanism connected with the wind—of which steam, or perhaps the hydraulic apparatus should be the motive power—might all be placed in the vaults beneath the church, the pillars supporting the organ-loft to serve also for the wind trunks.

There are at least two annual music-meetings held at St. Paul's, each of really national character, viz., the Musical Festival of the Society of the Sons of the Clergy, and the annual gathering of the children of the London Parochial Schools, to both of which such an instrument would necessarily be an invaluable acquisition. The Musical Festival of the Sons of the Clergy, of 1855, was given on a greatly augmented scale in that year, in celebration of the second centenary anniversary of the institution of the society.

I attended that performance, and observing that "old Father Smith," in order to bear up in the "tutti" against a chorus of the two hundred voices engaged on that occasion, had to be reinforced by the aid of a dozen or more of trumpets, trombones, and drums; and it occurring to me at the same time that monster exhibitions in the musical way had become established as the more publicly favoured performances of the day, I was forcibly reminded of this "proposal" of René Harris's, of a century and-a-half ago. And now that the subject of embellishing and furnishing the interior of St. Paul's is being considered, the advisability of embracing in that work Harris's "proposal," carried out in its integrity, is commended to notice as offering to supply at once a great want and a magnificent ornament. Although the old organ, with its pending improvements, may prove—as I doubt not it will—everything that can be desired for the use of the ordinary cathedral services, yet its powers will still be wholly inadequate to the requirements of the occasions above referred to, and this eking out an insufficient organ by appending thereto a number of trombones, trumpets, and drums, is a makeshift unseemly and out of character.

I think the majesty of the organ is degraded by the intrusion of such auxiliaries in church service. Without presuming a word in depreciation of the use of these and kindred instruments in the orchestral accompaniment of voices, I maintain that organ and voices alone, in church, are far more impressive.†

A choral service sung by such a choir as was collected on the occasion of the 1855 anniversary—the choral establishments of St. Paul's; the Chapel Royal, Westminster Abbey; St. George's, Windsor; and some

* Trinity Church, Kingston-upon-Hull, is the high church of that seaport. It is a large crucifixion structure with massive tower rising from the intersection of the cross, and is a genuine example of the decorated style of early English architecture. The organ above referred to was set up in the Church in 1808, in a fine carved oak case of four front towers, same design as the beautiful instrument of Whitehall Chapel. All the fluework of Father Smith still remains. The reeds (very fine ones) were by George England about fifty years ago. At a recent repair of the instrument considerable alterations were made in it, and at the same time the original beautiful oak case was removed, and a paltry deal one of mock Gothic design substituted. The old case is now in the church of Soulcotes in that town, where it encloses a new organ.

* St. Peter's, Rome, has four organs. Seville Cathedral seven, two of which are very large ones. St. Anthony's, Padua, four. Breslau Cathedral three, all very large.

† In the opinion here expressed regarding the intrusion of instruments of secular character on the organ in church service, I am supported by Mr. Mason, no mean authority.—See Mason's Essays on Church Music, pp. 71, 82.

eight or ten of the more adjacent provincial theatres—supported by the accompaniment of an organ of transcendent depth of tone and fulness of great register harmony, would—bearing in mind, too, at the same time, the choice nature for that particular purpose of the whole vocal material employed—be a celebration calculated to afford the lovers of our orthodox church service the most intense delight.

And what an opportunity would then be afforded of producing at these performances, perhaps the most sublime and soul-stirring musical effect within the province of the "divine art" to achieve! That is by adopting the arrangement of a double quire, one with each organ, at opposite ends of the church, chanting the service antiphonally after the ancient manner of decani and cantorus sides, and culminating to a climax by both choirs joining together with the two organs in bursts of joyful exultation in the doxologies. Although the distance in the separation of the choirs will be great, yet the necessary precision in the performance could be insured by the precentor (conductor) being placed midway along the nave, elevated so as to be visible at once to each choir and its organist. This idea, of course, contemplates not only the erection of the new organ at the western end of the nave, but also the old organ being restored to its old place on the choir screen, or, as suggested in my former paper (Musical World, Dec. 17), organ and screen being set back to the line of the junction of the choir with the dome, that is about 25 feet west of the old position.

A grand sacred choral gathering like this, or even doubled as the choral band might be by making it to embrace all the cathedral establishments of the Kingdom, would recuscitate the musical portion of the Festival of the Sons of the Clergy, now fast expiring; changing the usually public exhibition at once to a performance in the last degree attractive. At the same time transferring the operations of the treasury department from an exhausted mine to new and more productive diggings, whence the corporation may become enriched with, possibly, several additional thousands a year, with which to extend its usefulness.*

* There are two charitable societies under analogous names. The "Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy," and the "Society of the Festival of the Sons of the Clergy." They work in separate spheres, but to the same great charitable ends—viz., the affording of pecuniary aid to incapacitated clergymen, necessitous widows, and offspring of deceased clergymen, and the providing of educational grants and apprentice premiums. The first-named—the principal one—was established in 1678, and administers the funds of both, which amounts to about £3,800 per annum, arising from endowments, voluntary contributions, and the proceeds of the annual festival. The other society, though subsidiary to the last, is nevertheless the older one. It dates from 1655, when it was instituted for the benefit of those widows and orphans of the established clergy who had been reduced to indigence by the parliamentary sequestrations which were enforced against the clergy, consequent on the great rebellion. Its operation is merely to raise funds for the before-mentioned purposes, and consists in an anuual assemblage of the highest authorities in the church and state. When divine service is held (full choral, with additional music by a choir composed of the establishments of the Chapel Royal, Westminster Abbey, and St. Paul's), in the cathedral church of St. Paul, and a sermon preached, to which the public are admitted by free tickets from the stewards, but the persons who use them must present a donation at the door of entrance. At a certain door the donation is expected to be not less than gold; at other doors, not less than half-crowns, &c. In former times this may have yielded a good fund, but of late years this has much declined, the performance being now totally devoid of anything like public interest. The anniversaries passing over year after year, without anyone knowing anything of their occurrence, except that, perhaps, on "the day after the fair," when the newspaper notices of the performance tell that it has taken place.

In the year 1855—a year selected for example from no other reason but that of chance having brought the fact to the notice of the writer—the money taken at the doors amounted to only £119.

A dinner, however, after the service, at Merchant Tailors' Hall, appears to be much more productive. In these combined ways, something like £1,000 or £1,300 is annually added to the corporation funds. The stewards to the festival are expected to contribute at least thirty guineas (and which qualifies the donor for a governor of the corporation), out of these latter donations are paid the expenses of the musical performance, &c., so that the proceeds of the day is handed over to the corporation intact. Now it must be felt by all who will for a moment think on the matter, that the proceeds of the sacred musical performance—considering the importance of the charity, and the extent and influence of the interest that might be brought to bear to its furtherance and support, is extremely insignificant. And Nor is it irrelevant to the matter under discussion, I think, to remark that by making these meetings the occasion of a grand annual ecclesiastical demonstration, the general interests of the church may be materially served.

As respects the other musical performance referred to—viz., the annual assemblage at St. Paul's of the London Parochial Schools, such an instrument would be brought into admirable use, and its utmost power not more than sufficient for the occasion. The psalmodic portion of this service, rendered by the myriad choir of sparkling infant voices—if the very peculiar effect of such a mass of shrill unisonous treble as the performance now presents were toned down and harmonised by the ponderous and mighty bass that would roll from such an organ, would, aided by the influence of a most imposing spectacle, produce an effect on an auditory impressive and wonderful beyond conception; and surely the power to draw this would create, might be turned to some account to the furtherance of the work the meetings are intended to promote.*

the question arises: could not much more be made of the performances by shaking off the antiquated proceedings by which they continue, year after year, to be silently conducted, and adopting instead a more business-like and enterprising procedure in the management, and so produce performances that will, of their own merit and due publicity, draw the public.

Out of these societies arose, in 1749, "The Incorporated Clergy Orphan Society," whose establishments are at St. John's Wood and Canterbury, and is still connected herewith, though separately worked.

* This exhibition consists in the assemblage at St. Paul's of the children of the numerous parochial schools that are clothed and educated by charity. One first took place in 1782, and has been annually repeated ever since; the object being twofold, viz., to popularise the maintenance of charity schools, and to obtain funds for the assistance of the more necessitous schools attending. The picturesque aspect of some 7,000 or 8,000 children dispersed on raised platforms round the gigantic nave of the cathedral, the tiers of benches gradually elevated to more than half the height of the pillars upon which the dome reposes—decked out in party colours with banners to represent the various schools, from which they are sent as missionaries—the boys separated from the girls, and the whole mass arranged with an eye to symmetry and pleasing contrast, presents a spectacle the magnificent effect of which could not be matched throughout the world. In the central portion of the dome area and nave provision is made for the accommodation of an auditory of about 10,000 persons. Divine service is performed, and the children all join in the singing of the psalmodic portion of the service (in which they are previously well tutored in sections), and the effect of this combined song is most extraordinary. The immortal Haydn, visiting St. Paul's on the occasion of one of these gatherings, and hearing a "hymn" sung by the whole assemblage of children, was moved to tears, and declared that the simple and natural air had given him the greatest pleasure he had ever received from music.

This incident is drawn from Haydn's Diary while in England in 1791 and 1794. The "hymn" here alluded to is what is now known as Jones's double chant in D. Jones was at the time organist of St. Paul's, and the piece of music was composed by him expressly for the purpose, and the manner of its performance is thus described in a note by the Editor of the Diary. "The first strain (which it will be remembered is A, the reciting note descending afterwards by three stops, a 3rd twice, and a 4th to the octave below) was sung by the choir, accompanied by the organ, the 4,000 children assembled, and who were well instructed for the purpose, responded in the second portion; the third strain was then given in the manner of the first, and the fourth by the children in a similar way to the second: altogether producing an effect that baffles description, and which could not have failed to operate with extraordinary force on such strong religious feelings, united to such susceptibility of musical effect, as the great composer possessed."

This remarkable exhibition is, however, now languishing for want of support, and likely soon to be discontinued altogether, unless something be started that will infuse fresh vigour, and bring new interest into them. Of late (probably excepting the last two years) the anniversaries have produced little or no funds for the schools; the whole receipts being usually swallowed up in the expenses. Take the 1855 meeting as an instance (a year selected for no other reason but that of the fact referred to, accidentally coming to the knowledge of the writer) the receipts were £390, which after defraying the expenses of the constructions, left a deficit, on account of the meeting, of £2 to be made by the stewards. It is rumoured that the dean and chapter have long been inimical to the cathedral being used for this exhibition, but can a more legitimate use of the Metropolitan Church be conceived?

The erection of such an organ might involve an expenditure of £10,000. Where, it will be asked, are the funds to come from, since all the money that can be got for the cathedral is insufficient to do even a modicum of the contemplated works of embellishment to the exterior? If, however, it could be seen—and the thing is far from being without the range of possibility—that by the means just adverted to, the Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy might be enriched with an augmentation of income to something like £2,000 a year, the immediately raising a fund for the purpose of such work by special subscription might be matter worthy the consideration of that body, and little difficulty in the accomplishment, one might suppose, seeing that there are eighteen thousand clergymen in the kingdom; all interested (or ought to be, since the benefits of the charity are open to all), in the success of the society. The money so laid out would be, as it were, laying an endowment on the terms of a five years' purchase.

One suggestion more in conclusion. The cathedral choirs being the primary material for the carrying on of such festivals, an additional annual performance might with advantage be given, and the proceeds appropriated in aid of a superannuation and widow and orphan fund for that much-neglected and ill-requited body, the lay-members of the cathedral establishments. NEW ORGAN FOR MELLOR CHURCH.

(From a Correspondent.)

ON Sunday (May 13th), three sermons were preached in St. Mary's Church, Mellor, those in the morning and afternoon by the Rev. J. Watson, M.A. (Rector of St. Peter's, Chester), and that in the evening by the Rev. J. P. Murphy, LL.B. (Chaplain to the Preston House of Correction), when the organ recently erected was opened with full cathedral service. Mr. J. Greaves, organist of the Preston parish church, presided at the organ, and the choir of the same church gave their assistance. On Monday evening (May 14th), there was divine service, at half-past six o'clock, when the Rev. D. F. Chapman, M.A. (curate of Preston) preached, and Mr. J. Walton, organist of Walton-le-dale Church, presided at the organ. An efficient choir was in attendance, and a selection of sacred music performed.

After each sermon a collection was made to meet the deficiency in the organ fund, and towards defraying the expense of repairing and beautifying the church.

The new organ for Mellor Church, which has been so long talked of, was erected by Messrs. Kirkland and Jardine, organ-builders, Manchester. It has two rows of manuals, and contains the following stops:—

Great Organ.—Compass from CC to F in Alto, 54 notes.

	No. of Pipes.	Register of Tone.
1. Great Open Diapason	54 ...	8 feet.
2. Small Open Diapason	54 ...	8 „
3. Stopped Diapason	54 ...	8 „
4. Principal	54 ...	4 „
5. Flute	54 ...	4 „
6. Twelfth	54 ...	2⅔ „
7. Fifteenth	54 ...	2 „
8. Sesquialtra (3 ranks)	162 ...	various.
9. Trumpet—Bass	54 ...	8 „
10. Trumpet—Treble
Total No. of Pipes in Great Organ	594

Swell Organ.—Compass from Tenor C to F in Alto, 42 notes.

11. Open Diapason	42 ...	8 „
12. Stopped Diapason	42 ...	8 „
13. Dulciana	42 ...	8 „
14. Principal	42 ...	4 „
15. Mixture (3 ranks)	126 ...	various.
16. Oboe	42 ...	8 „
Total No. of Pipes in Swell Organ ...	336

Choir Bass (to meet the Swell Organ) CC to B, 12 notes.

17. Open Diapason	8 Ft. ...	12 Pipes.
18. Stopped Diapason	8 „ ...	12 „
19. Principal	4 „ ...	12 „
20. Bassoon	8 „ ...	12 „
Total No. of Pipes in Choir Organ ...	48

Pedal Organ.—Compass CCC to C, 25 notes.

21. Grand Open Diapason ... ... 16 Ft. ... 25 Pipes.

Couplers.

22. Swell to Great Manual.
23. Great to Pedals.

The organ has three combination pedals to change the stops; also, twenty-five pedals extending from CCC to C. The swell has Venetian shutters and graduating action. The bellows are double feeding and double leathered. The whole is inclosed in a handsome case with gilt front pipes. The height of the organ is 19 feet 2 inches; the depth, 8 feet 3 inches; the width, 13 feet.

NEW ORGANS IN THE PROVINCES.—On Sunday, May 13, was re-opened, the organ at All Saint's Church, Bolton, which has had the additions of swell (tenor C, 5 stops), pedal diapason, 16 feet, and couplers; and on the same day, the organ in the parish-church, Stoke-upon-Trent, which has had a thorough repair, new pedals, swell, &c., &c.

NEW PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

AT the fourth, on Monday, the attendance was more numerous than at any of its precursors. The following was the selection:—

PART I.

Overture, (Medea)	Cherubini.
Aria, "Questi avventurieri"	Mozart.
Aria, "Ah! come rapida"	Meyerbeer.
Symphony (Jupiter)	Mozart.
Scena, "Il mio piano" (La Gazza Ladra) ...	Rossini.
Aria, "Assisa a piò d'un Salice"	Rossini.
Overture (Egmont)	Beethoven.

PART II.

Concert-Stück, Pianoforte	Weber.
Aria Nazionale Napolitaine	"Santa Lucia."
Solo, "Bravo, il mio Belcore"	Donizetti.
Overture, (Men of Prometheus)	Beethoven.

Conductor—Dr. Wylde.

Four songs in the first part were just two in excess; two overtures by Beethoven in a miscellaneous programme were hardly advisable; and, to conclude, the two songs by Rossini should not have been placed together. The performance of the symphony was splendid, and but that the minuet was taken too fast, irreproachable. The three overtures were finely executed, Beethoven's Prometheus especially. We have seldom heard this last played with greater vigour and point.

In the Concert-Stück Herr Lubeck was the pianist. His execution was vigorous and his power remarkable. We cannot, however, admire his reading of this very familiar work. He was loudly applauded at the end, and recalled to the platform.

Madame Borghi-Mamo and Signor Belletti were the vocalists. The lady, in the willow song from Otello, obtained the same success as at Her Majesty's Theatre. Her Neapolitan air was no less successful, and the singer was summoned back at the end. Signor Belletti gave the fine air from the Gazza Ladra with great effect, and was equally happy in the florid piece from Donizetti's Elisir d'Amore.

AMATEUR MUSICAL SOCIETY.

THE eighth and last concert of the season was given at the Hanover-square Rooms, on Monday evening, when the following selection was performed to a very large audience:—

PROGRAMME.—Part I.—Symphony in C, No. 1—Mozart. Song, "Alpine Shepherd's Song," Madame Rieder.—S. W. Waley. Duettino concertante, for oboe and pianoforte, Mr. A. A. Pollock and Mr. S. W. Waley.—T. A. Walmisley. Song, "O beauteous daughter of the starry race," Mr. Wilbye Cooper.—Bethoven. Overture (Zampa)—Herold.

Part II.—Overture (Lurline)—Wallace. Carnaval de Venise, Madame Rieder. Andante and rondo capriccioso, pianoforte, Mr. S. W. Waley.—Mendelssohn. Coronation March (Le Prophète)—Meyerbeer. Ballad, "Under the greenwood tree," Mr. Wilbye Cooper.

—Hatton. Overture (Egmont)—Beethoven. Conductor, Mr. Henry Leslie.

Mr. S. W. Waley appeared to great advantage in the triple capacity of composer, pianist, and accompanyist. His playing of Mendelssohn's Andante and Rondo was exceedingly good, and he, in conjunction with Mr. Pollock, was all that could be desired in the late Professor Walmisley's clever duettino. The vocal music was excellent. Madame Rieder with her light and flexible voice displayed both style and execution in the Carnaval de Venise, the performance of which was frequently interrupted by the well-deserved applause of the audience. That clever and rapidly rising artist, Mr. Wilbye Cooper, earned fresh laurels by the chaste and classical style in which he sung Beethoven's beautiful song.

The appearance of Mr. Wallace to conduct his overture to "Lurline" was the signal for a hearty and enthusiastic welcome on the part of both orchestra and audience, and at the termination of its performance the applause was renewed with increased vehemence.

CONCERTS.

ST. JAMES'S HALL.—An excellent concert was given at St. James's Hall, on Thursday, the 10th inst., the programme of which was agreeably diversified by the performances of Miss Augusta Thomson, Miss Leffler, Mr. Santley, Mr. J. F. Barnett (pianist), and Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir. Miss Thomson was encored in Wallace's "Take this cup," from Lurline, and Mr. Santley received a similar compliment in "The Bellringer," by the same popular composer. Mr. Barnett's playing was distinguished for its thoroughly artistic character, and he appeared to much advantage in a composition of his own, entitled Caprice Brillant. He was received with the utmost enthusiasm, and recalled after his first performance. We have heard Mr. Leslie's Choir to more advantage, but we think this was in a great measure owing to its being their first appearance in St. James's Hall, and their consequently not having any experience of the room or of its acoustic properties. The concert was given for the purpose of raising a fund towards the completion of the musical education of a member of Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir, and as the artists above mentioned most kindly gave their services, and the room was exceedingly well filled, we are not surprised to hear that the object was fully attained.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—An unexceptionable performance of Haydn's Creation was given on Friday, the 11th inst. Mdlle. Parepa, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Signor Belletti, sustained the solo parts. In the two principal soprano airs, "With verdure clad" and "On mighty wings," Miss Parepa was heard to greater advantage than in the more solemn and impressive strains of Handel or Mendelssohn; while Mr. Sims Reeves, thoroughly at home in all kinds of music—in the lighter productions of "Papa Haydn" no less than the more sublime works of the greater masters—sang with remarkable effect. He gave the air "In native worth" with incomparable taste and expression. Signor Belletti's artistic capabilities were called into requisition with the best possible effect, and the combined efforts of the principals in the concerted pieces were entitled to unqualified commendation. That the choruses were rendered with wonderful spirit and precision may be readily surmised from the familiarity of the singers with the music, while the band was, as usual, thoroughly up to its work.

The audience applauded without restraint, there being no warning ("in consideration of the sacred nature, &c.) in the programme—not that we find it makes the slightest difference when there is.

On Friday, June 1st, Elijah will be given, the first time for two years, at Exeter Hall.

M. THEODORE RITTER.—This gentleman, well known as a pianist in the salons of Paris, gave on Saturday last a matinée d'invitation, when he was attended by an overflowing audience of musicians, professional and amateur. His playing is characterised by neatness and exactitude in execution, flexible and facile touch, and musicianly reading and expression. He wants nothing that a great artist should have, and he has that that most artists, great and small, want, an unassuming manner and quiet demeanour, which leaves the music to produce its own effect; this latter is invariably impaired by the spasmodic and gymnastic gyrations which some of our best performers indulge in. In a trio of Mendelssohn with MM. Sainton and Paque, his appreciation of the refined beauty of the work drew down loud plaudits from the audience. The work was the Op. 66, in C minor, which ends with a vivace, a most fanciful working out of a beautiful idea. In a march of M. Ritter's own composition, considerable harmonic power in treatment is exhibited, and his rapidity and forcible fingering were exemplified in a veloce movement. But in the sonata of Beethoven, for violin and piano, Op. 30 (in C minor), he had a still greater opportunity for exhibiting his gifts and cultivation. It is at the standard of the greatest musician that ever lived that all candidates for popular suffrage must be tried; if they fail here, what avails their success elsewhere? If they succeed here, they have, ipse facto, passed all other tests. M. Ritter, then, is so entirely master of this work, which abounds in difficulty, that in neither of the simpler pieces he played did he more freely develope his own perfect ideas of the composer's intentions. The slow movement, in A flat, was unimpeachable. The strings of M. Sainton in this work spoke with all his eloquent tone and poetry. The playing of the great French violinist was masterly in every sense. The vocal music included "Cangio d'aspetto," from Handel's Admetus, and "The skipper and his boy"—both sung by Madame Sainton, who never fails to charm her hearers, and did so entirely on the present occasion.

ST. MARTIN'S HALL.—A new oratorio by Herr Johannes Hager, a Viennese amateur, entitled John the Baptist, was performed on Wednesday, under Mr. Hullah's direction, with his customary band and chorus. The principal singers were Miss Banks, Miss Palmer, Mr. Wilbye Cooper and Mr. Santley. The execution was praiseworthy throughout. The oratorio, however, made little impression. There were indeed two encores, but these in a great measure were attributable to the singers. As John the Baptist is not likely to be heard again in this country, we do not think it necessary to criticise it.

MISS THERESA JEFFERYS, one of our most rising sopranos, gave her first concert on Thursday evening at St. James's Hall. So many were the artists and so many the pieces, that the entertainment might be called a "Monster Concert." Among the singers were Misses Parepa, Clari Fraser, Ransford, Palmer, and Laura Baxter; Messrs. Sims Reeves, Elliot Galer, J. W. Morgan, Ramsden, and Santley. The instrumentalists were Miss Arabella Goddard and Mr. Viotti Collins. The programme contained upwards of thirty pieces. Miss Jefferys particularly distinguished herself in Mr. Howard Glover's two songs, "Good Night" and "The Violet," both charming compositions, and both given with faultless expression. Miss Jefferys, also joined Mr. Sims Reeves in the duet "Tomami a dir," which was sung to perfection. Miss Clari Fraser gave Mendelssohn's "On Music's softest pinions" in her most graceful manner, and, in "Huntingtower" achieved one of the true successes of the evening. Madame Laura Baxter sang, among other things, "Gentle Troubadour" (Lurline) with irreproachable taste. Mr. Sims Reeves was encored in Herr Molique's "When the moon is brightly shining," and Mr. Balfe's already popular "Margaretta," Mr. Santley receiving a similar compliment in "A father's love" (Lurline). Miss Arabella Goddard, with Mr. Viotti Collins, executed Beethoven's Sonata, in G, Op. 30, and Ascher's Fantasia on airs from Dinorah, the latter of which was received with tumultuous applause. There was a large attendance, and the concert, though too long, afforded unanimous gratification. Messrs. Adams, Marcellus, Higgs, and Mr. Henry Baumer were the conductors.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—The second concert was given on Tuesday. The first part comprised a selection from Jessonda and the first movement and minuets of Hummel's septet, in D minor. In the septet, Miss Brinsmead, the pianist, distinguished herself by her brilliant execution and fine taste, and proved herself a worthy pupil of her eminent professor, Mr. W. Dorrell. The second part was miscellaneous. We may cite Miss Tasker's performance of the Andante and Presto, from Mozart's pianoforte Concerto in A major, as specially entitled to praise. Among the vocalists, Miss Henderson may be singled out for her capital singing of "Qui la voce;" and Miss Taylor, in M. Costa's quartet "Ecco quel fiero istante," showed the possession of a charming mezzo soprano voice.

VOCAL ASSOCIATION.—The feature of the fifth concert, on Wednesday, was the engagement of Mdlles. Brunetti and Vaneri, Signors Mongini, Everardi, and Ronconi, from Her Majesty's Theatre. Miss Stabbach and Madame Goldberg Strossi were the other singers. The choir gave Neithardt's Motet, "Misericordia, Domini," and several part songs and glees, among which Bishop's "Sleep, gentle lady" was encored. Mdlle. Brunetti, who made her début on Saturday, introduced the scena from Der Freischütz, in which she displayed a powerful voice and considerable vocal skill; the French translation of the words, however, is no improvement on the original. Mdlle. Brunetti sang a cavatina by Roverino, with far greater ease. Signor Mongini created a furor in "Fra Poco." Being encored, he substituted "La donna è mobile," which delighted the audience even more. Signor Mongini also joined Signor Everardi in a duet from Mosè, which was sang with great energy and power, and obtained a recall for both artists. Signor Everardi sang the serenade from Don Giovanni, "Alla finestra," in an expressive manner, and Signor Sebastiano Ronconi contributed an eccentric version of "La Calunnia." Madame Goldberg Strossi gave a German song and Venzano's "Ah, che assorta," and was recalled after the former. Mdlle. Vaneri was encored in an air from L'Etoile du Nord; and Miss Stabbach, beside the soprano solos in Bishop's Tramp Chorus, sang Mr. Salaman's pretty ballad "Good bye! a long good bye!" Mr. J. F. Barnett played three solos on the pianoforte—Bach's Fugue, in C sharp major, Stephen Heller's "Auf Flugeln des Gesanges," and Chopin's Polonaise in A flat, with admirable spirit. Mr. Benedict accompanied.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR.
BEETHOVEN'S "AH PERFIDO."

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 19TH, 1860.

IN a city, where no less a man than Hector Berlioz lives and writes, some curious matter in the shape of musical criticism frequently peeps out from the columns of the public press. Beethoven's one opera has recently been produced at the Théâtre-Lyrique—being the last of M. Carvalho's sacrifices at the shrine of legitimate art. Unluckily, however, with M. Carvalho has departed the prestige of the establishment, which bids fair to sink once more into the position of mediocrity from which that gentleman, with indomitable spirit and eminent ability, delivered it. Had Fidelio been brought out at the Théâtre-Lyrique while he was manager, success—nay triumph—would have been a matter of certainty; but he having seceded, that sudden rage for the classical repertory which seized the Parisians some time since, and with which they themselves were even more astonished than their neighbours, has abated. Now everything not French is intolerable, and even Mozart, Beethoven, and Weber—even Gluck (not to add M. Gounod) —will be voted bores A few passages from a notice of Fidelio—in the columns of a journal, the name of which we shall not mention, and from the pen of a critic whose name is Delatouche, will illustrate our argument.

"Six years ago the Fidelio of Beethoven was performed, without much success, at the Théâtre-Italien. Notwithstanding the talent displayed by Mdlle. Cruvelli in the principal part, the work of the German master had no success. I fear it is likely to be the same with Fidelio at the Théâtre-Lyrique."

For "six years ago," read nine years ago. It was in 1851—when Mr. Lumley was impresario, and Ferdinand Hiller musical director, at the Théâtre-Italien—that Fidelio was performed, with Cruvelli as Leonora. The success it achieved, it is true, amounted to no more than what our turbulent neighbours call a succès d'estime; but it must be remembered that a succès d'estime is a success after all, and (which is better), a success that lasts, and (which is worse) a success very rarely obtained in Paris—the way of the Parisians being either fevered enthusiasm or freezing apathy. But to retoucher Delatouche. The critic of the —— likes not the story of Fidelio. Hear him describe it :—

"Let us speak first of the poem—it is absurd, anti-historical, and tiresome (ennuyeux). We are near the end of the fifteenth century. Ludovic Sforza has caused his nephew, Jean Galeas, to be imprisoned in a fortress, and commissions the gaoler to poison his charge. The gaoler consents, and brings with him, into the poor Duke's dungeon, a very young man—Fidelio—enamoured of his daughter.* This young man is Isabelle de Naples, wife of Galeas. She makes herself known to her husband at the moment when Ludovic approaches to kill his nephew.† To prevent this murder she seizes a bar of iron, with which she threatens Ludovic. The latter retreats terrified, and escapes. But the daughter of the gaoler comes to release from their prison, Fidelio‡ and Jean, who go and throw themselves at the feet of the King of France, Charles VIII., just arrived at Milan."

The foregoing—be it understood—is not Fidelio as the Teutons know it, but "d'après" MM. Michel Carré and Barbier—a barb*ier*ous and Gallic Fidelio. No wonder Delatouche should be dissatisfied. Ecoutons ce gaillard :—

"Do you not see the improbability at once? How could Galeas have thrown himself at the feet of Charles VIII., when history tells us that he died, poisoned, before the arrival of the King?"

Good; but the authors of operatic books (ask M. Scribe) are not invariably the most historical of poets. They worship Clio somewhat gingerly. We have no wish, however, to defend them in this instance, but leave them, willingly, to the trenchant stylum of Delatouche. Ecoutons encore ce gaillard :—

"I have also a little observation to make. Since Madame Viardot" (why not Fidelio?) "held Ludovic" (why not M. Guardi?) "why did she not stun him incontinent? This would have deprived us of the last finale; but where would have been the harm?"

There would have been no harm anywhere to the audience of the Théâtre-Lyrique (with M. Réty as manager, be it clearly understood; the Théâtre-Lyrique with M. Carvalho was quite another thing), who can afford to do with as small a dose of Beethoven as might well be administered, and by whom the loss of a finale—even that incomparable finale —would be looked upon in the light of a bonus. Delatouche, nevertheless, is too modest in calling his observation "a little observation;" on the contrary, it is a big "observation," and mightily to the purpose. But now that we have examined Delatouche in re Barbier-Carré, their book, let us examine Delatouche in re Beethoven, his music :—

* The "poor Duke's" daughter?

† Just now, the nephew was to be poisoned by the gaoler.

‡ Who imprisoned Fidelio?

"The music embroidered by the immortal Beethoven on this pale canvass ——"

["Music embroidered on a pale canvass!" — Here is a muddling of idioms!]

"The music embroidered by the immortal Beethoven on this pale canvass is as pale as the canvass itself (!) The melody of the master is a soft melody, not noisy,* which expands itself en nappe (sheet-wise?) all tranquilly and without fracas; the nappe becomes a blue and limpid lake in which one mirrors oneself at one's ease, and as there is no worse water than stagnant water,† so there is no music more detestable at the theatre than music which sleeps—and induces sleep."

There reader! you have an original criticism of Fidelio at last. Delatouche should be endowed with a beard of gold and vermillion whiskers, also with thigh-rings and a high-heeled boot (like Mario's). If there was an E less in his patronyme, he might be anagramatised as HOT CAUDLE; but happily there are two. N'importe.

"Sonate, que me veux-tu?" asked a certain philosopher (also a Frenchman) of a certain sonata that, nothing if not audible, intended him no harm in making itself heard (according to its entelechy), under the fingers of a "hammer-virtuose"—as Wagner would say. Delatouche, too, has his notions of a sonata, and thus unburdens himself:—

"One likes to hear a sonata of Beethoven's between an air of Rossini's or of Verdi's, and a chanson of Nadaud's. This broad and tender music relaxes, so to speak, the soul, and reposes it after the comic and brilliant. It is like an opium-pill, discreetly administered to a sick person after a day of agitation. Give to the sick person ten pills of extrait thébaique (vernacular-opium), and you run the risk of killing your unhappy patient. Thus does the Fidelio of Beethoven. In short—except the chorus of sick persons (chœurs des malades‡), the introduction to the third act—a sort of march in the style of that of WEBER in the Enlèvement au Sérail" (Mozart's Seraglio!) "together with the two prayers sung by Madame Viardot and Guardi—and the rest is not worth the honour of being cited, nor even of being heard."

Then follows a critique of the performers. "Madame Viardot," it appears, "completely failed in the final sextuor—which, to say truth, is wanting both in colour and charm." We take the first half of the sentence to be as exact as the last—but no more so. The "tag" of the article we shall present to our readers in unadulterated Delatouche:—

"Quelqu'un me disait en sortant de la première représentation: Voilà une musique qu'adorent les Allemands, et rien n'est plus naturel: ils s'amusent beaucoup quand ils s'ennuient.

"S'il y avait samedi des Allemands au Théâtre-Lyrique, ils ont dû joliment s'amuser."

FINIT CORONAT OPUS. But oh! for the anagram!

Enter EPISTEMON.

Epistemon. "An anagram of Delatouche?" In what language?

Editor. In French.

Epistemon (reflecting). LOUCHE CADET?

Editor. A "c" too many. There are only ten letters in Delatouche.

Epistemon (after a pause). DE HAUT COL?

Editor. An "e" too few. There are ten letters in Delatouche.

Epistemon (becoming impatient). DUEL A ECHO—then.

Editor. Where's the "t"? Besides, there's no accent on the "a" in Delatouche. (Epistemon gives it up.)

Enter CARPIMON.

Carpimon. An anagram of Dalatouche? Here's one—Ô CUL DÉTACHÉ.

Editor. Nonsense—you have a circumflex and a pair of acute accents; while in Delatouche there is not an accent of any description.

Enter PANTAGRUEL and PANURGE.

Pantagruel. I've found it—AC HEU! DOLET.

Editor. That's good; all the ten letters of the name, and a deep meaning in the sentence.

Panurge. I've another. AUT DELE HOC.

Editor. That's better—the best that could be made, in short. AUT DELE HOC. Let the Editor of —— apply this injunction to the next article on Fidelio from the pen of Delatouche.

"I see no reason," said Epistemon to Pantagruel, as they sat at the Edinburgh Castle, "why thou shouldst not re-create the palates and edify the minds of thy friends, by giving a symbolical feast, after the fashion of that savoury zodiac, wherewith the wealthy Trimalchio entertained his guests."

"As it is long since I have turned over the pages of Petronius, I have forgotten the details of that elaborate foolery," replied Pantagruel.

"Why, look ye," proceeded Epistemon, "twelve figures representing the signs of the zodiac were arranged in the befitting form of a circle, and everyone was supplied with something harmonious to its character. Thus, upon Aries, the Ram, was placed a mess of the 'cicer aristinum,' a dainty, whereof I know nothing, but the English for which seemeth to be 'chick-pease'—a word that to me conveyeth no signification whatever; Taurus, the Bull, was surmounted by a bit of beef; a couple of kidneys, &c., were supported by Gemini, the Twins; upon Cancer, the Crab, was set a wreath, an arrangement, by the way, which has so puzzled some of the commentators, that they reject the reading Corona. Nevertheless, I am inclined to think it correct, and to agree with Burmann that it signifieth the wreath usually worn by festive guests; for, shortly afterwards, Trimalchio explaineth that he himself was born under Cancer, and that he has put nothing on the image denoting that sign, lest he should press upon his natal star. A mere wreath placed, where you would expect a comestible, is the nearest approach to nothing that you can conceive. On Leo, the Lion, lay an African fig, in allusion to the animal's birth-place; the entrails of a young sow, that had never farrowed, delicately graced the sign Virgo; cakes of two kinds were balanced in the scales of Libra; Scorpio carried a sea-fish of the same name; to Sagittarius was assigned a viand, about which there is some controversy, but we will accept Burmann's reading 'otopetam,' which clearly denoteth something with long ears. This we can the more readily assume to be a hare, as there is an ancient effigy of Sagittarius carrying a hare in his arms. On this interpretation I do not strongly insist, but I decidedly object to the reading 'sclopetam,' which would denote a pop-gun, and thus humbly symbolize the functions of the Archer. For though the guests of Trimalchio might have been tolerant of a wreath in one of the dishes, methinks that a pop-gun served in another would have stirred their wrath. Capricorn carried a sea-locust, which I am told hath horns, and I shall believe the fact till I receive information to the contrary from G. H. Lewes. That Aquarius should bear a goose, and Pisces a brace of mullets, is so natural an arrangement, that it needeth no comment. Now, I was thinking that if thou gavest a similar repast, substituting modern for antique dainties—as, for instance, putting an allowance of thick turtle-soup in one scale of Libra, and as much of the clear sort in the other; representing Sagittarius by venison ——"

"Talking of food," said Pantagruel, with a manifest desire to change the subject, "thou shall hear how prettily I have rendered some of the toughest bits in that satire of Horace (II. 4); where Catius instructeth the poet as to the art of feeding."

"Instead of a goose," observed Epistemon, "thou mightest give to Aquarius a paté de foie gras."

"I begin at the 12th line," said Pantagruel, with nervous precipitancy:—

"In oblong eggs a fine male yolk is found,
They're whiter and taste better than the round;
Your broccoli you'll take from driest fields,
Insipid stuff the water'd garden yields.
When unexpected guests come late to dine
Duck your live chickens in Falernian wine
Temper'd with water; be they ne'er so tough,
You thus will make them delicate enough.
The choicest mushrooms are in meadows grown,
Those found elsewhere you'd better leave alone."

"Hush!" said Panurge, entering the room with a face so white, that it put John's napkin completely out of countenance; but Pantagruel was so pleased with the jingle of his own rhyme, that he went on with another fragment of his translation, just as if Panurge had been an hundred miles off.

"The Umbrian boar, on hardy acorns rear'd,
By men of taste will ever be preferred.
Insipid is the reed-fed Laurentine,
Kids should not always nibble at the vine;
The shoulder of a fruitful hare—how fine."

"Hush! hush!" cried Panurge, whiter than before. Then dropping on his knees, he cried: "Desist! desist! noble master mine; thou knowest not the wrath thou art bringing upon thy head."

"Wretched grumbler, I see what thou meanest by thy maniac gestures; thou thinkest I have slurred over the line,

"Curvat aper lances carnem vitantis inertem."

"No, no!" shrieked Panurge. "I mean that thou art committing grievous wrong in rhyming about eatables at all, and that the wrath of the Athenæum hangeth over thy devoted head."

"What madman's rant is this?" roared Pantagruel.

"No rant, master, but the sad sober truth," replied Panurge, while big tears coursed down his ugly cheeks. "Look ye, that favourite child of the Muses, G. A. Macfarren, hath composed a cantata called Christmas, wherewith all the wise in music are delighted, saying nothing so fine hath been heard since the days of Orpheus; but unhappily, John Oxenford, who hath written the words for this sublime creation, hath so far forgotten himself as to mention eatables while describing the Christmas dinner. Now his sin in this respect is forcibly pointed out in the last number of the Athenæum. As thou, great master, did'st just now rhyme about Umbrian and Laurentine boars, eggs, mushrooms, and Apicius knows what, so did this same erring Oxenford mention puddings, boar's-heads with lemons in their mouths, and such like sensualities."

"Gross, very gross," said John the Waiter; "had he sang of the table-napkin he might have escaped censure."

"Then," said Epistemon, "the critic hath propounded the doctrine, that when thou describest a dinner in verse, thou may'st not allude to the bill of fare."

"Precisely, and very sublime doctrine, too," said Panurge. "In the eyes of the poet, the carte must be a carte blanche in the most literal sense of the word—a plain bit of card-board with nothing written thereon."

"Happy Petronius, who wrote in prose!" ejaculated Epistemon, and then he fell asleep.

"Dost thou think the critic is the Barmecide mentioned in the Arabian Nights?" asked Pantagruel.

"Not a bit of it. He is the very reverse of the Barmecide," shouted Panurge. "That Barmecide gave nothing to eat, but he named a long list of dainties—and don't you see, it's not eating, but discourse about eating that constituteth the transgression."

"I wonder who it could be that originated such sour wisdom?" said Pantagruel.

"A boar with a lemon in his mouth," murmured the sleeping Epistemon, as he recapitulated in his dreams the objectionable points of Christmas.

"Dost thou think the critic of the Athenæum will ever see my translation of the "Unde, et quo Catius?" asked Pantagruel, trembling like a leaf.

"I can't say," replied Panurge; "he hath a far-reaching sight. But mark how thou shalt propitiate him. I have written the words of a finale, illustrating a Christmas dinner, on the principle he hath so lucidly propounded, and thou shalt dedicate it to him as a sincere convert."

"Let me hear thine effusion," said Pantagruel, whereupon Panurge read as follows:—

GRAND CHORUS. "Christmas comes but once a year,
Greet him with etherial cheer;
Hailing Christmas, let us clatter
Empty dish on empty platter;
Pass the vacant glasses round,
Mirth shall in our halls abound.
SOLO. A leg of nothing with no turnips grac'd,
Is just the meat that suits the dainty taste.
CHORUS. He who eats nought may laugh the world to scorn,
He'll never grumble at the price of corn.
SOLO. The dog, of whom old Æsop sung,
Preferr'd the shadow to the meat;
The latter in the stream he flung,
And sought the less substantial treat.
Resolv'd that nought his soul should clog,
A dog refin'd was Æsop's dog.
CHORUS. Hail to that sage canine, I say,
Worthier of song than the poor dog Tray.
SOLO FEMALE. How blest is the chameleon,
He only lives on air,
His colours were less vivid
If grosser were his fare.
He breakfasts on the north wind,
He lunches on the south,
The east-wind and the west wind
Are welcome to his mouth."

There is no saying how long this might have lasted, had not a disturbance arisen in a box at the end of the room. John the Waiter, inspired by the tone of the discourse, to which he had been an attentive listener, had placed before a stout old gentleman a large tray, on which were tastefully placed an empty plate and an empty glass, and had demanded a shilling for the enjoyment of the same. Hence the altercation.

LEOPOLD DE MEYER, the most accomplished pianoforte virtuoso now in Europe, has arrived in London for the season. The services of this wonderful player have already been secured for several concerts of the highest class, and among others for one of those of Mr. Howard Glover, which is to be held this year, on a grand scale, at St. James's Hall, and that of Mr. Benedict, in the Concert Room of Her Majesty's Theatre, which, as usual, will comprise all the available attractions of the period. Since his last visit to London, M. Léopold de Meyer has composed several new pieces, all of which, it is hoped, may be heard in the course of his sojourn among us. "Virtuosity" proper—since Liszt commenced preaching Wagner, and composing "ideal" symphonies for the orchestra; since Thalberg grew fat and sleek, contemplating his lands and beeves with glabritous placidity; since Henri Herz rendered up his last "double tenth" (not tooth), Dreyschock dilapidated his "gauche" (left), perforce of rapidly enunciated octaves, and Rubinstein took to playing so fast as to be tant soit peu incomprehensible — has been fairly at a discount. The advent of such a master of his art as Léopold de Meyer will consequently be hailed by the wonder-seeking public with enthusiasm. The mere announcement of his arrival must inevitably bring back "fantasias" to a premium; and many will be the anxious peep—from eyes fairer than those of the stern and rigid, dry and masculine Gradus ad Parnassum tribe—at the front columns of the Times (and at the second page of the Musical World), to see at which entertainment the "lion-pianist," par excellence, will first shake wide his mane. This much anticipated piece of information we shall be enabled to supply in our next number. Meanwhile—patience, sweet ladies; Herr Block, Signor Cipollani, M. Durillon d'Engelure, and Mynheer Kcebul, will speedily instruct you of the incomparable Austrian's first fiasco—that is, presuming he makes one.

MR. MACFARREN'S CHRISTMAS.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

11, Alpha-road, N.W., May 15th, 1860.

SIR,—Allow me to correct a mis-statement in your notice of the production of my cantata of Christmas at the concert of the Musical Society of London on Wednesday. You say there had been but one rehearsal for the performance, whereas there were three rehearsals of the chorus and two rehearsals of the band. I owe this explanation to the Council of the Musical Society, in acknowledgment of their having done everything that was possible to render the first performance of Christmas effective,—not only in respect of the extra rehearsals, which were given at a great expense to the Society, not only in having delayed the production of the cantata—which had been proposed for an earlier concert—until the two ladies whom I wished to sing the solo parts were in London, but in many acts of careful consideration, eminently flattering to me, and, I believe, advantageous to the effect of the composition. As I am confident that your assertion was made under an erroneous impression, I trust you will kindly find space for this reply.

I am, Sir, obediently yours,

G. A. MACFARREN.

ST. JAMES'S HALL,—The annual performance of the Messiah, for the benefit of the Royal Society of Musicians, was given last night, under the direction of Professor Sterndale Bennett, and attracted a very numerous audience. The principal vocalists were Miss Parepa, Madame Weiss, Madame Rieder, Miss Augusta Thomson, Miss Eleonora Wilkinson, Miss Clara Smythson, Miss Lascelles, Madame Sainton-Dolby, Messrs. Wilbye Cooper, Montem Smith, Mr. Santley, and Mr. Weiss.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

Rigoletto, on Saturday, introduced Mdlle. Brunetti and Signor Sebastiano Ronconi, as Gilda and the jester, on their first appearance in this country. The lady is young and a novice; having made her début last year at the Grand-Opéra of Paris. She is a pupil of M. Duprez, and does credit to her teacher. Mdlle. Brunetti's voice is a high soprano, clear in quality, and not betraying any peculiarity of the French school, but produced fairly from the chest. As a first display, her performance was entitled to encouragement, an occasional tendency to sharpness being ascribable to natural timidity. Her success was decided, and we are mistaken if, before long, she does not become an especial favourite. We may add, that Mdlle. Brunetti is prepossessing in appearance, and ladylike in deportment.

Signor Sebastiano Ronconi is a brother of the renowned Georgio. His voice, the least estimable of his recommendations, is a barytone of no remarkable quality, wanting in power, and tremulous. These deficiencies, however, are compensated by much tact and by a dramatic force which belongs to true instinct. Signor Ronconi's conception of Rigoletto is intelligent if not forcible. As he has been indisposed since his arrival in England, we are not justified in criticising his performances at present. In two or three instances he was highly impressive, and touched the sympathies of his audience.

Signor Mongini's voice and style are well adapted to the music of the Duke, and his singing on Saturday exhibited its wonted vigour. The three airs were admirably given, especially "La donna è mobile," which was encored. The duet with Gilda, however, was vehement, Signor Mongini wooing, as it were, in thunder. His deportment, indeed, was rather that of the lion than the dove.

In the ball scene, Mdlle. Pocchini and M. Durand gave the dance from Fleur-des-Champs, and the lady was encored in one of her "pas."

Il Barbiere on Tuesday would have been better for a rehearsal, Signor Everardi appearing as Figaro for the first time, and Signor Castelli ditto, as Doctor Bartolo. Signor Everardi's Figaro is constrained, but allowance must be made for a first attempt in a part almost as difficult as Don Giovanni, in which we have seen both Tamburini and Ronconi. Signor Everardo, however, sings the music admirably. Madame Borghi-Mamo is a charming Rosina, executing the music to perfection and acting with spirit and naiveté. Her "Una voce" could hardly be surpassed in many respects, while the lovely quality of her voice was heard to greater advantage than ever in the genial music of Rossini. The changes she made in the text, however, were, in no instance, improvements, and there is less excuse than there would be for a genuine soprano. Madame Alboni is the best example of what may be effected by a scrupulous adherence to the text. In Rosina she scarcely alters a note of the original, and yet no one sings it with so much effect. In the Neapolitan air (lesson scene), Madame Borghi-Mamo created the utmost enthusiasm. Few artists could sing it so brilliantly, none with more delicacy and finish. Her descending chromatic scale, near the end, was one of the most perfect things of the kind we have heard.

Signor Vialetti, with less exaggeration, would have been excellent as Don Basilio. Rossini did not intend "La Calunnia" to be burlesqued.

A new ballet of action was produced for Mdlle. Pocchini on Tuesday with undoubted success. We will not say that it is worthy of her extraordinary abilities; nor that it is a ballet of the first or even second class; but it is a step in the right direction, and affords the great danseuse a chance of doing something more than exhibiting mere agility and grace. Mdlle. Pocchini is equally gifted as a mimic and a dancer, attracts no less by her gestures, movements, and attitudes than by her pirouettes and tours-de-force. Hence in the new ballet, entitled Scintilla, she shines with two-fold lustre. Scintilla is in love with a painter, and by her fascinations wins him from a previous attachment. It would be easy to write an essay about Mdlle. Pocchini's performance, but we must content ourselves with stating that anything more exquisitely graceful has never been seen on the stage, and that the Scintilla of Mdlle. Pocchini is worthy of comparison with the Esmeralda of Carlotta Grisi. The music of the ballet is by no means good. The success of Scintilla, and the growing fame of Mdlle. Pocchini, is a proof that the love for the ballet is not extinct.

On Thursday, Don Giovanni was given for the third time, by desire of Her Majesty.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

THE first performance of Don Giovanni, on Saturday, attracted one of the largest audiences we remember. Madame Grisi being indisposed, Donna Anna was undertaken at a moment's notice, by Madame Rudersdorff, a thoroughly conscientious artist, who acquitted herself extremely well in one of the most exacting parts of the lyric drama. Madame Csillag, who appeared as Elvira for the first time, and Signor Gardoni, who undertook the part of Don Ottavio, Signor Tamberlik, not having arrived, were both suffering from colds. The lady displayed unusual intelligence in her acting, and occasionally sang with great power; while the gentleman gave the music with admirable taste. Signor Mario improves vastly in Don Giovanni, and could he sing the music as it is written, would be accepted as the most accomplished living representative of the character. But Signor Alary's version being necessarily retained, some of the finest pieces in the score are entirely ruined. The transposition of the serenade, "Deh vieni alla finestra," a fourth higher is, we think, a mistake. Signor Mario, no doubt, would find it inconvenient in the original key, but a tone higher, as Donzelli and Braham used to sing it, would surely be enough. Changes are the more to be lamented, inasmuch as the great tenor looks the part of Don Giovanni to the life, acts with incomparable ease, and is beginning to assume that audacity of bearing and indomitable spirit, the want of which was the principal fault of his performance last season. Signor Ronconi is the best Leporello since Lablache, and, indeed, in some respects, surpasses his predecessor. Madame Penco made her first appearance this season as Zerlina, in which she established her reputation last year. The Commendatore of Signor Tagliafico and the Masetto of Signor Polonini were as good as ever. There were four encores—the duet "La ci darem," "Vedrai Carina," the trio of masks, and "Deh vieni alla finestra." Mdlle. Zina Richard, and M. Desplaces danced the minuet in the Ball.

On Tuesday, Fra Diavolo was repeated by desire of Her Majesty, who, with the Prince Consort and suite, attended the performance.

Last night, Don Giovanni was given for the second time.

MADAME ALBONI.—This eminent cantatrice will this evening make her first appearance for two years in this country, at Her Majesty's Theatre, in her popular character of Maffio Orsini, in Lucrezia Borgia.

DEATH OF MR. S. G. FAIRBROTHER.—Several friends of the late Mr. S. G. Fairbrother propose to organise a benefit at one of the principal London theatres, for the purpose of raising a sum sufficient to make some slight permanent provision for his widow, whom this unlooked-for bereavement has rendered destitute. Mr. Fairbrother was for nearly forty years the printer of the play-bills of the various theatrical establishments of the metropolis, and was well known to every member of the profession as a highly appreciated and courteously considerate exponent of the claims which they wished to make through the medium of typography on the patronage of the public. Mr. Fairbrother died very suddenly on the evening of Wednesday, the 9th ult., about half-past nine, whilst sitting in his arm-chair. The immediate cause of his death was dropsy; the water touched the heart, and he expired instantaneously without a struggle. He was in his sixty-third year. Although for so long a period the proprietor of an extensive printing establishment in Bow-street, and giving employment to a large number of hands, his later days were clouded by sad reverses, and for some time past he had obtained his only means of subsistence from the employment given to him by Mr. Francis, the printer, of Catherine-street, who had retained him as his book-keeper. There are many to whom Mr. Fairbrother rendered essential service, and frequent acts of kindness and liberality could be recorded of him, which we hope still live in the remembrance of those who experienced his forbearance and generosity. Numbers have had the benefit of his assistance at a time when there was but little hope of his being remunerated for his work, though the profits of his business, when his claims were honourably discharged were invariably of the smallest. Losses, arising chiefly from this source, exhausted all his means, and at his death he was literally without a penny. We earnestly appeal, therefore, to the profession, and especially to those members who have so often acknowledged his constant readiness to further their wishes, without reference to personal considerations, to come forward and assist the poor widow to perform the last sad solemn rites. It is a deserving case, that requires to be met with promptitude, and we are sure the appeal will not be made in vain. Subscriptions forwarded to the office of the Era, care of Mr. Frederick Ledger, will be gratefully acknowledged by the members of his family whom he has left behind to lament his loss.

The Same to the Same.

Milan, 9th December, 1770.

This evening, aeftr the Angelus, we shall have the second rehearsal of the recitatives. The first went so well that the pen had only to be taken up once to change a letter, della instead of dalla. This does great credit to the copyist, and every one was much astonished at it. I wish the instrumental rehearsals may proceed in the same manner. As far as I am able to judge, apart from paternal leanings, I find the opera a good one, and written with much spirit. The singers go on well. Now the thing depends on the orchestra, and at the end of the reckoning, on the caprice of the audience; consequently, in all this, there is much uncertainty—it is a perfect lottery.

The Same to the Same.

Milan, December 13, 1770.

On the 12th we had the first rehearsal with the orchestra, consisting, however, of only sixteen persons, to ascertain that all was correctly written. On the 17th, the first rehearsal with the whole orchestra will take place, which consists of fourteen first and second violins, two harpsichords, six double basses, two violoncellos, two bassoons, six altos, two hautbois, two flutes, to be replaced, if necessary, by two hautbois, four French horns, and two clarinets, consequently, sixty performers.

Before the first rehearsal with the small orchestra, there were not wanting folks whose satirical tongues cried down beforehand Wolfgang's music as something which must necessarily be puerile and wretched, and who prophesied a defeat, maintaining that it was impossible a child of fourteen, and especially a German, could write an Italian opera: admitting him to be undoubtedly a great virtuoso, they did not think he could have that intelligence and knowledge of the chiaro ed oscuro necessary for theatrical success. All these people, since the first rehearsal on a small scale, have become dumb. They have ceased to utter a word. The copyist is enchanted, and this is a great guarantee in Italy, because if the music succeeds, the copyist often gains more by sending away and selling the pieces than the maestro by his composition. The singers, male and female, are highly satisfied; the prima donna and prima uomo are delighted with their duo. Now all depends on the caprice of the public. Saving a little vain glory, it is a matter of no great concern to us. We have already undertaken many things in this queer world of ours, and Heaven has already assisted us. We are now at the last stage of an affair of which circumstances conspire, perhaps, to aggravate the importance. God be our protector!

On St. Stephen's day, a good hour after the Ave Maria, you may picture to yourself Maestro Don Amadeo, seated at the harpsichord in the orchestra, his father in a box above him, and you will please in your heart to wish us a fortunate performance, adding thereunto sundry Paternosters.

NEW SONGS

PUBLISHED BY

MESSRS. DUNCAN DAVISON & CO.

"GOOD NIGHT."

(Wiegenlied—Cradle Song.)
Composed by A. REICHARDT.
Price 2s. 6d.

The day, pretty darling, draws near to its close,
Come cease from your play—on your pillow repose;
You peep from the cradle still laughing and bright,
Kind angels for ever preserve you,—Good night!

With freedom from sorrow, dear child, you are blest,
To you a pure heav'n is your fond mother's breast;
Wild passion some day will your happiness blight,
Kind angels preserve you, my darling,—Good night!

Ah! happy is he who can slumber like you,
Be ever, dear child, to your innocence true;
The righteous are watched by the spirits of light,
Who guard them while sleeping, my darling,—Good night!

"THE MEADOW GATE."

Sung by Mr. WILBYE COOPER.
Composed by GEORGE B. ALLEN.
Price 2s. 6d.

Meadow gate, oh meadow gate,
'Neath the hawthorn tree,
Fondest memories of my life
Ever cling round thee.
Where the gentle voice of Spring
Wakes the earliest flowers,
Where the linnets gaily sing,
Through long sunny hours.

Thoughts of bright hours long ago,
When I was a child,
Playing mid' the meadow flowers
Round me fair that smiled;
Memories sweet of happy eves,
When I used to wait,
Till one came to meet me there,
By the meadow gate.

"UNDER THE LINDEN TREE."

Sung by Mr. ELLIOT GALER.
Composed by W. MEYER LUTZ.
Price 2s. 6d.

As under the Linden tree I lay,
Dreaming the evening hours away,
Weaving many a chaplet bright
Of Memory's flower-wreaths, bloom and blight,
My fancy fled, as it ever flies,
To my heart's dear queen with the violet eyes,
And I thought, does my lady think of me,
As I lie under the Linden tree.

Ah! is she thinking of days gone by,
With smile on her lip, a tear in her eye,
Or is she wearying heart and brain,
With days to come when we meet again;
Or, under the shadow of Love's eclipse,
Lists she to love from another's lips,
Smiling on him and defrauding me,
As I lie under the Linden tree.

"MERRY LITTLE MAUD."

Sung by Mr. ELLIOT GALER,
Composed by W. MEYER LUTZ.
Price 2s. 6d.

Here's a song to Maud, to merry little Maud,
The marvel of maidens at home or abroad,
No flower of the summer, no star of the night,
Is so fragrantly fresh, so bewitchingly bright.

On the snow of her forehead all purity lies,
Her clear soul shines out from her eloquent eyes,
The boldest of ruffiers is silenced and awed
As he meets the pure gaze of my dear little Maud.

She's a heart of her own, has pretty little Maud,
A fond heart, and free from all falsehood or fraud;
And prouder should he be than king on his throne,
Who can look on that dear little heart as his own.

I know not for which of my faults it may be
That she deigns to look down with a smile upon me,
But she loves me, and nothing on earth shall defraud
My soul of its sunlight, merry little Maud.

"COME, SISTERS, LET US DANCE AND SING."

Trio for Soprano, Mezzo-Soprano, and Contralto.
Composed by ADOLPHO FERRARI.
Price 2s. 6d.

Come Sisters, let us dance and sing
Around our beauteous fairy queen,
While calm nature is reposing,
And no mortal form is seen.

The silver waves are breaking
Upon the coral strand
All nature now is resting,
The moon shines o'er the land.

The forest trees are sleeping,
The mossy banks are green,
Our fairy haunts are gleaming
In the pale moon's soft beam.

"COME, FAIRIES, COME, THE STARS SHINE BRIGHT."

Trio for Soprano, Mezzo-Soprano, and Contralto.
Composed by ADOLPHO FERRARI.
Price 2s. 6d.

Come, fairies, come, the stars are bright,
The night wind wanders free,
The summer moon with meagre light
Has silvered all the sea.

The dews fall chill on glade and hill,
And drench the faint sweet flowers;
Come sylph and fay, that fear the day,
The spell-bound world is ours.

Come mocking dreams, less wild and vain,
Than many a mortal plan,
Come chase your phantoms through the brain
Of every child of man,

While death-like sleep still dark and deep,
Drowns all their languid powers,
Come sylph and sprite that haunt the night,
Each yielded soul is ours.

"FLOWERS! LOVELY FLOWERS."

(Dedicated to Lady Isham.)
Composed by CHARLES MCKORKELL.
Price 2s. 6d.

Flowers are gems from heaven sent,
Man's rude heart to cheer, delight,
The stars that deck night's firmament
Less beautiful and bright!
Mark their varied perfumes blending,
Hues so brilliant and fair;
Ah! let our songs on high ascending
Thank our Maker's bounteous care.
Thus to erring mortals sending Gifts so rich and rare.

Pinks! faint with musky odours,
Mignionette! breathing fragrance sweet,
The woodbine twining round in clusters
Where the gorgeous lilies meet;
Roses! Queen of all the garden,
Violets! Spring's first blooming child;
And thou pale Snowdrop, clad in beauty,
Purely sweet and undefiled,
Bring with thee in loving state
The Cowslip with its ruby eyes,
The primrose too, its lowly mate;
And cuckoo flowers that shepherds prize,
Wildlings born in forest dingle
Where the wood anemone blows,
With your cultured sisters mingle,
Every flower, in short, that grows;
Forming thus a garland fair
To deck a maiden's raven hair.
Flowers, lovely, lovely flowers,
How ye charm the captive hours,
A crowning joy to sorrow lending
Still beginning, never ending,
Flowers, lovely, lovely flowers.

"SUNSHINE."

(Dedicated to Mrs. William Coby.)
Composed by ADELAIDA.
Price 2s. 6d.

I love the sunshine everywhere,
In wood, and field, and glen,
I love it in the busy haunts
Of town-imprisoned men.
I love it where the children lie
Deep in the clovery grass,
To watch among the twining roots
The gold-green beetles pass.

I love it when it streameth in
The humble cottage door,
And casts the chequered casement's shade
Upon the red-brick floor.
Upon the earth, upon the sea,
And through the crystal air,
On piled up cloud the gracious sun
Is glorious everywhere.

I love it on the mountain top,
Where lies the thawless snow,
And half a kingdom bathed in light
Lies stretching out below.
Oh yes, I love the sunshine!—
Like kindness, or like mirth
Upon the human countenance,
Is sunshine on the earth.

GREAT NATIONAL ENTERPRISE

Organised in 1848, and developed at THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC, BRIDGE STREET, MANCHESTER, established by him expressly as a Great National Institution to facilitate the Encouragement and Promotion of NATIVE MUSICAL TALENT, and the GENERAL ADVANCEMENT OF MUSIC AMONG THE RISING GENERATION, upon his new and effective system, also as a NORMAL SCHOOL, for the training of masters to conduct CONSERVATOIRES OF MUSIC to be established throughout the United Kingdom, for LITTLE CHILDREN, the whole comprising an entirely new scheme of NATIONAL EDUCATION, by blending music with general instruction, so that the study of music shall become a branch of education in the humblest of schools of this country. To illustrate and to rouse an interest in every town and city for these institutions, Dr. Mark travels with a number of his pupils occasionally through the country—giving lectures, and introducing his highly approved and pleasing Musical Entertainment, entitled DR. MARK AND HIS LITTLE MEN, who number upwards of Thirty Instrumentalists, and a most Efficient Chorus, the whole forming a most unique and complete Juvenile Orchestra, composed of LITTLE ENGLISH, IRISH, SCOTCH AND WELCH BOYS, FROM FIVE TO SIXTEEN YEARS OF AGE, who play Operatic Selections, Solos, Marches, Quadrilles, Galops, &c., and sing Songs and Choruses in a most effective manner, and to whom Dr. Mark gives a gratuitous General and Musical Education.

APPOINTMENTS OF MASTERS AND ARRANGEMENTS OF CLASSES IN THE ABOVE INSTITUTION.

Principal of the Royal College of Music; Director, Composer, and Conductor; Lecturer to both Private and Public, Theoretical and Practical Instrumental and Vocal Classes	Dr. MARK.
Master of the General Educational Department; Writing, Reading, Arithmetic, Grammar, Dictation, History, Geography, Practical Geometry, and Book-keeping	Mr. POWELL and Two Assistant Teachers.

Concertina (German and English)	Mr. ELDER.
Vocal Classes	Messrs. POWELL and ELDER.

Dr. MARK has also made provision for the Orphans of the Musical Profession possessing musical talent, who will find the above institution a happy home, and receive a most effective general and musical education, board, and clothing, free of all expense.

Little Boys, from five to nine years of age, apprenticed for three, five, or seven years by paying a moderate entrance fee to cover the expenses of instrument and books.

Twelve appointments ready for Masters.

For Prospectuses, apply direct to the Royal College of Music, Bridge Street, Manchester.

Dr. MARK is also open to Engagements with his little Men.

Dr. MARK begs to invite the Parents and Friends, and all those interested in his Enterprise and in the Education of the Youths of this country, to visit his establishment. Visiting hours:—From Nine to Eleven, a.m., and Two and Four, p.m. Saturdays and Sundays excepted.

WESSEL & CO., of Hanover Square, who are retiring from business. Further Particulars of this Important Sale will be announced. Applications for Catalogues, which are preparing, may be addressed to the Auctioneers.

"ELIJAH" AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

The principal topic of conversation among musical circles during the last few weeks has been the Mendelssohn Festival. As we have heard a variety of opinions expressed, we propose offering a few remarks respecting the performance, which we were unable to do in our necessarily imperfect first report.

The preliminary Handel Festival of 1857 was an experiment, and a bold one, involving an enormous expense, and the possibility, after all, of its turning out a failure. Fortunately, the success was so great as to warrant the authorities of the Crystal Palace and Sacred Harmonic Society in keeping their promise of repeating the Festival on a still larger scale, this time being the real anniversary of the composer's death. The result of the meeting of 1859 is too fresh in our readers' minds to require further allusion. Having organised such a gigantic body of executants, and brought them so efficiently under the guidance of Mr. Costa's bâton, it seemed a pity that they should be allowed to disperse, and it was therefore resolved that as far as the London contingent was concerned, they should be brought occasionally together for the purpose of rehearsals, with a view to future performances of similar magnitude. There was little fear that the country choristers would suffer their voices to rust for want of practice, as, from the frequent repetition of oratorios in provincial towns, to say nothing of the Festivals of the choirs—Birmingham, Norwich, Leeds, Bradford, &c.—they are generally kept as well up to the mark as their metropolitan coadjutors. Next to Handel, there is no composer of oratorios so popular as Mendelssohn, and no work, except the Messiah, is held in greater esteem than Elijah. It was natural then that this, the last great completed composition of the illustrious master, should have been selected for the next grand performance at the Crystal Palace. Fitting opportunity was afforded by the fact that some years since a monument was projected to the memory of Mendelssohn, which had been recently completed; and it was proposed that the statue should be inaugurated by the performance of Elijah with 3000 executants.

Various expectations were formed as to the result, the general opinion being that the impression would be unequal, and the consequence was as anticipated.* Much of the effect of these monster performances at the Crystal Palace necessarily depends upon where the auditor is placed. The best spot for hearing the choruses is the farthest point from the orchestra, the raised platform en face; but here the solos are almost inaudible. Nearer the orchestra, and within range of the soloists, one hears distinctly only that portion of the chorus which is opposite; hence the diversity of opinions to which such performances must necessarily give rise. As with the apologue of the knights who quarrelled and fought as to whether the shield was gold or silver, each seeing only one side of it; and the still more famous chameleon dispute, each must be content to take his own impressions without trying to convert his neighbour.

For some days beforehand the weather was not very promising. The long continued and constantly prevailing cold east winds had deterred all pleasure seekers from out-door enjoyment, and no doubt prevented many from securing tickets. Happily a decided change for the better set in, and a more lovely day than the 4th of May could not be desired. There was sufficient sun to give warmth and light up the gay colours of the spring toilets, without putting any one to inconvenience from an excess of heat, and, after the first dulness of the morning had cleared off, a degree of certainty about the general aspect, which set one's mind at rest on the question of umbrellas, and a possible scarcity of cabs.

At 3 o'clock the Palace presented a brilliant sight. Some 18,000 people were gathered under its vast transept. The huge orchestra was crowned by a gigantic bust of Mendelssohn, surrounded by laurels, and occupied by the 3,000 who were to display their powers. In front of the orchestra was exhibited a portrait of the composer, kindly lent by Mr. Benecke, of Denmark Hill, and underneath a copy of the inscription written by Prince Albert, in Mendelssohn's copy of Elijah, on the occasion of his first hearing the work. Punctual to the moment, the principals all in their places, Mr. Costa waved his bâton, and the first solemn strains were heard, the prophet foretelling the drought—"As God the Lord of Israel liveth"—delivered by Signor Belletti with that clearness of enunciation for which he is so remarkable. The overture produced but little effect, and it was immediately felt that, almost any body of instrumentalists alone would fail to bring forth sufficient volume of sound to be clearly understood in the vast area. The first chorus, "Help Lord," with its two subjects, "The harvest now is over, the summer days are gone," and the episode, "Will then the Lord be no more God in Zion," was given with precision. The duet, "Lord. bow thine ear to our prayer," was smoothly sung by Miss F. Rowland and Madame Sainton, the succeeding recitative, "Ye people, rend your hearts," being given by Mr. Sims Reeves with masterly feeling and expression, and eliciting the first applause that had any warmth in it. The double quartet, "For he shall give his angels charge," rarely, if ever, goes well, and this time formed no exception to the rule, being as usual unsteady and wavering. The scene between the widow and Elijah introduced Miss Parepa, who sang her music with ease and fluency, if not with all the judgment to which we have been accustomed. The beautiful and soothing chorus which follows, "Blessed are the men," was very successful.

In the music of Elijah, Signor Belletti fulfils the requirements of even the most exacting, by his thoroughly artistic and musician-like method, never straining his voice, and yet always producing the desired effect. In the recitative, with chorus, where the prophet urges the idolaters to test who is the true God, this was especially noticeable. And here we must protest against the time at which Mr. Costa took the choruses of the priests of Baal. The beginning of their first invocation is marked Andante grave maestoso, finishing Allegro non troppo, the second time they appeal, "Hear our cry, O Baal," allegro vivace, and the third time, "Hear and answer," presto. In each of these instances, however, the tempo was accelerated to such a degree, that the gradual working up into fury of the priests was entirely lost sight of, to say nothing of the beauty and clearness of the music being sacrificed.

In 1855 the finest performance of Elijah ever heard, was given at Birmingham, under Mr. Costa. In 1858 the same oratorio was given under the direction of the same gentleman at the same town; but the "tempo" of every piece was so unduly accelerated, that, however it might show the mastery over band and chorus, imperilled the safety of the work. In 1860 we have these faults repeated to a greater degree; and it should be a grave matter of consideration whether it is advisable in music to keep pace with the "fastness" of the age for the sake of obtaining what is supposed to be increased brilliancy, but frequently tends only to confusion. We have frequently had occasion to find fault with some provincial conductors for their constant tendency to drag the time; but there is a medium in all things. We have nothing but praise to award to the quartet, "Cast thy burden," admirably sung by Miss Parepa, Mdme. Sainton Dolby, Messrs. Reeves and Thomas. The chorus "The fire descends" wanted clearness from reasons already mentioned, and to which we need not further advert. The duet between Elijah and the youth, sustained by Signor Belletti and Miss Parepa, did not produce the marked sensation it ordinarily does in a more limited area. The "Thanks be to God" chorus, however, made some amends, and brought the first part of the oratorio to a grand close.

Half an hour's interval enabled singers, players, and audience to recruit their energies, and the second part went with decidedly more spirit than the first. Miss Parepa was much applauded in "Hear ye Israel." Miss Dolby (Mdme. Sainton rather) was encored in "O rest in the Lord," which she took slower than usual, to the manifest improvement of the effect. Mr. Sims Reeves was also compelled to repeat "Then shall the righteous," which he gave with all that energy and expression of which he is so complete a master. The unaccompanied trio "Lift thine eyes," ordinarily allotted to two sopranos and a contralto, was rendered by Miss Parepa, Mdme. Sainton and Miss Palmer, one soprano and two contraltos, the effect (no disparagement to the ladies named) being by no means enhanced thereby; indeed we hardly ever remember its falling so flatly upon an audience. There was no encore, and the delicious chorus "He watching over Israel," followed consequently in its right order without interruption. The choruses "Woe to him" and "Behold God the Lord," were particularly satisfactory—more so than the last "And then shall your light," which was not altogether steady. In the little that was set down for them, Miss F. Rowland, Miss Palmer, and Mr. Thomas did excellent service in aiding the general effect.

At the conclusion of the oratorio the band of the Coldstream Guards joined the orchestra, and the National Anthem was given, Miss Parepa taking the 1st and 3rd verses solus, the 2nd being sung as a trio, in which she was joined by Madame Sainton and Mr. Reeves. A general rush was then made to see the unveiling of the statue, which, however, took place while there were yet some thousands in the building. Of the casting of the bronze we some time since gave an account; but there is much division of opinion as to the likeness, the diversity in the existing portraits and busts greatly tending to increase the difficulty of producing a correct resemblance. We have not yet seen anything that has done justice to the features of Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy,— nor do we think that this work will increase the correctness of notion as to the personal appearance of the great musician.

* In addition, Mendelssohn's music of all others requires great attention, the exquisite light and shade, and wondrous delicacy of the accompaniments being unfitted for so very large a building as the Crystal Palace, where the broad massive effects of Handel are alone calculated to produce the desired impression.

The patience of those who waited for the torchlight procession was sorely tried, as it was long after dusk before any symptoms were shown. When it did come, however, those who waited were more than amply gratified by the really fine effect produced by the moving lights which glimmered in the distance through the trees and shrubs like stars which had come on earth and lost their way. As they neared the spectator and stood round the large basins of the upper plateau, the fountains playing at the same time, loud shouts of applause burst forth, and all agreed that the sight was as beautiful as it was uncommon. When the bearers gathered round the statue, the torches were thrown into a heap, and by the lurid light the figure of him, in whose honour the crowds had assembled that day, stood out in strong relief, the whole forming a wonderfully impressive spectacle and appropriate conclusion of a day that will be long remembered by those who had the good fortune to assist at the brilliant inauguration of the Crystal Palace Season of 1860.

MADAME CLARA NOVELLO.

THE circumstances by which the infancy of Madame Clara Novello was surrounded, were singularly propitious for the development, if not for the germination, of the true artistic spirit for elevation of the mind to the comprehension of lofty subjects, and thus for her qualification to the special position she holds as a singer of sacred music. We have dwelt at some length upon the associations of her childhood, because, however indirectly, these must have influenced her entire career, and thus constitute an essential, though perhaps an undesigned, portion of her intellectual education. It would have been of comparatively small value that she was gifted with a voice of such loveliness and power,—that her mind was prepared for the perception of the subtlest beauties in the art to which she was devoted,—had not her natural organ been brought, by training, so completely under control as to enable her fully to realise her own conceptions. In this respect her advantages were as great as in the other two; for her scholastic education was fully as fortunate as the general circumstances from which her mind received its first bias.

In 1824 her family was residing at Paris, where she received musical instruction from M. Fétis, at present director of the Brussels Conservatoire, author of the Biographie Universelle de Musiciens, together with many didactic works, and composer for the church and the theatre. M. Fétis was at that time professor in the Conservatoire of Paris. By his advice his young pupil became a candidate for admission into that institution, where instruction being entirely gratuitous, there is a limit to the number of students; and as vacancies arise they are filled up by the most promising candidates who may compete for the advantage. It was somewhat adventurous to bring forward a child of six years old to contend with girls of double or threefold her age, at an election in which physical and mental powers, voice and intellect, were the qualifications for success. Choran was the head of the department to which the friends of little Clara desired her to be admitted; and to this eminent master she was accordingly taken for examination. The piece chosen for the display of her ability was a bravura from Arne's Artaxerxes, "The Soldier tired." Time was, but is now no more, when this song was regarded as the infallible test of vocal proficiency in England; the pretensions of any singer were acknowledged who could pass the ordeal of the volleys of triplets she had to fire through in "The Soldier tired;" and whosoever ventured not to essay the voluble divisions of this proof of skill was classed derogatorily as a ballad singer, and esteemed accordingly. Twenty years having elapsed since Artaxerxes,—the only English opera which till then had held permanent ground through successive generations of singers and listeners,—has been witnessed on the stage, they whose memories extend not farther back have no chance of recollecting "The Soldier tired," except through the trumpet of Mr. Harper, whose remarkable execution, while it proves what he can do as a trumpeter, shows also how much (or how little) was expected of a prima donna in London, previous to the year 1840. Now "The Soldier tired" appears to have been admired in England alone; its merits, such as they are, and its elements of vocal display, such as we were wont to esteem them, escaped the appreciation of the Paris professor. This effort of the young aspirant failed to convince the commentator on Albrechtsberger of her precocious talent, and he required another specimen of her ability in a style with which he was more familiar. Clara, who was not to be discomfited by Choran's anti-Anglican predilections, now sang the "Agnus" from Mozart's Mass in F, in her performance of which she displayed such genuine musical feeling, and such singular promise, that she was unhesitatingly preferred over nineteen competitors. You may, if you will, suppose her success in this beautiful air to have been, in some degree, due to her life-long familiarity with ecclesiastical music, the practice of which constituted her father's chief professional avocation, since its style must have become, from constant association, as a second nature to her. You may, if you will (and, though not fatalists, our will must coincide with yours, if you be thus willing), regard this infantine triumph as an augury of the distinction as an interpreter of the greatest works of the first masters of sacred music, which the little girl, who had not then cut her wisdom teeth, was destined to attain.

Clara Novello's studies in the Conservatoire were principally directed to sacred music, in which her rapid progress won the admiration of all who witnessed it. Here we trace a cause, as we have just supposed a prognostic, of her excellence in that department of her art in which she will be especially missed when she retires from public life. Such was her early proficiency that she was soon capable of sustaining a part in the performances of the students; but as it was out of all propriety that so small a person should be ranked with her unproportionable associates, accordingly, as the only means to fit her to take her stand beside them, she took it on a stool, and thus was raised to an elevation of stature approximating to her elevation of talent. For six years she continued the course of instruction afforded by the Conservatoire, whence she derived that solid foundation in the principles of the vocal art which may well be supposed to have secured her first success and enabled her not only to maintain, but consolidate it. In 1830, however, occurred the famous July revolution, which, while it changed the dynasty, greatly disturbed the arrangements of all institutions dependent on the monarchy, and, among others, the Conservatoire de Musique. This fact, combined with other circumstances, induced the removal of Clara Novello to London, and here, in her native city, began a new epoch in her education.

MENDELSSOHN AND BEETHOVEN'S SYMPHONY IN C MINOR.

A leaf from my Musical Diary.

THE Rhenish musical festival, celebrated at Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1846, will be remembered with delight by those who were present, not only with regard to the selection of the masterpieces performed on the occasion, but also from the presence of two leading stars in the musical world of the 19th century—Mendelssohn as conductor, and Jenny Lind as prima donna.

One of the principal instrumental compositions performed at the festival was Beethoven's Symphony in C minor. In the third movement (the scherzo) of this symphony, Mendelssohn, to the surprise of the admirers of this chef-d'œuvre of Beethoven, cancelled two bars*, but nobody doubted, by the well-known veneration of Mendelssohn for Beethoven and his immortal genius, that a reason, not to be disputed, would be at the bottom, for cancelling these two bars alluded to.

At that time, engaged as reporter for the well-known Cologne Gazette, I was present at the festival for the purpose of rendering the critical musical report, and felt it my duty, on behalf of a great number of Beethoven's admirers present, and the musical public at large, to address myself to Mendelssohn, to learn the reason why those two bars had been cancelled. Not long afterwards, through Mendelssohn's interference, and in consequence of the above-mentioned interrogation, the publishers of the score of this symphony, Messrs. Breitkopf and Hartel, inserted in the Leipzig Musical Gazette, July 1846, Nr. 27, the following communication:—

"In comparing the original manuscript of Beethoven's Symphony C minor with the one published by us, a scruple with regard to the 2nd and 3rd bar, page 108, has arisen. We have, therefore, been induced to look over the correspondence with Beethoven, and the following letter, dated August 21, 1810, will give the explanation on the subject. The subjoined part of Beethoven's letter in fac-simile relates to it."

Beethoven writes:—

"The following errors I find in the Symphony C minor, viz.: 3rd movement ♯ time, where after the major ♯♯♯ the minor commences again, standing as follows:

I take only the bass part; the two bars which are crossed are too much, and must be blotted out, and let it be well understood, also, in those parts which have rests."

The subject wants no further explanation. The mistake arose partly through the engraver, partly from the manuscript of Beethoven's score, from the reason that he intended, in this symphony, as in some of his others, to have repeated the minor parts three times, and the major parts only twice.

In the original score are those two bars which are crossed, figured with I, and the two following ones with II. This, and also the term "Si replica con trio allora II," which has been written with a red pencil on the top of the page, have been overlooked by the engraver.

The discovery and regulation of this error is the merit of Mendelssohn, to whom we are indebted; and but for him most likely we should have remained in the dark even to this day.

There is another error in the same symphony, in the first movement, and also in the symphony B flat,

" F major, Nr. 8,
" Pastorale,

which Schumann, Czerny, and other musical authorities have detected and revised, and of which I shall speak at a future time.

Dr. Ferdinand Rahles.

MOZART AND JELIOTTE THE SINGER.*

The Duke de Rohan-Chabot possesses, in his magnificent château at Reuil, a dozen leagues from Paris, a small picture, forming part of a rich collection of family portraits.

It represents Mozart, as a child, seated at a harpsichord, in a saloon of the château de la Roche-Guyon, in Normandy, and formerly the property of the Duke de Rohan-Chabot. Mozart is playing or singing, and Jeliotte, the actor of the Opera, is accompanying him on the guitar; the Prince de Beauveau, in a scarlet surtout, and decorated with the blue cordon, is seated behind the young musician, reading, with a careless eye, a paper he holds in his left hand; the Chevalier de Laurency, a gentleman in the suite of the Prince de Conti, dressed in a black velvet coat, is standing behind the arm-chair in which Mozart is seated; the Prince de Conti is chatting with M. de Trudaine, the son of him for whom David painted his celebrated picture of the "Death of Socrates;" while Mdlle. Bargoty, in front of a group formed of the Maréchale de Mirepoix, Mme. de Viervelle, Mdlle. de Boufflers, afterwards Duchess de Lauzun, and the Prince de Henin, is making tea, though listening attentively at the same time to Mozart's beautiful playing. In another group we perceive M. Dupont de Velse, brother of M. d'Argental, the Countess of Egmont, senior, the Countess of Egmont junior, formerly Mdlle. de Richelieu, and the President Hénaut, seated on one side of the fireplace. The last group shows us the Countess de Boufflers standing before a table luxuriously laid out, and by her side the Count de Chabot, afterwards Duke de Rohan, talking to the Count de Jarnac, while the Marshal de Beauveau is pouring out a glass of wine for the Bailli de Chabrillant, who is opposite M. de Meyrond, the famous geometrician.

It is astonishing how these noble and intelligent faces appear to acknowledge the ascendancy of the young genius, who charms and captivates them! All eyes are fixed upon him; every one is listening to him with surprise and ecstacy. Even the family portraits let into the panels of the apartment seem to share the sensations of this brilliant audience.

The picture contains many illustrious heads, and many women celebrated for their birth as for their beauty. Yet that which rivets us, that which attracts and interests us more than aught besides, is the sublime child, not yet eight years old, and nevertheless the equal of the greatest masters.

Mozart is represented in an apple-green coat and knee-breeches. He is so small that his feet, which dangle in the air, scarcely reach below the fingerboard of his harpsichord. He has a round face, rosy lips, a broad projecting forehead, and a meditative eye, while his little powdered wig gives him quite an amusing magisterial air.

Up to the present time we know nothing more about Mozart's first visit to Paris than what is reported in the chronicles of the period. He performed three times; at Versailles before the king, the queen, and the court; and at two public concerts. This is all we knew; but respecting his relations with the society and artists of the period, nothing worth mentioning had reached us.

The picture which I have just sketched, as faithfully as I could, proves that Mozart went out visiting; that he played in private houses in Paris and the country; and that, when he was only seven years old, he had excited sufficient interest in Jeliotte, the celebrated singer of the Opera, to cause the latter to accept the modest post of his accompanyist.

As Jeliotte's name comes naturally under my pen, let me relate a few facts concerning him.

Jeliotte was born in the neighbourhood of Toulouse in 1711. Gentle, good-natured, and wearing on his countenance the serenity of happiness, he inspired others with it, while he enjoyed it himself. He was a man completely happy. In the first place a chorister, and then counter-tenor at Toulouse Cathedral, an excellent musician, and an adept on several instruments, he possessed a voice of incomparable beauty. His provincial fame reached the ears of the Prince de Carignan, Inspector-General of the Opera. Jeliotte was summoned to Paris, made his first appearance at once at the Opera, and passed through the ordeal with enthusiastic applause. From that moment he enjoyed the favour of the public, whose idol he was for twenty years. The audience trembled with delight when he appeared on the stage; they listened to him with intoxicating pleasure, and their applause was always ready when he concluded. His voice was full, admirable, sonorous, of a pleasing quality, and reaching, without the slightest effort, the highest notes of the counter-tenor.

Jeliotte was neither handsome nor well-made; but he had merely to sing and he was superb. It seemed as though he charmed the eye at the same time as the ear. Being a good musician, his talent cost him no trouble, and his profession was only a source of pleasure. Cherished and esteemed by his comrades, he led the life of a man of the world,—welcomed and longed for everywhere. At first, what people wanted was to hear his singing, and his complaisance in acceding to their wishes was as charming as his voice. He made it his especial study to pick out and learn our prettiest songs, which he gave to perfection, accompanying himself on the guitar. But people soon forgot in him the singer in their appreciation of him as an amiable man. His wit and obliging disposition procured him as many friends as he had numbered admirers: some belonged to the middle classes, while others moved in the very highest society. Invariably simple and modest, he accumulated, by his talent and the favours bestowed on him, a small fortune, which he employed in placing his family in comfortable circumstances. In the offices and private cabinets of the ministers he enjoyed considerable credit, which he employed in rendering most important services to persons in his native province, Languedoc, where, in return, he was adored.

His generosity proved most injurious to him; and he died at Paris, in 1782, in a state bordering on poverty, having no resources but his pension, which, luckily, could not be touched by his creditors. TORCHET.

MADAME SCHROEDER-DEVRIENT.*

ON the 10th November, 1859, the public journals brought news from Munich that Sophie Schroeder, at the age of nearly eighty years (her maiden name was Bürger, her first married name Stollmers) had excited such a jubilee by her recitation of Schiller's Bell as would have been possible to few of the younger notabilities of the stage. And now (February 9, 1860) we read of the decease, in Coburg, of her equally renowned daughter, Wilhelmina Schroeder-Devrient, by second marriage, Madame Bock. Five and twenty years younger then her mother, her shorter career was not less eventful, not less rich in triumphs. Born in 1805, at Hamburg, in her fifth year she figured on the stage in a ballet: thence she went with her mother to Vienna, where she first appeared as an actress at the age of fifteen, and in such parts as Alicia in Phädra, Louise in Kabale und Liebe, Beatrice in Der Braut von Messina, did honour to the teaching and example of her mother. At the same time she received musical instruction from Grünwald and Mozatti, and already, in the year 1821, turned her attention to opera. Emmeline in Weigl's Swiss Family, Maria in Grétry's Blue Beard, and Eleonore in Fidelio, were her first most prominent parts. If the story that it was she who first caused the world to recognise the power and beauty of Beethoven's opera is untrue, inasmuch as Fidelio had maintained its place in the répertoire of the Vienna Opera since 1816, it is true that in her study of the part of Eleonore, Wilhelmina Schroeder, at sixteen, did enjoy the personal instruction, and, by her performance, obtain the hearty applause of the composer. Thus equipped, she went first (in 1823) to Berlin; and thence to the Court Theatre at Dresden, with which she remained connected, notwithstanding her artistic tours, until her retirement from the stage (in 1848). Here she never tired of making progress in her art; but even when she had long shone as a model, she repeatedly began anew at the foundations, availing herself of the instructions of the celebrated singing-master, J. Miecksch. At Dresden she laid the foundation of her fame, which, after her journeys to Paris in 1830 and 1831, and to London in 1832, 1833, and 1837, spread over the greater part of cultivated Europe.

Should we undertake to recall all the parts in which Wilhelmina Schroeder appeared during a period of twenty-seven years, we should not wander far from the truth in maintaining that she represented all the leading characters in all the operas written and produced before and during her theatrical career. While she revealed to us the perennial freshness of Gluck, Grétry, Mozart, Beethoven, Cherubini, Spontini, she understood how, at the same time, to make Rossini and Bellini, Auber and Donizetti, Halevy and Meyerbeer exceedingly enjoyable; and any one who has admired her in German works of later times, — the operas of Weber, Spohr, Marschner, and Richard Wagner, — will find it hard to tell how much these masters owed to her, and how much she to them. We shall not see such another Armida, Iphigenia, Donna Anna, Fidelio, Euryanthe, Rebecca, or Adriana; we shall not see again that perfect harmony between composer and interpreter which we enjoyed in her creations. But perhaps the highest thing was the soul with which she quickened and ennobled weaker and even weak forms. To the end of her career she was on this account besieged by an uninterrupted series of artists, who, not knowing how to find the true and shortest way to glory, found it convenient to bespeak the mediation of the disinterested artiste. Schroeder-Devrient was always glad to help where she was able. Most glad when it would really serve the cause of Art. She had sincere joy in her art; for her it had nothing mechanical, nothing slovenly, nothing aiming at mere applause or gain. When she made pilgrimages to Paris, London, Vienna, and Berlin, it was no Barnum raid, but to test the correctness of her efforts before new and perhaps severer judges; not the desire to take her talents to richer markets. Hence we do not see her seeking an uncultivated public of backwoodsmen, but going to the places where all her great predecessors had been; where she found living rivals, where the public had seen and appreciated the highest and best. In fact, her artistic journeys were more productive of fame than of any material advantage.

The same zeal for Art she always showed towards other talents striving in the same direction. If it was not possible to carve, as she said, a Schroeder-Devrient out of every piece of wood, yet there were a great number of younger talents which she helped to develope, or at least carried along with her. We must not imagine her instruction to have been systematic schooling; lessons to be learned and said by rote. Where no real soul for art betrayed itself, where the capacity to understand and follow her was wanting, her influence could not of course avail; but where there glimmered any spark of native fire, she knew well how to quicken, sustain, and cause it to shine out. From Agnes Schebest to Johanna Wagner, a whole list of singers could be named, who, if just and candid, would ascribe the best they have ever done to her example and her teaching.

Her zeal for the aspirations of more recent composers has been alluded to. There has hardly been one of any importance who, living at the same time with her, did not seek her acquaintance, and, if deserving of it, win her friendship. She was one of the first to recognise Wagner; she belonged to that prophetic circle, who, not led astray either by the unmistakable excrescences in the first works of that master, or by the fault-finding criticism of the day, foretold the rising of a new star; she it was who in the parts of Adriano and of Senta, decided the victory. Nay, for the first representations of the Tannhäuser, she undertook the part of Venus. This was the last creation of her genius. The part in many respects was not suited to a woman of forty; but we shall not see such another Venus. It was her unmistakable enthusiasm that lent a colouring to her performance, which those presen never can forget, and which those who have only seen the opera without her, can never understand.

For all who knew her, there is and can be no description even remotely corresponding to the impression she left; and it is hardly possible for one who has not seen her, to form any conception of her performances. Who can imagine a Fidelio, who, with the first words she uttered seized upon every public, and in the prison scene moved even the actors on the stage to tears? or a Donna Anna, who, in the brief words of the introduction: "Padre mio!" thrilled every nerve of our being? or a Euryanthe, who could breathe an ecstacy of love into the duet: "Hin nimm die Seele mein?" who, if he has not seen or heard,—nay, if he has not lived it,—can form any idea of the cry with which Rebecca was wont to greet the trumpets of Ivanhoe.

We shall again see Clytemnestra rage, and Marie toy in Blue Beard, and perhaps an Emmeline smile amid tears; we shall often hear "Adelaide" and the "Erlkönig" sung, and again be thrilled by their imperishable beauty; but the highest enjoyment we shall feel in them can only be, that the singer falls not too far short of the ideal which has been realised for us once and cannot be again. Such identity of the artiste with her part, such faultless dramatic expression, such a union of splendid resources, of most highly cultivated singing with complete impersonation, we shall never witness again. The happy instinct with which Schroeder-Devrient saw and caught the spirit of every part, and the peculiar signification of its every moment, has often been a theme of wonder. This was native to her. But the reason of it was, that she had perfected her taste to the finest degree, and was never weary of probing the task set before her, and never ceased to study it until she had found its truest expression.

As Schroeder-Devrient was always great and noble in her performances, so she always set herself the highest tasks in her art. Thus she worked for her own time, and her name will live for ever.

Concerts.

Sacred Harmonic Society. — The series of Subscription Concerts was continued on Friday the 18th, with Haydn's Creation. The work, by far the lightest in the repertoire of the Society, was, generally speaking, well performed. The band executed the Overture ("Chaos") in admirable style. The accompaniments were likewise worthy of commendation. The chorus showed their familiarity with the work, and were steady and correct as usual. We may except the vocalised passages in the last piece, "Praise the Lord, ye voices all," the only phrases of the kind in the work which were sung incorrectly.

The soprano solo was undertaken, for the first time, by Miss Parepa, who did herself infinite credit. Indeed, the part suits her better than any sacred rôle she has attempted. "On mighty pens" was particularly effective, the ascending passages being delivered with accuracy and brilliancy of tone. Mr. Sims Reeves was never more favourably heard than in "In native worth." The purity of his singing is exceeded by none of his contemporaries; while he renders this (and many other airs) with a manliness which is all his own. Signor Belletti had not quite recovered from his recent indisposition. He took infinite pains, however, with his music, and, in "Rolling in foaming billows," created a marked sensation. The room was crowded in every part.

Philharmonic Concerts.—The programme of the fourth concert on Monday last was unusually rich in material, and attracted a very large audience to the Hanover Square Rooms:—

Part I.

Overture — Scherzo — Song with Chorus, "You spotted snakes," (Miss Augusta Thomson and Mdlle. Jenny Meyer) — Notturno, March, and Final Chorus ("A Midsummer Night's Dream")	Mendelssohn
Air, "Du village voisin," Madame Rieder ("Le Serment")	Auber
Concerto, Violin, No. 8, Herr Kömpel (Scena Cantante)	Spohr
Recit. and Air "Nur einen Wunsch, nur ein Verlangen" ("Iphigenie in Tauris") — Mdlle. Jenny Meyer	Gluck
Overture, "Anacreon"	Cherubini

Part II.

Sinfonia in F, No. 8	Beethoven
Scena, "Ah me! he comes not," Miss Augusta Thomson ("Fair Rosamond")	Barnett
Trio, Madame Rieder, Miss Augusta Thomson and Mdlle. Jenny Meyer ("Azor and Zemira") ...	Spohr
Overture, "Zauberflöte"	Mozart

Conductor — Professor Sterndale Bennett, Mus. D.

We must criticise the performance in our next. At present it is enough to say that the new violinist, Herr Kömpel, was deservedly successful; and that Mendelssohn's Scherzo was played to perfection and encored.

The London Glee and Madrigal Union, under the direction of Mr. Edward Land, will give their 100th performance of glees, madrigals, and old ballads on Friday next, at the Royal Gallery of Illustration,—a very gratifying proof that the public are appreciating more and more this delightful style of vocal music.

Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir. — The Concert on Wednesday last, the fifth of the season, was quite up to the standard which Mr. Leslie seems to have set up, and above which he will not go on any account. Glees, madrigals, and part-songs sung in a style nearly approaching perfection will always command an audience; but the interpolation of indifferent fantasias on operatic airs is simply distasteful to the musical public, whose opinion neither Mr. Leslie nor anyone else can afford to despise. Last season we had sonatas, pianoforte and violin, and pianoforte and violoncello and other works of equal importance. This matter should be looked to. The motett of Hauptmann, "Source of all power and light," Wilbye's madrigal, "Sweet honey-sucking bees," "Hear my prayer" (Mendelssohn), trio canone, "Placido Seffiretto" (Cherubini), were the noticeable features. A vocal duet, and a four-part song, by Mr. Henry Leslie, were sung with much effect. Both compositions are agreeable and well written.

Madame Puzzi's Concert.—A large and fashionable assembly attended the annual concert of Madame Puzzi, which came off at the Hanover Square Rooms on Monday morning. The programme was more than usually varied. The artists included Mesdames Borghi-Mamo, Lemmens-Sherrington, Parepa, Rudersdorff, Everardi, Lemaire, and Rieder; Signors Mariano Neri, Solieri, Ciabatta, Dragone, M. Désprèt, and Mr. Patey, vocalists; and M. Leopold de Meyer (piano) and Signor Pezze (violoncello), instrumentalists. The special feature of the concert (to quote the Morning Post) "was the first appearance this season of the great 'lion-pianist,' Leopold de Meyer, who executed a new fantasia on original themes, of his own composition, with extraordinary effect. We never heard him play with more brilliancy, power, delicacy, and finish." Being unanimously encored, he returned to the instrument and repeated the last half of the fantasia.

The Neapolitan air and variations, introduced by Madame Borghi-Mamo in the lesson scene of the Barbiere, and sung by the same lady on the present occasion, was the most brilliant vocal display of the concert. The fine duo, "No, Matilda," from Rossini's Matilda di Shabran, was admirably given by Mdlle. Parepa and Madame Borghi-Mamo. Madame Everardi, wife of the eminent barytone, in the cavatina, "D'amor sull' ali," from the Trovatore, displayed a voice of nice quality, and a good style and method. Two compositions by Signor Giuglini, a duet sung by Mesdames Lemmens-Sherrington and Borghi-Mamo, and a chorus by the entire company, were introduced. The rest of the performance calls for no particular remark.

Monday Popular Concerts. — Out of eight pieces in a programme devoted to various masters, no less than five were heard for the first time at the concert of Monday last. This looks well, as it shows that the continued success attendant on these interesting series has not made the directors indifferent or content (as is too often the case) to fall back upon works with which the public are now, thanks to them in a great measure, tolerably familiar. Nor is it alone in the construction of their scheme that the effects of judicious management are shown: not only fresh pieces but fresh artists are heard. This season we have had Her Becker, a valuable addition to the ranks of our classical violinists; and now a (comparatively) new pianist, Her Lubeck, is introduced.

The instrumental novelties comprised two quartets,—Mozart's in D minor, and Beethoven's in F minor; both played to perfection by Messrs. Sainton, Goffrie, Doyle, and Piatti: Mendelssohn's trio in C minor (No. 2), in which the first and last named gentlemen were joined by Herr Lubeck, who also gave Beethoven's sonata in C sharp minor, best known as the Moonlight Sonata.

The remaining novelty was the "Sleep song" from Auber's Masaniello, given with the utmost delicacy of expression by Mr. Sims Reeves, who also contributed Rossini's barcarolle, "La Gita in Gondola," in such a manner as to elicit an encore, which it was impossible to resist. To Mr. Santley for his admirable rendering of Vincent Wallace's capital song, "The Bell Ringer," a like compliment was deservedly paid, and much applause was earned by the said gentleman in Mr. J. W. Davison's "Rough Wind that moanest loud." Mr. Benedict as usual accompanied the vocal music with consummate ability.

On Monday next—an Italian night—Miss Arabella Goddard, Miss Laura Baxter, Mlle. Parepa, Herr Becker, &c., will appear. The selection (except one air repeated by desire) will be entirely new.

Swansea.—The Jullien Concert came off on Monday evening at the Guildhall, under the patronage of the Mayor. Considering the benevolent object in view, namely, to aid the fund on behalf of M. Jullien's widow and family, who have been left totally unprovided for, the attendance was not so large as we anticipated. Sufficient, however, we hope, has been realised to enable the promoters to transmit a substantial sum to the fund. The following artistes kindly gave their services on the occasion:—Madame Endersohn, the last vocalist who accompanied the great maestro on his tour through England; Miss Evans, of Newport; Miss Harrison; Miss Pincott; Mr. Merrick, of the Bristol Cathedral; Mr. W. Bowen, and the members of the Swansea Musical Union, led by Mons. F. Ternon. Dr. Wastfield, Dr. Denning, and Mr. Fricker, also kindly gave their services. The concert opened with Auber's overture, Masaniello. Madame Enderssohn sang Donizetti's aria, "L'Amor Suo," Hadyn's Canzonet, "She never told her love," "Home, sweet Home," and M. Enderssohn's "Only in jest." We were much pleased with Miss Rachel Evans' pianoforte solos. She was loudly encored. Miss Harrison sang Meyerbeer's "Robert toi qui j'aime," and Wallace's "Gentle Troubadour." Mr. Merrick, of the Bristol Cathedral, sang. Mr. Bowen and Miss Pincott assisted as amateurs. The former sang "Good Rhein Wine" with much spirit, and was encored. Miss Pincott received a similar compliment. Dr. Wastfield and Dr. Denning conducted.

The Musical World.

LONDON: SATURDAY, MAY 26, 1860.

HANDEL'S Israel in Egypt, recently performed by the Sacred Harmonic Society at Exeter Hall, attracted the most numerous audience of the season. This masterpiece, which stands at the very pinnacle of the art, and is perhaps the most transcendent example of choral writing extant, has for some years—especially since the Handel commemoration of 1857—held a place in public regard not inferior to that which the Messiah has maintained for more than a century. It is no longer considered laboured and dry; the choruses are no longer reproached for their profusion, uninterrupted succession, and extreme difficulty; the vocal solos, airs, and duets no longer accounted inexpressive, or too few. All such criticism is consigned to oblivion; and were it to arise again from the dust, and appeal to the judges and amateurs of the present hour, it would be welcomed with derisive sneers by the musical community at large.

A contemporary has insinuated that Mendelssohn's preface to the edition of Israel in Egypt, prepared for the Handel Society, had some hand in establishing this admirable reform. This is more than probable. When such a man approaches the text with religious veneration, and even offers an apology for the organ part added by himself, —not in the hope of supplying what Handel left unwritten, but as a guide to the generality of organists,—it would be indiscreet on the part of any other to meddle with the score, which, while restoring to its original purity, Mendelssohn pronounced "one of the greatest and most lasting works." Happily the best conductors of our time are of a mind with Mendelssohn, and will not suffer a single bar to be interpolated, to which reserve, we firmly believe, may be traced the ever-increasing popularity of Israel in Egypt.

The songs and duets introduced by Professor Taylor broke the chain of miracle choruses, interrupted the dramatic interest of the musical description, and disturbed the clear and masterly design, which made one great whole of this unequalled inspiration. Much the same result, indeed, accrued from the officious meddling of Nahum Tate with King Lear, Dryden with The Tempest, Thomson with Coriolanus, Colley Cibber with Richard the Third, Garrick with Romeo and Juliet and Hamlet — "cum multis aliis." But the uncompromising principle of Mr. Macready cleansed the Augean stable, and restored the drama of Shakspere to its pristine vigour. What Mendelssohn did for Handel, Macready did for Shakspere. Why should not Mr. Costa stir up the half-extinguished embers of the opera, and, like his great contemporaries, earn the name of a reformer, by restoring Mozart, and giving us Don Giovanni as the immortal composer wrote it? Were he to do this, it would ensure him a niche in the Temple of the Unforgotten.

An opinion of Israel in Egypt, as now usually performed by the Sacred Harmonic Society, may be briefly expressed. The choruses, with the exception of three, are almost invariably executed in such a manner as to reduce to a sinecure the office of the critic, who waits in vain for defects whereon to exercise the eloquence of reproach. The exceptions, however, are grave exceptions. It is true that "He sent a thick darkness" is rarely sung in tune; but is that a reason why it should never be sung in tune? Did Handel write under each separate part, Please sing out of tune? Assuredly not. Inasmuch, then, as singing in tune is allowed to be possible by the most noted professors of the art, who even urge it on the student's attention, as the indispensable point to which his industry should be directed, and in default of which the emission of vocal sounds becomes no better than an unpleasant noise, it is the duty of conductors to enforce it with the whole weight of their authority. Sung throughout in tune, the sublime chorus, "He sent a thick darkness," would be both more intelligible and more impressive.

Again,—it is true that the chorus, "With the blast of thy nostrils," is elaborate and difficult, and for this reason is rarely given to perfection. But if a chorus, because elaborate and difficult, may be passed over with as little care as a chorus which is unelaborate and easy, of what use is the custom of rehearsals, and of what advantage an experienced "bâton?" Our conductors have it in their power, and should exert their authority, to obtain that precision for "With the blast of thy nostrils" which has hitherto been wanting; and until achieved, the result upon which Handel calculated must remain a dead letter. Granted there are three distinct subjects in this chorus treated both separately and in combination; but Handel intended them all three to be heard, which he knew was possible, or would not have planned it so. The effect is evident enough upon the pianoforte, and there is no reason why it should not be equally so in the choral-orchestra.

Again,—it is true that the chorus, "The people shall hear," the most prodigious in the whole series, has suffered, time out of mind, from the same indecision. Here, indeed, severe discipline is even more necessary than in the others. The confusion of minor and major chords and scales, to which we are accustomed in the execution of this chorus, is nothing short of torture to delicate ears; and yet, with perseverance, a satisfactory performance might be achieved, or (we repeat) Handel would not have written it. The contemporary, already alluded to, advises Mr. Costa, on the next occasion, to call a special rehearsal for the two last of these choruses. We join in the recommendation; suggesting the addition of "He sent a thick darkness," and "He smote all the first-born of Egypt."

A model performance of Israel in Egypt would be as welcome as a model performance of Don Giovanni, or of Fidelio. All these are yet to be accomplished. We have heard the Messiah and Elijah to perfection, but not Israel; we have witnessed Guillaume Tell and Der Freischütz and Masaniello without once being incited to criticism, but never Fidelio, nor Don Juan.

THERE are several Don Juans. Not only are there the Don Juan of Torso de Molina, the Don Juan of Molière, and the Don Juan of Mozart, but in the Don Juan legends of Spain there are half a dozen Don Juans of different forms and shades of profligacy, of whom the two most celebrated are the Don Juan de Marana and the Don Juan de Tenorio. Don Juan de Marana, after corrupting his friend's mistress and murdering his friend; after gambling away the money entrusted to him by a dying soldier on the field of battle, to be given to his orphan family; after having seduced women into breaking every vow woman could make to man; felt that it still remained to him to corrupt a spiritual bride—a nun, who had sworn to love but heaven. Is it not written in the legendary literature of Spain, how, by the mere power of his eye he fascinated an unhappy novice, as a rattlesnake fascinates a bird? How, after the service in the Seville Cathedral was at an end, he thrust a letter through the bars of the cage which held his victim; through the grille which separated the altar from the corridors of the convent, and behind which abbess and nuns knelt (and prayed when there was no Don Juan to trouble them) during mass? How the trembling girl met him in the convent garden; and how in visiting her he well nigh lost his life; and how, weak and fainting from loss of blood, he fell into a fever, and in his delirium saw his own funeral, and was told by the hundred monks who followed it that they were indeed praying for the soul of the great sinner, Don Juan de Marana; upon which he became converted and "étant vieux se fit ermite?"

This is not the Don Juan for us. Better by far is the Don Juan of Molière, who pretends to be converted, and crowns his criminal career with hypocrisy, at the same time calling his valet to bear witness that he is the same Don Juan he has always been; "ne craignant ni Dieu, ni diable, ni loup garou." This is the Don Juan de Tenorio who asked the statue of the murdered commandant to sup with him; who was not alarmed when the statue, with that punctuality which is the politeness of ghosts, made his appearance in the supper-room, but who, having given his hand—brave and defiant to the last—to the marble guest, felt suddenly the fire of hell in his veins, and was dragged down by his visitor to the regions of eternal torment (in which, by the way, if he had not deserved the assassin's blow he could scarcely have been a resident). This, we need hardly say, is also the Don Juan of Mozart's immortal opera, and probably it was the fact of the original Juan's surname having been Tenorio that suggested to the manager of the Royal Italian Opera the propriety of entrusting the part to Signor Mario, rather than to some barytone.

However that may be, nothing can be clearer than that in representing the story of Don Juan (de Ferrario) it is essential that the statue of the Commandant should be invited to supper, that he should accept the invitation, and that he should ultimately take his irreverent host away to sup with him in the midst of blue fire. Talk of omitting the part of Hamlet in a representation of Hamlet? That would be as nothing compared with the omission of the statue of the Commandant from a performance of Don Juan. Mr. Buckstone, of facetious notoriety, tells a story of an American theologian and preacher who founded a religion which hopelessly and ignominiously failed because he attempted to carry it on with the assistance of an evil spirit. Well, Don Giovanni, last Thursday, at Her Majesty's Theatre, was like the religion of the poor insane American divine mentioned by Mr. Buckstone, except in this respect, that the opera did not fail — not in a musical sense at least; but the legend was utterly spoiled, the moral entirely lost, from the simple fact that the statue of the Commandant came, saw, actually shook hands with "Don Juan," and then went away with him! It is absurd to see "Don Juan" carried off by a host of imps; it is absurd to see the last scene terminated (as on Tuesday night, at Her Majesty's Theatre) by a display of fireworks; but most absurd of all is it to see "Don Juan" left quietly to himself after the ghostly commandant has had a few minutes' conversation with him.

If the statue of the Commandant was not sure to come for us at last, who that had the power would not be a Don Juan? The author who translated the drama of Punch understood this. In the original version of that wonderful composition, Punch, after killing every one else, actually kills Satan. What does he do then? He simply and naturally exclaims: "The devil is dead; we can now all do as we like." To teach our modern Don Juans the impossibility of any such course of conduct, we entreat Mr. E. T. Smith to restore the descent of Don Juan into the abyss.

THIS time the report is but too true;—we have lost our Albert Smith. That portion of light pleasantry that made the Egyptian Hall so cheerful has ceased to play. The travelled Brown rests at his journey's end; the engineer's narghilhe pipe is out. For many years to come Mont Blanc will be regarded as a centre of melancholy thoughts, and we shall not care often to reflect on the Feast of Lanterns. London has sustained an irreparable loss. A species of entertainment has perished with Albert Smith that no other person can be expected to revive.

Albert Smith was distinctly the inventor of the medley lecture which for several years has been connected with his name. All the other "entertainments" are more or less modifications of the old "Mathews at Home" adapted to modern usages,—all more or less monodramas in which the theatrical element is conspicuous; unless, indeed, as in the case of Mr. and Mrs. T. G. Reed, where two persons appear, the performance becomes absolutely dramatic. The characters embodied in these entertainments are of an abstract kind, assumed to be types of real life, but in point of fact much more like stage conventions. Now with Albert Smith the narrative element decidedly predominated. He was the traveller describing his own journey, and as he always regarded the various objects from his own point of view, he had much of that freshness of which we find a classical type in the Muses of Herodotus. That depreciation of "high art" which has done so much mischief among the smatterers of the day, who think they look fine when they despise what their fathers have admired, was less offensive in him than in any of his followers. It was an honest expression of dislike for that which he really did not admire, not an affected humour put on for the sake of exciting surprise. The personages whom he so inimitably represented, far from being abstractions, exhibited just as much of their idiosyncracies as could readily be displayed by any loquacious individual in a railway carriage or a packet, and were never intended to stand as entire humanities. That immortal engineer with his grievances, for instance, was shown on his colloquial side, under circumstances that would bring the colloquial side forward, and had no affinity to those traditional aldermen who bawled for turtle in the midst of their tea and toast.

The charm of Albert Smith's delivery can never be described to those who have not actually heard him. It was natural, fluent, glib, and so utterly unaffected, that he might be charged with carelessness rather than with a desire to create a sensation. His old experiences of travel seemed to come upon him again, and his hearers were delighted when they found how those experiences accorded with their own. The plenitude of physical comfort in which they were placed disposed them to be in a good humour, and in this amiable disposition they were all maintained by the unceasing affability of the lecturer.

Laying no claim to the character of a musical artist, and endowed with a weak organ, Albert Smith had nevertheless as much vocal proficiency as was required for his purpose, and no one better understood the art of making pleasant phrases effective, by associating them with a telling tune. The faculty of rapid articulation, common among Italians, which was marvellously displayed in his so-called "patter songs," he shared with few compatriots. Indeed we do not know where we should find equal volubility in any living Englishman besides Charles Mathews.

There is another merit of Albert Smith which should never be forgotten, and that is his wonderful mastery over English versification. He could neatly and humorously treat of any subject in any measure, and his songs, smart and pointed throughout, never seemed to be disfigured by a forced or feeble line. His talent, in this respect, was perpetually exercised by his Galignani's Messenger, which was so varied as to contain facetious allusions to the prevailing topics of the day. Albert Smith's entertainment, in fact, was the complete expression of Albert Smith himself,—the vehicle for all his thoughts, sentiments, and opinions; and on this account he might be likened to those old-fashioned divines, whose discourses were not only the sermons, but likewise the newspapers and the political instructors of the congregation.

PRINCESS'S THEATRE.—We understand that M. Fechter, an Englishman by birth and education, and in his own particular department the very best actor on the French stage, is engaged at the Princess's Theatre, and will make his first appearance in October next, most probably in an English version of "Ruy Blas."

ANTON RUBINSTEIN.—It is rumoured in London that this celebrated pianist and composer died suddenly a few days since, at Leipsic. We have no direct information which can enable us to vouch for the truth of the report, but trust that it may prove to have been without foundation.

SIG. CORDIGIANI.—The death of this graceful composer has added another to the list of notable persons whose loss the art has to regret.

HERR RUDOLPH SCHACHNER, whose death is announced in the Guide Musical (of Brussels), is happily for his friends and admirers alive and well.

NEW ARRIVALS.—Among the recent arrivals from the Continent are Master Dencke, a pianist of twelve years old, of whom Joseph Joachim writes to a friend in the following terms:—"He is a thoughtful modest youth, and for his age a remarkable executant on the piano. Recommend him to those among our friends who are sure to take an interest in him when they have once heard him." Another pianist—Herr Joseph Wieniawski (brother of the violinist) is also on a visit to London.

THE ORGANISTSHIP AT THE LEEDS PROVINCIAL TOWN HALL. From our Correspondent.—The time allotted for applications to be sent in to the Leeds Town Council for the situation of Organist at the Town Hall having expired, the Committee met on Wednesday to take further proceedings. There were twenty-two applications, and these having been examined with their accompanying testimonials, the Committee reduced the candidates to seven, viz.: Mr. Hilton, Manchester; Mr. William Spark, Leeds; Mr. James Broughton, Leeds; Mr. Walter Parratt, Huddersfield; Mr. George Hepworth, Mecklenburg-Schwerin; Mr. Oldham, London; and Mr. James Taylor, Gloucester. The Committee will probably again meet on Wednesday next, when the three judges will be selected, before whom the abilities of the competing candidates will be tested.

Letters to the Editor.

MATHEMATICAL THEORY OF THE CHORD OF THE DOMINANT 7th.

SIR,—In my last (Musical World, April 21st) it will be seen that the sounds of the primary major chords of any three adjacent systems of sounds (see Musical World, January 28th) form a major scale or key, the root or tonic of which is the basis of the central system. Now it is necessary to be observed, that the sounds of these primary chords in any two adjacent systems only could not of themselves decide the key, for in this case, as there would be no central basis, so the root or tonic would be indeterminate. Thus, for instance, in the two adjacent systems having the primary bases G and C, the sounds of the primary chords belong equally to the keys of which either basis is the tonic, that is, to either mode formed by the three systems D G C or G C F, in other words, the sounds G B D and C E G belong equally to the scale of G and the scale of C, therefore from these sounds alone, the scale, or key, could not be determined. On the contrary, if we take the sounds G B D and F A C, which are those of the primary chords of the two extreme systems, G and F of the mode C, then the tonic C, which is the basis of the intermediate, or central, system is at once pointed out; these sounds also, taken collectively, belonging to the key of C and not to any other, that key is immediately indicated; moreover, as shown in my last, the sound G, the basis of one of these two systems, as dominant leads downwards a 5th, or upwards a 4th, to C, the root of the mode, or tonic of the key, so also the F, the basis of the other system, which, with regard to its position and influence in the mode, would be correctly termed an inverted dominant, or sub-dominant, and on this account act in the opposite direction, leads upwards a 5th or downwards a 4th, to the unit sound C, again to the tonic of the key; when, therefore, we introduce the primary basis F in combination with the major chord of G, we have the sounds of the two extreme systems, both of which in combination lead to the key of C. The sound F in this chord thus becomes the modulus of the system of which it is the primary basis, and the primary chord, the chord of the modulus, both leading to the sounds and harmonies of that system, as contained in the derivative chords, which thus become the chords of the resolution, all the sounds of which belong to the keys of which C is the tonic. It is evident that the discord must resolve upon these harmonies only, for the dominant G leads to C, the root of the mode, which is also the unit sound of the system F, and, with the exception of the chord of the modulus (which cannot also become the chord of its resolution—it cannot fall upon itself), all the harmonies into which C enters as the unit sound, are contained in the derivative chords of the system F. From this it is clear that the primary basis F, which is also the fourth sound in the scale of C, is the true 7th of the major chord of G, and this is correctly called the chord of the dominant 7th. Also, as the chords of the 9th, 11th, and 13th are merely variations of this chord (as pointed out in my letter, Musical World, January 28th), it is therefore the fundamental principle of all modulations, as it contains the primary sounds of the two extreme systems of the mode, which of any two, are those only which can determine the key.

By some theorists this 7th has been called a fundamental 7th, because it was supposed to be the sound derived directly as an harmonic from a principal sound as generator, or, which is the same thing, from the division of a musical string, or monochord, into seven equal parts; but this is incorrect; for suppose a musical string whose length is unity, giving the sound G, then $\frac{1}{7}$ of this length would give the fundamental 7th, and the ratio of its vibrations would be $\frac{7}{1}$, but the ratio of the dominant 7th is $\frac{16}{9}$, and their comparative ratios 63-64, therefore the fundamental 7th is flatter in pitch than the dominant 7th in this proportion, but the dominant 7th F is the true 4th of the scale of C, consequently the fundamental 7th, which forms no part of the same scale, cannot be a sound leading to that scale, that is, it cannot give an impression of any of those sounds; moreover, it being an harmonic of G, it is not a sound leading from but one leading to that basis. Also, if unity represent the length of string giving the sound G, no harmonic whatever of this sound, that is, no aliquot division of this string can give F the true dominant 7th in any of its octaves; for as the ratio of the vibrations of any harmonic must always have some integral power of 2 for its second term, it is evident that no harmonic can exactly correspond with the dominant 7th whose ratio being $\frac{16}{9}$ its second term must be always 9 times some power of 2; and as 9, which is an odd number, can form no integral power of an even number, such as 2, therefore no aliquot division of the string sounding G can give F the dominant 7th. It is true from the generator G we can find an harmonic as near as we please to this F, but not the exact sound; in this sense the dominant 7th may be considered as the limit of an infinite series of converging harmonic ratios of which the fundamental 7th may be taken as the first term. Again, although the F is no harmonic of G, we cannot say the same of these sounds reciprocally, for if we further examine the ratio of F to G, which is $\frac{16}{9}$, we find that 16, which is the 4th power of 2, is the first term of the ratio, not the second, so that the ratio appears in the form of an inverted, or negative harmonic; therefore we must interpret it as we would a negative quantity in algebra, which has exactly the opposite meaning of a positive quantity. In this case it shows that F is not an harmonic of G, but that G is an harmonic of F, and this is evidently true, for if we reduce the ratio $\frac{16}{9}$ to its lowest octave, it is $\frac{9}{8}$, and the length of string necessary to produce this sound F is $\frac{8}{9}$, or 9, that is, 9 times the length of the one giving the sound G, consequently, G being produced from the division of the string sounding F, into 9 equal parts, is an harmonic of that sound. As regards the manner of the resolution of the chord of the dominant 7th, it is easy to show that the natural progression of the sounds individually, is to the nearest sounds of that derivative chord, to which we may choose to proceed; but this is again affected by another law, which we may call the "equilibrium of concordant sounds," depending upon the same sure scientific basis which I may hereafter explain.—I remain, Sir,

Yours truly,

W. W. PARKINSON.

"THE SEA HATH ITS PEARLS."

Sir,—In your notice of my song, "The Sea hath its Pearls," which appeared in last Saturday's number of the Musical World, I see you have taken some misprints for "violations of good harmony." I beg to submit the following passages, which were in the orchestral score (written about twelve months before the song was published), which will, I hope, partly exonerate me from the charge of such gross mistakes.

Firstly.

Secondly.

Lastly.

All of which I shall correct as above in the next printing. Not having looked carefully over it, I was not aware of the mistakes. I herewith send you a corrected copy, and remain,

Sir, yours respectfully,

T. Scotson Clark.

GRUMBLINGS.

Mr. Editor,—As grumbling is John Bull's prerogative, I often find myself indulging in sundry discontented notions, when I think of "the days that are gone," as regards musical affairs, considering that in some points we have retrograded.

We are entering on another "season," as the migratory influx at this time is termed. We shall have the usual round of concerts, two, and sometimes three, being crowded into one day. Now have you any interest, direct or indirect, with the beneficiaires or those who assist them? If so, can you prevail upon them to infuse a little novelty into their programmes. and then regular concert goers will not listen with such apathy to the fare which is dished up season after season. I attribute this sameness to the indolence of professionals, who, having "got up" a few things, endeavour to force them into the ears of every audience they come before, until the public become so satiated that the performance is little else but an infliction. However great the talent of the artist, scarcely one is exempt from the charge. If we often dined with a friend who had a variety of excellent wine in his cellar, we should not like to be presented with a bottle of the same port, with an occasional glass of Cape sherry; yet we are heated with this sort of fare, in a musical sense, week after week, by our first artists. Beethoven's Adelaide is, we know, a lovely composition; but why Adelaide, ad nauseam, particularly if encored with "Pretty Jane," or "Come into the garden, Maud"? It is in theatres and our large music halls where this practice mostly prevails, where the taste of the galleries is consulted, and where a few obstinately vociferous frequenters often succeed in obtaining a repetition of some hackneyed song, which the rest of the audience are obliged to sit out with apathetic impatience. Several years back I heard Weber's "Ocean, thou mighty monster," by one of our concert singers, and I will not tell you how many concerts I have attended since, where I have heard the same song by the same lady, even at three successive benefit concerts given by the same person. I recollect when every aspirant came out with "The Soldier tired," that being the pièce de resistance of the day, and the rapidity with which she sang the triplets prevented the public from distinguishing whether they were sung in or out of tune; and if she could reach the D in alt at the close it was considered perfection. Many singing-masters finished their pupils with it, and the latter took care not to forget it or allow the public to lose sight of it. There are many specimens of the old masters that we expect to be occasionally introduced. All lovers of music are pleased to hear "Che faro," and many other pleasing reminiscences of the old school; but a continued presentation of "Che faro" betokens a lack of industry and an indifference that approaches to something like laughing at us for being good easy souls, who will put up with anything from an artist with a good voice. How we were dosed with "Robert toi que j'aime" a few seasons back! We were afraid to look at a concert bill lest we should see the word "Robert." Then every young lady who could sing it, or could not, was attempting it in private, her master not daring to deny her learning it after a miserable fashion, and so it became our "John Jones." But I need not continue an enumeration of instances of this nature. Instrumental performers are not such great sinners in this respect, because they are not so sparing of their trouble yet it requires more preparation to perfect one of Beethoven's or Mendelssohn's concertos * than is necessary for "Bonnie Dundee" or "Home, sweet home," which class of composition we continually notice in the programmes of concert after concert. I find one source of congratulation, that is, we are getting rid of the disgusting tremolo that many singers indulged in. It was a French importation, though freely bestowed upon us by some of the Italians, some of whom have so addicted themselves to this voce di capra that they cannot sing a pure note. When Madame Mara was told that Miss "Such-a-one" was a fine singer, she generally answered, "Can she sing three good notes in succession?" And a very sensible reply. Signor Ferrari, in his excellent singing tutor, says, that as the street organs imitate this execrable introduction, it can sink no lower, and this may have influenced the perpetrators, in some degree, as il n'y a rien qui tui comme le ridicule.

Another vice has unfortunately been gaining on us during the last twenty years, viz. the rapidity with which pieces are performed, unless absolutely marked largo. With few exceptions, every orchestral symphony or overture is a match against time, and we beat the continentals hollow in this race. I suppose it will be admitted that any composition ought to be played in the time the author intended, but conductors now-a-days fancy they know better what the time should be than the composer did. When Weber came to this country to superintend the bringing out of his Oberon he conducted some concerts at Covent Garden, and was the first who used the bâton in England, though a musical reviewer in The Times, a few days back, says that Mendelssohn was the first to introduce it. As soon as they began the overture to Der Freischutz (that is, the allegro movement), he stopped them, and inquired if that was the time they had been accustomed to. On being answered that it was, he replied that it was by no means the time he intended, and made them begin it a third slower. Haydn also, when he visited this country, and composed the symphonies for Salomon, complained of the same thing. Dr. Crotch, who told me this, was present at the time, and said that the little man was very wroth to find them galloping away with his minuets. Many of your readers must know that Spöhr made the same remark when in England. The present fashion for excessive rapidity does not allow the ear to follow or the mind to grasp one passage in ten, consequently the performance becomes, to the generality of hearers, an unmeaning succession of rapid fiddling passages; nevertheless, if it be something by one of the great masters, it is considered quite correct to pronounce it "magnificent," "superb," "splendid," and so forth; they applaud the conductor, he makes a gracious bow, and endeavours to merit their laudations, by getting it done if possible a little faster. In my twilight musings by the fireside the other day, I pictured to myself Haydn, Mozart, and Weber returning to Elysium after a furlough for a few days to the metropolis.

Weber, loq.—"Well, Michael, what do you say to the manner in which they play your symphonies. Do they give the exact time that you intended when you wrote them for your old friend Salomon?"

"My dear Carl Maria, I have no heart to talk about it. Perhaps the best answer I can give you is, that there is a word much used in England for which they are indebted to the Americans; it is 'go-a-head;' and signifies a reckless haste to effect any object, without regard to consistency or ultimate gratification. This appears to be the leading principle as regards musical performance. The English have become a great musical people, and can collect at a few days' notice, as you must have perceived, a powerful orchestra and a chorus of from 500 to 2000 voices very fairly drilled. Our best compositions are becoming well known to the musical world, but from their being so frequently repeated, the performance becomes a mechanical operation on the part of the orchestra, the time becomes insensibly accelerated; expression and harmonious effect being secondary considerations. The conductor, who never plays a note himself, thinks that the faster he can flourish his stick the more talent he displays, so the whole affair becomes a ridiculous display of manipulation. Ah! those conductors; I swear by the ring of the Emperor Frederick, that I shall look out when Charon brings over two or three of those fellows, and whisper a word in the ear of Rhadamanthus, before he hears what they have to say. What say you Wolfgang?"

* Mendelssohn's in G minor is becoming pretty well worked.

Conductors they are called, are they? Assassins is my word for them. Die Lumpe. I saw one of these geniuses giving the time to my Zauberflöte. Oh how I longed for the power to become mortal, that I might have banged about his head the bâton he was brandishing to and fro. Nobody who did not know it by heart, could have followed the orchestra so as to understand what it meant, and it was nothing but a mockery. Have you seen Beethoven since your return? He would not like to hear his Choral Symphony as they scramble through it. I heard his Septett in E♭ which was nicely massacred, merely because the orchestra were able to play in the time. The parts they played the best were the pauses; one could breathe now and then. I passed him just now, while he was asking Handel if it would have entered his mind to write oratorios, had he not quarrelled with his opera singers, Bononcini and his patrons. That was a lucky thought of our friend George. He saw that he would secure an audience for sacred music, though it were performed in a theatre. But either he or the singers of that day were very irascible, as he soon quarrelled with his solo performers, to which circumstance we are indebted for Israel in Egypt, as in that oratorio he rendered himself indepesdent of them. You talk about their manner of playing Beethoven; I should not like Ludwig to hear some of his andantes, particularly those in 𝄴. They are often done in the same time that you intended for your minuets. They do not take these liberties with sacred music. Your Creation was very nicely done at a place called Exeter Hall; the introductory chaos was perfect. I would give half a dozen of my masses for that one page. I must tell you that at this Exeter Hall everything operatic is, if possible, excluded (except the singers), so that a primo tenore may come from a rehearsal of a comic opera straight to Exeter Hall, but he is expected to compose his mind in the state for changing the character of Don Giovanni or Figaro for that of Joshua, Obadiah, or the archangel Gabriel. The orchestra is composed of many of the same individuals at one place as at the other. The principal difference is, that there is no canvas or foot-lights. Is it not true, Weber?"

"Perfectly correct, Wolfgang. It is true as the repetitions from your Idomeneo."

"Gently, gently, Carl; I have been twitted with the same remark by Daddy Haydn. It is well known that I was in love at the time I wrote Idomeneo, and that inspired me to produce what I found would bear repetition. I could find a few passages in his quartetts that are repeated more than once or twice, to say nothing of the poverty of the first half-dozen. However, there is one thing that should console us; the English honour our memories by bringing forth some of our compositions at every concert of importance. But the man at present in vogue is called Verdi. You should see the music he writes for his sopranos. See it, not hear it, for there are passages enough to spoil lungs of iron. Did you hear any, Michael?"

"Yes, and was quite out of breath, expecting that the singers would be, every line, in the same state, as I looked for nothing but a break down. Rossini and Bellini are more consistent; their melodies more original in the bargain. I went to the Hanover Square Rooms, where I had often sat at the pianoforte when my symphonies were performed; but I did not then intrude on the functions of the leader. Now, the leader's occupation is gone; yet the music went quite as well in the days of François Cramer or John Loder. All the orchestra distinguished his sonorous fiddle, and the firmness with which he led a heavy band nothing could surpass. There was no musical Jack in the box with a truncheon. Viotti, and many others, would have died of a broken heart to have been thus displaced. Why not put the leader in front of the orchestra, that he may appear at his true post, instead of appearing a mere repieno? But my spirit strolled into the suburbs, and would you believe it, at the tea gardens and dancing booths, each little knot of musicians has its conductor, who flourishes a stick for even a set of quadrilles or a polka."

Moz. "What is a polka?"

"I discovered by the performance that it is a movement in 𝄴, with a slight accent on the 3rd quaver to accommodate the step of the dancers. It is danced like our waltzes, except that there is a little more of the allegro appasionato between the couples, therefore very much patronised. Did you hear one of your operas, Mozart, while among the mortals?"

"Yes, I heard Don Giovanni. Donnerblitz! how it was galloped through. When they came to 'Non piu andrai' I could stand it no longer. In Spagnoletti's time (and Weichsel's before him), it was a treat to hear the descending passages of semiquavers staccato as I had expressly marked them, but no violin player could bow them staccato in the way it is sung now. I could hear no more. I am surprised that the conductors succumb to a vitiated taste. In the minor theatres of course they ape the conductor mania, and, accordingly, stick somebody up in the middle of the orchestra, though it must be a decided waste of money on the part of the manager, as the light kind of music heard at these theatres makes the conductor a fifth wheel. As this functionary is often absent, his post is filled by the 1st violin, who jumps up in his place, and from that moment considers it derogatory to his dignity pro tem. to be really useful, so commences waving his bow as if he were giving the time to my Jupiter. This frequently takes place where there are three 1st violins, so the farce is kept up at a decided sacrifice of effect, for the brass and drums then have completely the best of it. Managers in general know as much about music as of Sanscrit, so are led by the nose by some one whose interest it is to throw a little dust in their eyes. Did you notice anything of this sort, Weber?"

"Plenty, my dear Mozart, and was highly amused; but there was another feature that predominates with the English at present, the taste for large masses of performers, some would say a taste for noise. This is much encouraged by a company who have built an immense glass house they call a Crystal Palace, and make a good speculation by collecting large choirs and commemorating the birthday of some celebrity. Handel has had two days, Schiller has had his fête, and the managers have jumped over you, Mozart, Haydn, and even our revered Beethoven, to celebrate his greatest imitator, Mendelssohn; but Mendelssohn is in fashion now, so it becomes a more profitable speculation. I am glad to see that the profound harmonist Spöhr has had a kind of recognition; but it is not to be expected that the best of his works can be appreciated by any but musicians. But good bye, for here comes Corelli, and I would rather not tell him that his solos are out of date, except for those who are practising the violoncello. I would rather meet Lully, as they continue to put variations to his Au clair de la Lune; or even Palestrini, he being now and then called to remembrance by the Glee and Madrigal Societies. Au revoir."

A VETERAN.

[We shall have a word or two with "Veteran" in our next.—ED.]

ELIJAH.

SIR,—In your last No. you say, "On Friday, 1st June, Elijah will be given, the first time for two years, at Exeter Hall." I find that the last performance by the Sacred Harmonic Society was on the 3rd February, 1859, on the occasion of the 50th anniversary of the birth of the Composer; and in your No. of 5th February, 1859, you give an account of the performance; so you will perceive a slight error is made in your last No. I have the volume for last year before me, and I was at the performance named, so you will find I am correct. The moment I saw your statement in the Musical World, I was certain that Elijah was performed last year.

I remain, Sir, yours, &c.,

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

ON Saturday Il Barbiere was repeated. On Tuesday Il Don Giovanni was given, with Madame Grisi as Donna Anna; and on Thursday Il Trovatore.

La Gazza Ladra will be produced to-night, with Madame Penco as Ninetta (her first appearance in this part in London), and M. Faure as Fernando (first time of performance), with Madame Nantier-Didiée as Pippo, and Signor Ronconi as the Podesta.

The new Floral Hall, brilliantly illuminated, has been opened on several evenings of late after the performance, affording the visitors an opportunity of enjoying a delightful half-hour's promenade, and hearing some popular music played by the band of the Coldstream Guards.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

THE part of Maffeo Orsini, in Donizetti's Lucrezia Borgia, is one of subordinate rank, and, indeed, was never accorded any importance here until sustained (in 1847, at the Royal Italian Opera) by the distinguished singer for whose first appearance in London since 1858 it was selected on Saturday night. It has been suggested, and not without reason, that the company engaged by the new lessee of Her Majesty's Theatre exhibits an "embarras de richesses" almost unprecedented; that he has, in short, so many sopranos, "mezzos," and contraltos, tenors, barytones, and basses at disposal, as to be somewhat at a loss how to dispose of them all for the advantage of the establishment and the gratification of its patrons. Nevertheless, were Mr. Smith twice as wealthy in vocalists of every denomination, and of every grade of talent—from the highest to the lowest—the addition of Madame Alboni to the list would be none the less unanimously welcomed by frequenters of the Italian Opera, inasmuch as she worthily represents Italian art in its highest degree of refinement. While vocal excellence continues to hold the sway which has been its privilege since music was in its infancy, and while the human voice is still pronounced by general consent the most absolutely perfect of instruments, although the most difficult to control with address, the peerless organ and consummate proficiency owned by this lady will never lose one atom of their legitimate influence. If a beautiful voice, even untrained by early and assiduous study, can delight the majority of hearers, how much more potent its charm when so entirely under command that the nicest inflection is invariably true, the most delicate turn as just as a mathematical axiom, and the subtlest gradation tempered with such discretion that no mechanical contrivance could surpass it, need hardly be insisted on. Join to these purely artistic acquirements the graces of style, a taste rarely at fault, and expression that, while always genuine, never verges on exaggeration, and we have briefly summed up those qualities which impart to Madame Alboni's singing the attraction it exercises, and to which it is indebted for the recognition it universally obtains among those most competent to judge.

In the music assigned to Maffeo Orsini only one phase of Madame Alboni's talent has a chance of being completely revealed; but as this is probably the phase most readily appreciated by the mass, there can be no reason to wonder at the popularity it has enabled her to win. The instant her well-known figure—draped in that singular tunic (if tunic it may be called) which her excessive "embonpoint" compels her to wear—was detected, mingling with the crowd (in the first scene of the opera), a burst of applause from all parts of the house proclaimed the satisfaction of the audience at seeing their favourite once more. The legend recounted by Orsini to his friends brought forth in all their beauty those pure contralto tones which have so often charmed the public, and—sung, as usual, to perfection—elicited the warmest demonstrations of approval. The "triumph," however, was of course reserved for "Il segreto per esser felice"—which Madame Alboni never gave with more spirit and vocal facility, the incomparable "trillo" (shake—to employ our own less elegant vernacular) preceding, in each couplet, the resumption of the genial melody to which Donizetti has allied the words exciting the accustomed marks of admiration. It is almost superfluous to add that the brindisi was enthusiastically redemanded, and repeated with undiminished effect.

We need not recapitulate the many fine points that make the Lucrezia of Mademoiselle Titiens one of that lady's most striking and admirable performances; nor dwell upon the characteristics of Signor Mongini's Gennaro, which wants only a little softening here and there to be as irreproachable as it is earnest and impulsive. The merits of these and of Signor Vialetti's very careful impersonation of the Duke have been more than once discussed. On the present occasion the interest naturally centred in Maffeo Orsini, and at the conclusion of the opera, when Mademoiselle Titiens and Signor Mongini had been summoned before the curtain, there was a general call for Alboni, who, after some delay, made her appearance, and was honoured by such a greeting as is never accorded but to artistes standing highest in public esteem.

The house was crowded in every part, scarcely a vacant place being perceptible in gallery, boxes, pit, or stalls.

On Monday, an extra night, the Trovatore was given for the third time; on this occasion Madame Alboni taking the part of Azucena, allotted in the two previous representations to Madame Borghi-Mamo. The great reputation achieved by Madame Alboni in the gipsy-mother, not, we may be assured, any shortcomings on the part of Madame Borghi-Mamo, induced the management to make the transfer, although, we must confess, we see neither the policy nor wisdom of this bandying about of character from one artist to another. An extra-night, of course, may be pleaded in extenuation. Of the performance generally we need only remark that Mdlle. Titiens was as powerful as ever in Leonora, and that Signor Giuglini never sang more delightfully. Madame Alboni's Azucena cannot be forgotten by those who have seen it. The great artist first undertook the part in 1856. The effect she produced in the character in Paris, coming after Madame Viardot and Madame Borghi-Mamo, was echoed in London; and at last everybody allowed that the incomparable contralto-soprano added intensity and passion to her many other excellencies. Better still than in any former year, in point of energy and force, was Madame Alboni's performance of the gipsy on Monday. It was really powerful acting. Of Madame Alboni's singing we need not hazard a word. It was as exquisite, as perfect as ever, as full of beauties, as sympathetic—a model, in fact, of pure and simple vocalization, and from which any living singer might receive a lesson. Azucena, in fine, is one of Madame Alboni's most remarkable performances.

On Tuesday Semiramide was performed for the first time at Her Majesty's Theatre for several years. The cast was as follows: Semiramide, Mdlle. Titiens; Arsace, Madame Alboni; Idreno, Signor Belart; Assur, Signor Everardi; and Oroe, Signor Vialetti. The character of Arsace,—upon which Rossini has lavished all the florid graces of his melodic invention, and which in one sense stands apart from every other personage in the lyric drama—affords the practised vocalist ample opportunity for display. It was in Arsace that Madame Alboni (at the opening of the Royal Italian Opera, 1847) first elicited the admiration of the English public, and since that memorable occasion it has always been regarded as one of her greatest, if not, indeed, her very greatest performance. If the voice has not quite the same depth and richness as of old, it has gained in other respects, being now so equal in volume and quality throughout the register, that it may be compared to a crystal without a flaw. For mellowness and even suavity of tone it is wholly unrivalled, the notes succeeding each other with such natural fluency, that it is impossible to detect a weak place or single out a "break." An instrument thus perfected enables the singer to articulate every phrase and passage set down with such unvarying ease, that any idea of difficulty never presents itself to the hearer, and the ars celare artem is realised to the letter. More faultless examples of vocal efficiency than the two airs—"Eccomi alfine in Babylonia," and "In si barbara sciagura"—as sung by Madame Alboni, could hardly be cited; or purer specimens of vocal declamation than the recitative belonging to the first, or than the duet with Semiramide (Act II.), including the delicious slow-movement, "Giorno d'orrore." It would have been worth reviving Semiramide—even were the music with which Rossini has galvanised the effete drama of Voltaire less gorgeous and magnificent—for the sake alone of such singing as that by means of which Madame Alboni enables us to judge of Italian art in its perfection, and to show that legitimate exhibitions of skill are still calculated to rouse the enthusiasm of an audience.

Mdlle. Titiens, as Semiramide, is unequal—at times dramatic and superb, at times constrained, and therefore less entirely satisfactory. Some parts of her "Bell raggio" are admirable; her acting in the finale—where the shade of Nino appears to frustrate the designs of the Assyrian Queen—is full of intelligence; and the duets with Assur and Arsace are replete with striking points. But with the remembrance, still vivid, of Madame Grisi's impersonation of Semiramide, more perhaps was expected than we had a right to expect from a foreigner unacquainted with its traditions. At any rate, no one since Madame Grisi has looked the character so well, evinced a readier insight into its histrionic purport, or brought more splendid physical means to its technical illustration. That further experience will enable Mdlle. Titiens to place her Semiramide on the same footing as her Lucrezia, Valentine, and Leonora (to say nothing of her steadily progressing Norma), there can, we think, be little doubt. The only competent representative of Assur whom the present generation of opera-goers can cite is Signor Tamburini; and in saying that, on the whole, Signor Everardi does more with the very arduous music assigned to the part than any other artist who, for many years, has appeared on the boards of Her Majesty's Theatre, we are only rendering strict justice to an artist of decided talent, and still more decided promise. On the other hand, to deny that much is wanting to render his performance irreproachable would be evading the truth to little purpose. The small tenor part of Idreno, intrusted to Signor Belart, is made more conspicuous than usual, owing to that gentleman's marked ability as a singer in the florid style. As Oroe, the high priest, Signor Vialetti leaves nothing to desire. The orchestra and chorus are by no means valuable auxiliaries to the singers before the footlights; and yet one would imagine that the music of Semiramide, from the overture to the end, ought by this time to be familiar to every instrumental performer who has served his apprenticeship.

On Thursday Rigoletto was repeated, when Mdlle. Brunetti confirmed the favourable impression she created by her first performance of Gilda.

BIRMINGHAM. — (From an entirely new and original correspondent) A very agreeable Musical Entertainment was given here on Thursday evening April 26, at the Assembly Rooms, Dee's Royal Hotel, by Mr. H. Phillips, entitled "the Music of various Nations." He was assisted by his daughters Florence and Alice, and by Miss Hawkins, his pupil, a promising soprano, who made her début on this occasion. A fashionable and numerous attendance was the result, and a most agreeable evening was enjoyed. The Programme included characteristic music and melodies of various nations, Scotch, Irish, Chinese, Italian, the melodies of the Holy Land, German, American, Welsh, and English. Each nation was faithfully represented, and the peculiarities of its music cleverly illustrated, from the répertoire of the talented and agreeable Mr. Phillips, on whose shoulders the ever-green mantle of his compeer, John Braham, appears to have fallen. The capabilities of this gentleman appear to be inherited by his daughters, whose performance on the present occasion was above all praise, and elicited frequent and genuine plaudits. Alice the contralto, bids fair to fill the gap which will doubtless ere long be caused by the retirement of Madam Sainton Dolby. Speaking of Miss Phillips, a local professor of the first standing says, "she possesses an extraordinary voice, singing with great power down to the lower E, is an excellent musician, good pianiste, and both herself and sister have received a liberal education in France. Her father is now instructing her in the School of Sacred Music, in which she bids fair to take the highest position. She is but fifteen years of age, her declamatory power, which is, by the way, the leading feature of her singing, is of the very highest order. She sings as she speaks, without the least apparent effort, and yet perfectly articulate, — a rare feature in the present day. Florence her sister possesses a good soprano voice, and is a brilliant pianiste for her age, which is eighteen. It is intended that her musical studies will be completed under the direction of the great Chopin, in Paris."

[Will our entirely new and original correspondent furnish us with his name.—ED.]

The Same to the Same.

Milan, December 22, 1770.

On the 19th occurred the first rehearsal on the stage.

The preceding one on the 17th was gone through in the assembly room of the Ridotta. Heaven be thanked all went off well. Yesterday there was a rehearsal of the recitatives. To-day there will be a second rehearsal on the stage, and on Monday a full rehearsal.

As regards the 26th, the day fixed for the first performance, what consoles me is that I can see the actors (recitanti), and the orchestra as well, are pleased; and I have still, God be thanked, my ears left me. During the rehearsal I posted myself quite at the back, under the principal entrance, that I might hear the effect quite at a distance. Perhaps my ears were too partial. Meanwhile we see all our kind friends rejoiced and satisfied, and all congratulating my son. The ill-disposed are positively dumb. The best esteemed maestri of the city, Fioroni* and Sammartini†, are our true friends, as also are Lampagnani‡, Piazza Colombo.§ On this account envy, incredulity, and prejudice against the productions of our child will have no injurious effect. At least, I hope it will not have the sad fate of Jomelli's, whose second opera at Naples fell completely flat (a terra), so much so that it is to be withdrawn for another. Yet is he a renowned maestro, about whom the Italians make a terrible noise.‖ On the other hand it was a folly on his part, perhaps, to compose two operas in the same year for the same theatre, especially when he saw the first had no great success. Since the 16th we have been every evening, after the Ave Maria, at the opera until eleven o'clock, Friday excepted.

The Same to the Same.

Milan, December 29, 1770.

God be praised! The first performance of the opera took place on the 26th, with complete and universal success, and with circumstances which have never before occurred at Milan; to wit, an air sung by the prima donna was, contrary to all usage on the prima sera, repeated a second time, whereas at a first performance they never cry fuora; and in the second place all the airs, except a few delle vecchine parti, were greeted with extraordinary applause, succeeded by cries of Evviva il maestro! Evviva il maestrino!

On the 27th the two airs of the prima donna were repeated, and it being Thursday, and consequently advancing towards Friday, it was necessary to finish quickly, otherwise the duo would have been repeated also, for they were already beginning to make a noise. But the majority of the public wanted to return home, in order to have something to eat again, and the opera, with its three ballets, had lasted six good hours. To-day we give the third recita.

As Hasse is called il Sassone, and Galappi Busanello, our child is called il cavaliere filarmonico.

The Same to Father Martini, at Bologna.

Milan, January 3, 1771.

At the same time, Very Reverend Father, that I write to wish you a happy new year, I have to inform you that my son's opera has met with a very good reception, in spite of the cabals of our enemies and those who envied us. Before they had seen one note of the work, they spread it about that it was impossible such barbarous music, without method and without depth, could be executed by the orchestra; and to such effect had they bestirred themselves, that they had persuaded half Milan that instead of an opera they were about to hear merely a poor compilation. They had even taken to the principal cantatrice several airs and a duo, composed by the Abbé Gasparini of Turin, and wished to persuade her to introduce them into the opera, and to accept nothing from so young a man as my son, and one so incapable of writing a good aria. But the prima donna declared herself satisfied, and more than satisfied. Notwithstanding this, the calumniators of my son ceased not to cherish the most injurious prejudices against his work. The first rehearsal with instruments, however, so completely closed the mouths of these pitiless babblers, that not a word was heard more. All the professors declared to the orchestra that the music was clear, intelligible, and easily played, as the singers had previously pronounced. The first opera of the season at Milan has generally the ill luck not to attract many people; they always wait for the second before they come to the theatre. Up till now, however, and for the last six representations, the theatre has been always full; each night two pieces have been redemanded, and all the others vigorously applauded.

We hope, dearest Father, to receive favourable news concerning your health. I do not yet despair of receiving the Miserere which you promised, as well as the music for sixteen parts. M. Joseph Prinsechi will not fail to settle what is required for the copy, and I shall take care, as soon as I am returned home, that is to say, about Easter, to send you whatever may prove agreeable. My son kisses your hands, and I am with respect and esteem, Your devoted servant,

LEOPOLD MOZART.

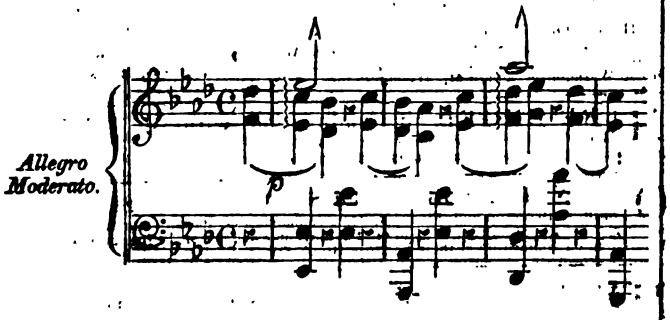
Reviews.

Night Watchers, written by J. F. Waller, composed by Joseph Robinson; Eventide, ditto, ditto; Lady Mary, written by the Rev. Henry Alford (Dean of Canterbury), composed by Joseph Robinson. (Cramer, Beale, and Chappell.)

These are all good songs, well written, melodious and expressive—model ballads, in short, worthy the pen of the able musician whose name they bear. Mr. Robinson has a feeling for rich harmony and modulation, which is most happily displayed in his accompaniment. We wish accompaniments to drawing-room songs were invariably composed with such correctness and refined taste; our task would be much more agreeable. Perhaps the best song of the three now before us is Eventide, which has a very graceful theme, is harmonised faultlessly, and contains a point of transition on the words "All the world from toil reposes," as beautiful as it is unanticipated. Spohr might have written pages 2 and 3 of Eventide.

Berceuse,—for the pianoforte—by Ernst Lubeck. (Cramer, Beale, and Chappell.)

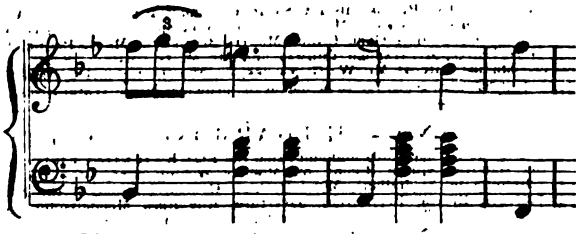
Every virtuoso of the first stamp brings over a Berceuse, or cradle-song, to rock John Bull to sleep, while he, the virtuoso, is skipping about the key-board of the instrument for his own especial satisfaction. Chopin produced one which had enormous success. Hence the mania. But unhappily the Berceuses which are not Chopin's are for the most part poor affairs, without invention and without taste. Herr Lubeck's is neither better nor worse than some dozen others we could name. That it has not much originality may be gathered from the theme, which sets out thus :—



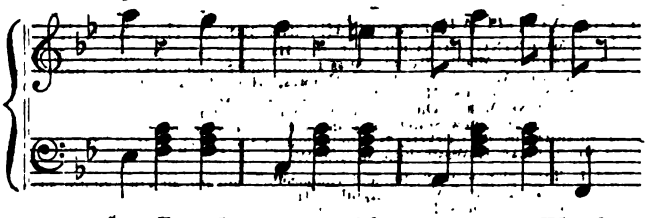
The theme is carried through the various stages of manipulation proper to Berceuses which are the creations of virtuosi of the first stamp. The accompaniment, at every repetition of the melody, (if melody it may be termed) gets more and more ornate, until before the end it is fairly smothered in passages of bravura. What Herr Lubeck has done in this way is ingenious enough; but the form is so utterly used up, that no one but a genius could possibly revive the interest it once excited; but, unfortunately for Herr Lubeck, and for his Berceuse, Herr Lubeck is not a genius.

The Boswell Waltzes, composed and arranged for the pianoforte, by R. T. Ross. (Robert Cocks and Co.)

The composer of these waltzes should look to his grammar. Such points as the subjoined :



and the subjoined :—

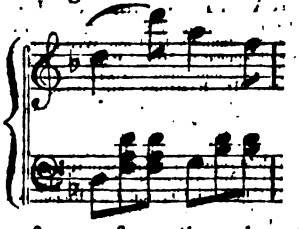


must not be allowed to pass without protest. The best number is No. 4; the tune of which bears a faint resemblance to "Polly, put the kettle on."

Under the Linden Tree. Serenade, words by T. P. Wooller, Esq.; music by Meyer Lutz. (Duncan, Davison, and Co.)

Herr Lutz, in endeavouring to avoid the common track, occasionally gets unpleasantly involved. Where is his authority for the following ?—

And for the following ?—



At the bottom of page four, there is a transition from D minor, through a feint at G flat major, to get back to the original line, F major, which sets out thus :—

and is in the last degree objectionable.

Merry Little Maud. Song, words by T. P. Wooller, Esq.; music by Meyer Lutz. (Duncan, Davison, and Co.)

Where does Herr Lütz find his authority for the following?—

and for the following?—

Flowers! lovely Flowers. Song, words by T. H. Horncastle; music by Charles McKorrell. (Duncan, Davison, and Co.)

A fresh and charming little ballad, with the acceptable peculiarity (it appears to merge into a peculiarity) of being written throughout with unexceptionable correctness.

The Meadow Gate, written by Beatrice Abercrombie; composed by George B. Allen. (Duncan, Davison, and Co.)

This ballad, if not quite so fresh, may be dismissed with much the same criticism as the foregoing.

I would I were a Butterfly. Poetry by Zelia; music by Adolphus Schlesser. (Duncan, Davison, and Co.)

A pretty sparkling song, with an accompaniment well in keeping with the subject.

Mary stood the Cross beside, composed by William Sudlow. (Addison and Hollier.)

A thoroughly good example of four-part harmony for voices, besides being impressive according to the character of the words. The four bars, pianissimo and unaccompanied, at the end of each section, are poetically conceived; and the whole composition, though unpretending, is thoroughly well wrought out.

MUSICAL DOINGS AT BRUSSELS.

Brussels, May 14th, 1860.

Sir,—At the conclusion of the musical season you have expressed a wish that I should furnish you with an epitome of the most remarkable circumstances that have occurred at Brussels. I can offer you only some very incomplete notes, for my labours, of which I have not enough for what I should like to do, will not allow me either to see or hear everything. This is no misfortune as far as my epitome is concerned, but it cannot fail to render me a very bad correspondent.

Musical matters are, generally, badly organised in our climates, because we have not money to do anything worth mentioning in a really artistic sense. I will, therefore, not speak further of this subject. The elements are certainly not wanting, but people neither have the knowledge nor the desire to employ them as they ought.

With regard to the theatres, they have had phases of good and of bad fortune. The Theatre Royal has not been able to reap any advantage from its grand opera company, although the latter contains some artists of merit, on account of the monotony of its repertory. This repertory, always the same, and given over and over again for a long series of years, can no longer possess any attraction for the public. It ought to be renewed; but it can only be renewed by works played with success in Paris, and you know how rare these are. With a floating population of some two or three hundred thousand strangers, the Opera in the Rue Lepelletier obtains paying houses with very moderate attraction; but at Brussels the receipts always depend on the same people, and, to make them come, it is necessary to have novelty.

The good fortune of our Theatre Royal during the dramatic year, has been founded on the performances of Le Pardon de Ploërmel, of the Dragons de Villars, and the pleasure taken by the public in Madlle. Boeland's singing. In Paris they did not see what could be made of this lady's talent, and did not bring her forward in important parts. She was compelled to sing in the Papillotes de M. Benoît, and other productions of a similar description, which, although I have not the slightest wish to depreciate their merit, are certainly not adapted for a brilliant vocalist. At Brussels, Madlle. Boulard has, as the saying goes, been quite the rage (fait fureur), and, without doubt, frequently assisted the popularity she enjoys. She has progressed in her success, as is the case with artists who really possess talent, but she has abused her strength, having sung at the theatre, or at concerts, five times a week. At present she is knocked up (fatiguée); she must take care what she is about.

We have got among us M. Merelli, from Milan, who has brought some good artists, and some but middling ones, who has established his company at the Cirque, a large dirty house, but well adapted for music; who found in the above theatre an execrable band, which used to play in some horrible productions occasionally given there. This band he put under his excellent conductor, M. Orsini, whose despair at finding himself at the head of such elements I can easily imagine. M. Orsini was under the necessity of summoning to his aid a few violinists of talent, who, fortunately, answered his call, but who cannot always successfully contend against the beings by whom they are surrounded. This, however, is nothing in comparison to the members of the chorus, who were selected in the most absurd manner. Despite of all these drawbacks, there have been some very good performances, thanks to the remarkable talent of some of the singers, and that southern dashing sense of ensemble always possessed by Italian artists. Don Pasquale, for instance, that charming work of Donizetti, has never been so well sung and played since the time of Lablache as by Madme Lorini, Mariani, M. Galvani, the agreeable tenor, M. David Squarcia, the excellent baritone, and M. Ciampi, a perfect buffo, with a powerful voice. The whole performance, worthy of the palmy days of the Italian stage, quite charmed me, and brought back to my recollection some of the periods most propitious to art.

* Addressed to the Editor of the Revue et Gazette Musicale.

As for concerts, we have had a deluge of them! You know what this is, and M. Botte still better than you. How much I frequently pity that young artist, who is such a good musician, and so judicious, so delicate a critic, endowed with such good taste, at having continually to attend them, and distribute a little bit of incense to each person so as to create no jealousy. As for myself, I am not so unfortunate; I do not go to hear anything of the kind. Only things really valuable, or which, as curiosities, present some kind of interest, can make me leave the farm, where, like a hare, I am always ruminating; "Car que faire dans un gîte, à moins que l'on ne songe?"

The concerts of M. Richard Wagner, a repetition of those he gave in Paris, caused a great sensation in Brussels. A thousand absurdities were circulated concerning them in the papers of the estaminets and taverns; as for myself, I shall say nothing about the matter, because I have already treated it seriously. This music is addressed to a future which would not be sorry to be changed into the present; I have the future to exhibit.

It is at the concerts of the Conservatory that grand music is usually to be found in all its splendour, because it is there rendered with a finish which is the result of conscientious study. This year has been marked by progress in certain things, in which the orchestra has approached as nearly as possible to perfection, the necessary dream in all arts—a happy dream, although never absolutely realised.

I do not restrict myself in the programmes of these concerts to purely classical works, I leave the door open to men of the present day, and there has not been a year during which I have not produced some unpublished overtures or symphonies. I have, it is true, a hard struggle with the exclusive admirers of consecrated names, but I stand firm, and do not allow myself to be influenced by their prejudices. At the third performance I gave a concert overture composed by M. Hartog, already known by a great many other works. He has taken his subject from the tragedy of Macbeth, where the grand genius of Shakspere has indulged in its boldest flights. M. Hartog's overture is energetic in its character, and well adapted to its subject. It is broadly developed in its system of unity, and the instrumentation is very intelligent. It is the work of an experienced composer, and shows that he possesses a firm hand in all or writing for the orchestra.

At the last concert I brought out an unpublished symphony by M. Meynne, one of the first pupils formed by me in composition at Brussels. It obtained a very legitimate success. Without aiming at gigantic proportions, M. Meynne rises to a character of grandeur in several parts of his work; the connection of ideas is natural, and we also meet with unexpected effects. The scherzo, the andante, and the finale, in particular, produced a marked impression on the audience and obtained the approbation of the artists. This début ought to encourage M. Meynne, whose only fault is that he has delayed it too long.

At this last concert I thought I would restore to the prodigious finale of the second act of Le Nozze di Figaro its true character, which had completely disappeared in the performances of this opera at the Théâtre Lyrique in Paris, for according to its custom, the Parisian public placed all the value of this colossal work in the singing, which, it is true, was very seductive in the singing, I repeat, of the three talented ladies to whom was entrusted the task of interpreting it. The traditions of this music are no longer possessed in France. With the orchestra of the Brussels Conservatory the effect was magnificent.

I do not know whether you will be contented with what your correspondent has sent you; however, there it is.

Yours, most truly,

PETIS SEN.

Reed Stops.*

The reed stops are the third great class of registers. We will not speak of those that are called free reeds, because their application is too exceptional, but of the stops with reeds which beat, of the reed stops which are altogether classical, and in general use; the bright sound of which has also a certain metallic roughness, because the tongue of metal vibrates with considerable violence, and at each vibration beats against a reed, which is also of metal.

This kind of register, the introduction of which has completely changed the former character of the organ, on account of the vigour of its sounds, and their great majesty as compared with other registers, is certain combinations and on some occasions, is used in church music, even when it is required to be most solemn and impressive. It embraces, in its scale all the degrees of tone, from the six-inch pipe to the thirty-two feet; and hence it gives the sound of all reed wind instruments, from the largest to the smallest. The six-inch reeds lay claim, moreover, to the high-sounding title, and it is not an unworthy ambition, of vox humana, while the sixteen-feet reeds represent the trombone and the bombarde; this last being an old reed instrument of the sixteenth century, though they represent it perhaps more in the name than in reality; and the thirty-two-feet reeds, which are commonly not more than twenty-four feet in fact, represent the contra-bombard, called by the Italians the bombardare, as they have made trombone out of tromba.

The grave inconvenience of reed stops, considered instrumentally, is that the treble notes overpower the basses. This arises from the fact that the depth of tone depends on the increase in the size of the tongue and reed. Hence the lower the sound descends towards the bass, the stronger does it of necessity become. The tongue, on the contrary, becomes smaller as it ascends higher into the treble notes; and therefore, also, the sounds produced by it become thinner or weaker, and out of all proportion with the fulness in volume of the sounds of the bass. This is also so much the case, that for the full effect of the higher sounds, reed stops by themselves are not enough, but require to be strengthened with some member of the flue-pipes. There are, indeed, some builders who, not being able to obtain sufficient power with their reed stops in the higher octaves, make use of flue-pipes for this purpose instead of reeds, and voice them as keen and clear as possible. More commonly, however, the organist, in order that the two or three last octaves of a reed stop may be heard distinctly, combines with it a very forcible mixture, called a cornet, which, when it is well managed, decreases in power in proportion as it approaches the bass, and therefore gives additional strength to the treble notes of the reed stop only. None of these plans, after all, are quite equal to the task of raising the reed stops to exactly the same position as the flue stops, because, when they are added, they make a complete change in the quality of the register, of which it is intended they should be only a continuance; in fact, they do nothing more than cause it to break off abruptly at a given place, and from that place put themselves instead of it.

The character, then, of reed stops is exactly the reverse of flue stops, since these last yield piercing sounds in their treble notes, and are, comparatively speaking, veiled in their sound in their basses. The consequence of this opposition makes itself especially felt in the song of the Church in both of these stops. In France, where the national character is lively and positive, the common way is to make use of the reed stops in accompanying the ecclesiastical chant; and as the trebles would naturally be covered by the vigour of the basses, it is these basses that are used to intone the melody of the Church,—namely, the plain chant. It would be easy to show to such persons as do not see it for themselves, that to make in this way a bass of a popular chant, is wholly at variance with the original intentions of the composers of this chant; for the voice of the people is not a bass voice. It could be easily shown also that the counterpoint, the best of its kind in this odd sort of music, in which the treble, used as the accompaniment, is made to take the place of the bass, and the bass that of the treble, is rather an offence against common sense than a counterpoint at all. It is in accordance with the rules of harmony to give the melody to the right hand and its accompaniment to the left; but then the reed stops must not be employed. The French fashion of making use of the reed stops on all occasions, even in the most simple form of recitative, that of the ecclesiastical chant, has caused this chant to become coarse, harsh, and insupportable; and the French organ has most commonly abjured all its more mellow tones for such as are hard and without expression. Our builders, as regards soft stops, have, to speak generally, remained stationary; while the German builders, on the contrary, have not ceased a moment from creating the most delicate varieties of sounds in all shades of tone in this kind of stop. But let us take courage: for some years past our most eminent builders, though they are but few, have set to work to imitate the delicacy of the Germans in these matters; and where the French begin by imitating, they generally end by surpassing.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

(From The Times.)

THE programme at the 28nd concert, which took place on Monday night at St. James's Hall, was, with the exception of Rossini's fifth quartet and an air from Salieri's Tarare, entirely new. It says much for these entertainments, and for the enterprise with which they are conducted, that although so many have been given within an interval of six months, crowded audiences are still found to attend them; it shows, moreover, that (as we have always maintained) a large public does exist in and about London for music of the highest class; while, on the other hand, it establishes the fact that the materials at disposal are pretty nigh inexhaustible. Out of fifteen pieces on the present occasion, only two had been heard before at the Monday Popular Concerts; and yet the selection was entirely made up from the vocal and instrumental compositions of Italian masters. Without over-estimating the truth, however, it may safely be concluded that 100 such programmes might easily be compiled from the same source. Boccherini—with one of whose quintets for stringed instruments (No. 5, Op. 20) the concert began, and one of whose sonatas for two violoncellos (played by Signor Piatti and Herr Schroeder) constituted an agreeable feature later in the evening—has left so many works of the kind that, probably, not more than a twentieth part of them are known to any but to those with whom it is a favourite occupation to trace the gradual progress of the art through all its multifarious phases up to the actual stage of its existence. The music of Boccherini—a protégé of the Spanish Court, which, during a great part of the 18th century, was addicted to patronising musicians—has a peculiar and almost indefinable charm. It may be likened to a young girl who, in sportive mood, has put on her grandmother's cap and appendages. The dress alone is antique; the ideas are as new and fresh as those of yesterday. Then to pass from the comparative infancy to the ripe maturity of art, in the quartets of Cherubini, the second of which, in D minor, formed an important item in the programme, we witness the greatest dramatic composer of Italy (save Rossini) striving near the latter end of his career, to emulate Beethoven, when, Beethoven's invention being on the wane, the favoured "tone-poet" expressed himself almost exclusively through the medium of his intellectual faculties. But as Beethoven, apart from his other gifts, was eminently the most intellectual of musicians, he succeeded in producing, towards the decline of his creative power, what Cherubini could never have produced even at the richest period of his artistic life. Nevertheless, that which Cherubini accomplished in his attempt to tread in the steps of so formidable a compeer—by whom he was esteemed at even more than his intrinsic worth, and whom Cherubini only learned thoroughly to appreciate when too late to profit by the slowly acquired experience—is full of genuine interest; and possibly the quartet in D minor—if less "effective," to employ the conventional term, than the one in E flat major, where the influence of Mendelssohn, another extraordinary and original genius, seems to go hand in hand with that of Beethoven—is the most remarkable effort the learned Italian has made to realise, for himself, as it were, a new world. There is, at the same time, a not less wide distinction between this and any of the later quartets of Beethoven than between Medea, the finest opera of Cherubini, and Fidelio, the only opera of his unequalled contemporary. Mendelssohn may be more or less successfully imitated; but to imitate Beethoven, no matter who may be the imitator, can only result, at the best, in partial failure. The Directors of the Monday Popular Concerts had already afforded their patrons an opportunity of appreciating Cherubini's quartet in E flat; and it can hardly have been forgotten that what pleased most universally in that ingenious and masterly work was the scherzo—where Beethoven and Mendelssohn appear to strive for predominance, and Mendelssohn to carry off the palm. This was decidedly more to the taste of the audience than the one in D minor, although the latter was in every sense perfectly executed by Herr Becker (one of the most finished and legitimate quartet-players now before the public), Herr Ries, Mr. Richard Blagrove, and that incomparable violoncellist, Signor Piatti. The remaining instrumental pieces were Clementi's spirited, genial, and melodious pianoforte sonata in C major (Op. 34), and three of the admirable "Lessons" of Domenico Scarlatti (another famous protégé of the Spanish Court), including the celebrated fugue in G minor. The theme of this fugue, according to the generally received tradition, was suggested to the musician by the incident of a cat walking over the keys of the harpsichord, and striking the intervals of which the first three bars are composed. Hence the popularly received denomination, "Cat's Fugue." Both Clementi ("father of the pianoforte") and Scarlatti (its grandfather?) appeared to entertain their audience, who applauded both with enthusiasm, and recalled the pianist (Miss Arabella Goddard) at the termination of the "Lessons."

The vocal music—in every instance well given, the singers being Mademoiselle Parepa, Madame Laura Baxter, Mr. Tennant, and Mr. Santley—furnished characteristic specimens from the operas of Paesiello, who, the first to set the Barbiere di Siviglia, having usurped the throne of Piccini, yielded in turn to Rossini; Jomelli, predecessor of Piccini, and the most learned Italian composer of his day, who taught Germany melody and Italy harmony; Salvator Rosa, who, though a great painter, like Leonardo da Vinci, was also (like Leonardo) a more than average musician; Paer, author of countless works for the theatre, who first set the book which Beethoven afterwards immortalised as Fidelio, was Rossini's predecessor as director of the Paris Italian Opera, and Cherubini's as principal of the Conservatoire; Piccini himself, the rival of Gluck, and about whom the unenvious Jomelli, that other and still more gifted musical illustrator of Beaumarchais, seeing his own vogue on the point of being eclipsed, said aloud to his compatriots, after a performance of La Buona Figliuola, "Ascoltate la sentenza d'Jomelli—questo è inventore," ("Hear the judgment of Jomelli—this is an inventor"); Salieri, the jealous opponent—though certainly not the poisoner (even M. Oulibischeff rejects that slander)—of Mozart, and composer of an opera which those mighty connoisseurs, the Parisians, for a long time imagined to be Gluck's (Les Danaïdes); and Biangini, whose genial melodies alone should have preserved his dramatic works from oblivion. With all of these—we cannot afford space to single out any one of them for special notice—the audience were enchanted, and no concert of vocal and instrumental music in our experience was ever more heartily enjoyed. Mr. Benedict being engaged at Her Majesty's Theatre, Herr Ganz took his place as accompanist at the pianoforte. To act as substitute for Mr. Benedict in this responsible position is about as difficult as to replace Grisi in Norma, Alboni in Arsace, Mario in Almaviva, Ronconi in Figaro, Tamburini in Don Giovanni, or the late Lablache in Don Pasquale. Nevertheless Herr Ganz laboured zealously to sustain his own credit and that of the Monday Popular Concerts.

Concerts.

HERR MOLIQUE'S CONCERT.—The annual concert of Herr Molique, the eminent composer and violinist, took place at the Hanover Square Rooms before a crowded and fashionable audience. The programme contained too few of the concert-giver's own masterly and beautiful compositions, a selection from which might very properly have been given on such an occasion. In compensation, however, several works by other great writers were introduced; for instance, Mendelssohn's pianoforte trio in C minor, and Beethoven's Sonata in G major (Op. 96) for piano and violin; and these were very finely performed, the executants being Herr Molique, Signor Piatti, and Madlle. Anna Molique, whose playing, distinguished by unerring mechanism and a thorough appreciation of the author's meaning, left nothing to be desired. To say that Madlle. Anna Molique, who is still very young, proved herself a worthy associate of such artists as her father and Signor Piatti, two of the most accomplished performers of the day on their respective instruments, is giving her high praise, though not more than she deserves. The powers of Madlle. Anna Molique were further exhibited to advantage in "an original melody for the pianoforte" by Herr Pacher, which she gave with the utmost delicacy and grace. Herr Molique's ability as a virtuoso was severely tested in an unaccompanied solo by M. Leon de St. Lubin—a piece of prodigious difficulty, entirely beyond the means of any but the greatest violinists, and only possible to them in their happiest moments. Herr Molique, however, attacked it with heroic resolution and all the steady confidence of a practised master, and the result was a triumph of executive art such as is very rarely heard. We should, nevertheless, have preferred listening to Sebastian Bach's chaconne in D minor (which Herr Molique plays so magnificently), or some other solo piece more suited to his classic genius. Another extraordinary display was that of Signor Piatti in two morceaux de salon, composed by himself. The vocalists were Madame Catherine Hayes, Mr. Santley, and M. Depret. Madame Hayes distinguished herself honourably in Herr Molique's graceful and musicianly song, "The Gondolier," which was enthusiastically applauded. M. Depret was most successful in a new song by Signor Biletta; while the fine voice and admirable talent of Mr. Santley were most advantageously exhibited in a grand aria from Mozart's Idomeneo. The concert ended with some of Herr Molique's beautiful Melodies for the Violin, played to perfection by the composer. Messrs. Benedict and Cusins were the conductors.

FLORAL HALL.—The first of the series of "Four Grand Concerts," announced to be given in Floral Hall, came off on Wednesday, and attracted a numerous if not a crowded attendance. Our readers have had already a full account of the architectural proportions and other properties of the new concert room, built by the director of the Royal Italian Opera. We have only to add that the building seems admirably adapted for the purposes of hearing, the most piano notes from the instruments and voices being distinctly audible in every part of the Hall. Floral Hall is a miniature Crystal Palace in appearance, and, as we learn from the advertisements, is intended to be converted to as multifarious purposes as the people's great show-house at Sydenham. In addition to musical entertainments, it may be used for the less artistic purposes of flower shows, balls, dinners, suppers, lectures, and meetings agricultural, political, social, and religious. Where Grisi and Mario are heard one day warbling their tenderest melodies, Messrs. Cobden and Bright, on the following, may be hurling the thunders of their eloquence against aristocrats and soldiers, and on the next, the Rev. Aminadab Sleek may be denouncing all those who deny his call to be the universal shepherd; or Giles Stabbles, the Bedfordshire yeoman, in doubtful county vernacular, may uphold the sacred immunities of Conservatism, and the necessity of high-priced quarterns. Wine vaults, too, it is said, are built under the flooring, of such capaciousness as to threaten the monopoly of the London Docks; and the wine-tasting gentry of the metropolis—a large class—are in ecstacies at the prospect presented them of bringing their favourite pursuit so close at hand.

The concert on Wednesday was in every respect identical in plan with the Italian Opera Concerts at the Crystal Palace, which for the last few years, during the season, constituted so attractive a feature, and which this year have been provided by the company of Her Majesty's Theatre. The band performed the overtures to Der Freischutz and Zampa, both splendidly, as may be supposed; the chorus sang the introduction to Guillaume Tell, assisted in the quartét by Madlle. Corbari, Madame Nantier-Didiée, Signor Gardoni, Signor Polonini, and M. Faure; Mr. John Barnett's madrigal, "Merrily wake music's measures"; and the prayer, "Nume del ciel," from Masaniello. Signor Mario was encored in the serenade, "Com' e gentil," from Don Pasquale; and Mesdames Grisi and Nantier-Didiée obtained the same compliment in "Giorno d' orrore," from the duet, "Ebben, a te ferrisci" (Semiramide). Madame Grisi sang "Qui la voce," from I Puritani, with great applause; Madame Miolan-Carvalho gave the "Carnavale di Venezia," and joined Signor Gardoni and M. Faure in the trio, "Tintinnar," from Dinorah; Madame Csillag introduced the bolero, "Mercie, jeunes amies," from Les Vêpres Siciliennes, besides contributing to the grand trio from Fidelio, "Corraggio"; Madlle. Corbari gave Cherubini's air from the Nozze di Figaro, "Voi che sapete," and took part in the quartet, "Padre nostro," from Dinorah, with Madame Nantier-Didiée, Signors Neri-Baraldi and Tagliafico; Signor Graziani sang the romanza (Ronconi's romanza), "Ah! non avea più lagrime"; Madame Nantier-Didiée undertook "Ah! mon fils," from the Prophète; Signors Neri-Baraldi and Graziani joined in Rossini's duet, "I Marinari"; and Signor Gardoni, Signor Ronconi, and M. Faure contributed the comic trio, "Pappataci," from the Italiana in Algeri. Madame Penco was set down for two pieces, but did not appear; nor was any apology offered for her absence—a somewhat questionable omission in the case of so eminent an artist.

HERR CHARLES OBERTHUR'S morning concert came off on Saturday at Willis's Rooms, in presence of a large and fashionable assembly. The vocalists were Miss Lindo, Miss Eleonora Wilkinson, Madlle. Behrens, Herr Mengis, and Herr A. Muller; the instrumentalists, Miss Arabella Goddard, Miss L. Viola Trust, Mr. Trust and Herr Oberthur (harp), Signor Giulio Regondi (concertina), Herr Lidel (violoncello), and M. A. Daussoigne Méhul (harmonium). Herr Oberthur's share of the programme comprised, duo brillant on the Trovatore, for piano and harp, with Miss Arabella Goddard; his own nocturne for three harps; a new and original trio for violin, violoncello, and harp; new fantasia on Dinorah; and Parish Alvars' concerto in E flat, with orchestral accompaniments. The trio for violin, violoncello, and harp is a work of undeniable merit, exhibiting a real melodic invention, and considerable skill in the treatment. The execution by Herr Ries, Herr Lidel, and Herr Oberthur was irreproachable from first to last; Herr Oberthur, we need hardly say, being one of the most accomplished harpists now before the public. In the solo on airs from Dinorah, Herr Oberthur displayed, in a special manner, his powers as a fantasia player. He has a thorough command of the instrument, and a tone at once powerful and musical. The duo brillant, for piano and harp, however, created the greatest sensation of the concert. This is a really brilliant piece; and the familiar airs from the Trovatore, felicitously introduced and skilfully employed, have a charming effect. Miss Arabella Goddard and Herr Oberthur executed the duo to perfection, and elicited plaudits from the whole room. The vocal music was good, but too plentiful. Miss Lindo sang two airs of remarkable merit by Herr Oberthur,—"O du mein Mond in stiller Nacht," and "Say, dost thou look at silent even,"—with admirable taste and expression; displaying a voice, too, well cultivated and of excellent quality. In his own composition, called "The Soldier's Song," and Herr Oberthur's charming air, "See the mariner returning," Herr A. Müller (from Glasgow) exhibited both a good voice and an artistic style. The other singers were Madlle. Eloiza Behrens, Miss Eleonora Wilkinson, and Herr Menghis, who each gave an air, and at the end joined Miss Lindo and Herr Muller in the prayer from Rossini's Mosè in Egitto. Two other instrumental displays elicited the utmost attention and applause; the first a duet by Behrer, on a Polish air, admirably played by Signor Regondi and Herr Lidel; the other, M. Benedict's very ingenious and popular "transcription" of "Where the bee sucks;" a specimen of execution, on the part of Miss Arabella Goddard, as brilliant and dazzling as it was graceful and faultless in expression. We have unintentionally omitted to mention Herr Oberthur's extremely clever notturno, for three harps, which was irreproachably rendered by the composer, in association with Mr. Trust and the young and promising Miss Viola Trust. Messrs. Aguilar, Canz, and A. Ries (all good musicians) were the accompanists; and the whole concert gave satisfaction. Her Grace the Duchess of Wellington was among the audience.

MRS. JOHN MACFARREN gave her annual Matinée of Pianoforte Music on Saturday, at the Hanover Square Rooms, and, as usual, her strong and commendable predilection for the classic school was manifest in the programme. Such pieces as Dussek's Sonata, in B flat, for pianoforte and violin; Beethoven's Sonata, in D minor (Op. 31, No. 2); Mendelssohn's Tema Con bariazioni, in D, for pianoforte and violoncello; and Moscheles' Grand Duo, "Homnage à Handel," for two pianofortes, would of themselves have made a first-rate entertainment, if concert-goers were only content with a little and good. In all these pieces Mrs. John Macfarren exhibited remarkable powers of execution and unerring taste. The Solo Sonata of Beethoven was given in a truly effective manner; while the Sonata of Dussek, in which Mrs. Macfarren was assisted by M. Sainton, and Mendelssohn's "Tema," with Signor Piatti at the violoncello, both displayed the execution and feeling of the pianists to special advantage. In Moscheles' Duo, which was given to admiration, Miss Arabella Goddard was the other pianist, and the performance of the two ladies was received with irrepressible delight. In addition, Mrs. Macfarren played several minor pieces, of which Mariana, by Mr. Walter Macfarren, appeared to please most. Signor Piatti and M. Sainton both executed solos of their own composition. The singers were Miss Palmer, Miss Fanny Rowland, and Mr. Santley, Miss Palmer contributed two Canzoni Toscani, by Gordigiani, charming vocal bagatelles, sung with genuine sentiment; Miss Fanny Rowland sang "The beating of my own heart," with peculiar grace. Mr. Santley gave "Tutto è disposto," from Figaro, and Mr. Wallace's "Bell-ringer," in his most effective manner. Mr. Walter Macfarren was the accompanist.

MASTER HORTON ALLISON, pupil of Mr. W. H. Holmes, gave his second pianoforte performance on Tuesday evening at Willis's Rooms. He played Hummel's Sonata in E flat (dedicated to Haydn), F. Hiller's Huit Mesures bariées, of Cipriani Potter's "Pezzi di Bravura," Herz Otello Fantasia, Professor Bennett's Rondo Piacevole, J. Field's Nocturne in E flat, and Mr. W. Holmes's Fantasia, Fairy Fingers. This young gentleman is making rapid and striking progress. His best performances were Mr. Potter's Bravura (encored), the Otello Fantasia, and the "Fairy Fingers," of Mr. Holmes. The first two were played without book—no ordinary feat for a boy of twelve. Mr. Holmes's charming fantasia was perhaps best of all. It certainly pleased most. Master Allison has undoubtedly a "future" in store. Vocal select were contributed by Miss Marian Moss, Miss Therese Jeffery, and Mr. Wallworth. Miss Jefferys sang the beautiful air, "Canst thou deem thy heart is changing?" from Mr. Macfarren's King Charles the Second, most admirably. Miss Marian Moss gave the romanza "Va, ti-elle," from Robert le Diable, and Spohr's "Rose softly blooming," both extremely well. Spohr's air, on the whole, was perhaps the best delivered. Mr. Wallworth sang Madamina from Don Giovanni, and the ballad "I never can forget," from Mr. Alfred Mellon's Victorine. Mr. Basin Chatterton executed a fantasia of his own composition on the harp, and was admirably accompanied on the piano by Mr. W. H. Holmes.

ERRATA.—The third paragraph in the second leader of our last week's number should stand thus:—

"However that may be, nothing can be clearer than that in representing the story of Don Juan (de Tenorio) it is essential that the statue of the Commandant should be backed (a supper, that he should accept the invitation, and that he should ultimately take his irreverent host away to sup with him in the midst of blue fire. Talk of omitting the part of Hamlet in a representation of Hamlet? That would be as nothing compared with the omission of the statue of the Commandant from a performance of Don Juan. Mr. Buckstone, of facetious notoriety, tells a story of an American theologian and preacher who founded a religion which hopelessly and ignominiously failed because he attempted to carry it on without the assistance of an evil spirit. Well, Don Giovanni, last Thursday, at Her Majesty's Theatre, was like the religion of the poor insane American divine mentioned by Mr. Buckstone, except in this respect, that the opera did not fail—not in a musical sense at least. But the legend was utterly spoiled, the moral entirely lost, from the simple fact that the statue of the Commandant came, saw, actually shook hands with "Don Juan," and then went away without him! It is absurd to see "Don Juan" carried off by a host of imps; it is absurd to see the last scene terminated (as on Tuesday night, at Her Majesty's Theatre) by a display of fireworks; but most absurd of all is it to see "Don Juan" left quietly to himself after the ghostly Commandant has had a few minutes' conversation with him."

The substitution of "with" for "without," in the 11th and 17th lines, entirely subverted the meaning of the writer.

LONDON: SATURDAY, JUNE 2, 1860.

THE Lower Rhenish Music-Festival (the 37th anniversary) has passed off amid its accustomed perfume and unobtrusive enjoyment. They always select the "merrie monthe of Maye," "ces bons Allemands," as their (and our) encroaching (and "lively") neighbours call them; and this time, as from time out of mind, the 27th, 28th and 29th revolutions of the earth on its axis, during the 354th circular voyage of the satellite Luna—

"Wandering companionless
Among the stars that have a different birth," were devoted to the glad event. Dusseldorf, the garden-city of the "river of Rhene" (or Rhine), was the favoured locality, Köln (or Cologne), the City of the Magi having been thus distinguished the year before, and Aachen (or Aix la Chapelle), the City of Carlo Magnus (or Charlemagne), the year before that.

These triennial music fêtes, on (or near) the edge of the stream with which the satiric poet (or poetic satirist) Heinrich Heine, communed and sympathised, in some degree resemble our own triennial gatherings in the Cathedral towns; only that while the cider-drinking people give charity a voice in their rejoicings, the Hock-quaffing

Rhenish burghers make them a mere bond of harmonious brotherhood among the triple populations. The Düsseldorf meeting derives additional interest from the fact that Mendelssohn at one period chose Düsseldorf as his head-quarters, and that at Düsseldorf, in the same month of May (1836), he first brought out his immortal Paulus. There is no Mendelssohn now to direct the performances, and consecrate the festival by the presence and example of genius; but in place of Mendelssohn, there is Mendelssohn's fellow-student and intimate friend, Hiller—Kapellmeister Ferdinand Hiller, of Cologne, whom—for some reason only known to his amiably whimsical self—Mendelssohn would, at the Paulus-fete, invariably salute as "Hiller's Studies." "Here comes Hiller's Studies," he would say to some English friends, on spying out his old "chum," while a smile would light up that countenance which was rather the countenance of an angel than of a man, and show the bright side of the angelic nature at its brightest. Ferdinand Hiller, Principal of the Conservatory at Cologne, is also an admirable musician, as all musical Europe knows; and a capital fellow, as is best known to his friends. Since Mendelssohn deserted the Rhine, to walk in the shadow of John Sebastian Bach, at Leipsic, the city of the Thomas-Schule, no such popular chief has been known to Düsseldorf, Cologne, or Aix, as Hiller.

On the whole, to judge by our correspondence, the 37th Niederrheinisches Musik-Fest was not one of the most brilliant on record. Düsseldorf looked as gay and animated as of yore, it is true; and the morning rehearsal in the Ton Halle as busy and exciting. The programme, however, does not appear to have afforded unanimous approval. At the first performance concert (Sunday), which began at 6 p.m. (what would our late dinner "fashionables" have said to that?) the selection comprised Robert Schumann's orchestral symphony in B flat, and Handel's oratorio of Samson—Samson according to Mosel, one of the meddlers who have re-adjusted the giant's proportions. Of Schumann's work, a correspondent writes:—

"With regard to Schumann's symphony much cannot be said, for a more chaotic composition I should think (yet never) heard; and had it not been performed by a remarkably fine orchestra, nobody would have sat it out."

This opinion, however, must be accepted with great reserve, inasmuch as further on, the same correspondent, who adopts the pseudonyme of "Philomousos," shows himself a not very competent authority. Take the following as an example:—

"Music is certainly in a state of anarchy in Germany at the present day owing to the endeavours of the Zukunfts party (that which the present will not acknowledge, and the future will not believe to have existed), who state that they are to be the great reformers of music, the chief members being Franz Liszt, R. Wagner, Schumann (before his death), and the French composers Berlioz, Gounod, not forgetting Litolff, and the Belgian, Gewaerts."

"Philomousos" speaks only by rote. At any rate, his light is at best a rushlight, for it has not helped him to the knowledge of some very important ("patent"?) facts; among the rest, that M. Hector Berlioz has indignantly protested against his name being associated with the Zukunfts party, and that Mr. Henry Litolff broke his stick at Weimar (not over the head of Father Liszt, but as a symbol of his rupture with the anarchists). Then, to rank such helpless innocents as formed the Gaul, and Gewaerts the Walloon, among this formidable tribe of savages! The composer of music to Le médecin malgré lui, and the composer of music to a book on Quentin Durward, illustrating the "Art Work of the Future," is too comical. On the contrary, they much more properly belong to the past. Herr Wagner would scout them.

Of the execution of Handel's Samson, our Correspondent writes (allowing for some necessary abbreviations), as follows:—

"All the choruses were magnificently executed; but unfortunately this was not the case with the solos. The Germans go upon the economical system: thus the solos were not in the hands of first-rate artists. It is a case of "Mes petits yeux sont passés" with Madame Jenny Bürde-Ney, her singing now being little better than screaming. Fräulein Schrock (alto) sings carefully, and has some very good notes. The tenor, Herr Schnorr, must have been suffering from a cold, for he literally snorted through his part. If he be the most magnificent tenor singer in Germany, had must be the best, Herr Stockhausen, the bass, is an artist to whom one can listen with pleasure. But the Düsseldorf fanatics attach too much importance to the abilities of all these singers. Mr. Hiller has made additions to the instrumentation of some of the airs in Samson; and no less than five were introduced, restored, that have always hitherto been omitted. Bearbeitung and Verbesserung! There is no organ in the Düsseldorf Music Hall, nor is it customary in Germany to give Handel's choruses with organ accompaniment. If people wish to hear Handel's compositions thoroughly well performed, they must go to England."

On Monday, when the concert began at the same hour, the subjoined was the programme:—

1. Overture, "Wasserträger;" Cherubini.
2. Ver Sacrum, oder die Hilfdung [illegible] J. J. Hiller.
3. Selection from "Iphigenia in Tauris," Gluck.
4. Symphony in A major (No. 7), Beethoven.

The overture of Cherubini was admirably played. Indeed, the orchestra at this festival if the ear of "Philomousos" may be accredited with sharpness, carried all before it. Read the subjoined, in reference to Beethoven's symphony:—

"No words can sufficiently express the praise due to all the members of the orchestra for their attention to nuances. The crescendi and diminuendi were perfect."

Gluck seems not to have fared so well, however:—

"The selection from Iphigenia in Tauris was but a poor affair. The whole went astray, as did also Hiller's composition," &c.

What follows is a tirade of the most abusive character, directed not only against Hiller's Gründung Roms, but against Hiller himself; not only against the literary share which Herr Bischoff (of the Kölner Zeitung and Niederrheinisches Musik-Zeitung) had in the Cantata, but against Herr Bischoff himself. Hiller is accused of every conceivable artistic sin, while Herr Bischoff is thus dismissed: "The text is rubbish, although the idea is fine." We must be excused from printing any part of this criticism, and are too glad to pass on to the third and last performance, which took place on Tuesday, at the same hour of 6 p.m. Mendelssohn's overture to Fingal's Cave was as finely played as the other instrumental pieces; and Madlle. Schreck (the contralto) very successful in an air from Bach's Passion Musik (violin accompaniment by Joachim). The other vocal pieces were a trio from Fidelio, an air from Bouelldieu's Fête du Village Voisin (Herr Stockhausen); the hackneied scena from Der Freischutz (Madame Ney-Bürde); a tenor air from Euryanthe (Herr Schnorr); Lieder, by Schumann, Hiller, and Schubert (Herr Stockhausen); Venzano's Valse (Madame Ney-Bürde); and the concluding chorus from Samson. There were two overtures, Spontini's Olympie, and a concert-overture by Herr Tausch of Düsseldorf; Beethoven's pianoforte concerto in E flat, played by Herr Tausch, and a couple of violin solos, by Joachim, viz., his own, on Hungarian melodies, and one of Beethoven's Romances (which of the two our correspondent does not state).

About this concert we subjoin the remarks of "Philomousos," abridged as expedience may have suggested:

"Joachim's violin solo was beautifully executed: Mozart's 'Ave verum' could not have been better given, whether by orchestra or chorus. In fact, the weak points throughout the whole festival were owing to the mediocrity of the solo singers. Herr Tausch's concert overture was a childish affair; the composer, who directed its performance as a conductor, more childish still, and yet he holds the appointment of Stadt Musik-Director in Düsseldorf. Herr Tausch is a pupil of F. Schneider, brother to the man who tortured the people in 1852 with an interminable organ fugue at Exeter Hall. The concerto of Beethoven was nicely executed by Herr Tausch, and well interpreted. The even manner in which he gave the rapid passages deserves praise; but as a pianist, he can't play, and never will be able to play, like Miss Arabella Goddard or young Mr. Barnett.

"Beethoven's Romanza was divinely executed by Joachim, whose pure style must always be admired. Indeed, it is impossible to overpraise Joachim in this admirable performance, which so affected the audience that many of them were in tears! Madame Jenny Ney-Bürde, to a certain extent, vindicated her reputation in Weber's Scena.

In defence of the "Bearbeitung" (adaptation) and "Verbesserung" (amelioration) of Handel's Samson, which has been commented upon in a hostile spirit, let one of Herr Hiller's advocates in the Kolnische Zeitung speak:

"It is by no means the intention of Herr Hiller to bring Samson before the public in its complete and unabridged form, since neither the work nor the audience would benefit thereby. Mosel, in the arrangement through which the oratorio has acquired universal favour, has cut in freely with a very powerful knife, and in performing this operation has evidently gone too deeply into the flesh. But in spite of all that Handel fanatics say about the injustice done to this work, which should have been handed over to the world unmutilated, the adaptation is preferable to the original score. The latter, besides recitatives, contains sixteen airs and one duet more than have been heretofore published. Among these Herr Hiller has selected those which he considered the best suited to give prominence to the chief supporters of the action—Samson and Delila. He has fitted these pieces to a German text, and made necessary additions to the instrumentation, and it is not to be doubted that the work has been thereby enriched."

So deep is the feeling of spite evinced by "Philomousos" against Hiller, that he even allows himself to be led into a non sequitur:

"Portraits of Hiller are being sold in all the booksellers' shops, as if he were Beethoven returned to the world again—which accounts for the vanity of the man."

The worthy Kapellmeister of Cologne may console himself with the lapsus involuntarily committed by his detractor. The artistic stature of Ferdinand Hiller is not diminished one hair's breadth by such inconsiderate attacks. May his shadow be never the less—and "Hiller's Studies" the name by which he is remembered when the trenchant shears of the Parca cut the thread of his existence. He who was the friend of Mendelssohn, and is the friend of Rossini, may laugh at an obscure Philomousos.

IT is the proud privilege of the noble and wealthy, who have abundance of leisure and means at their disposal, to promote and encourage the elegant arts of peace—the great civilisers of the community. But the highest and the noblest encouragement is not what depends upon giving expensive commissions, or purchasing at auctions extravagant pieces, choice and rare productions, to be afterwards hid away in a private gallery. It is that which recognises the generous improving influence of art upon human intelligence and feeling, and promoting the application of such influence, by opening the storehouses of art to the world, and welcoming all comers upon the grand neutral territory of intellectual enjoyment, with a friendly greeting. Nobly was this feeling recognised and carried out, but only temporarily, in the formation of the Great Art Treasures Exhibition at Manchester in 1857, when the owners of priceless gems of art, from the Queen downwards, generously contributed from their store to found a spring for common enjoyment. And well and ably, though upon a smaller scale, with a more permanent aim and influence, is the noble President of the Society for the Encouragement of the Fine Arts lending his aid in the same field, by the active support given by him in carrying out the useful objects of that new institution.

The paper read by Mr. Henry Ottley, Honorary Secretary of the Society, on the Italian and Dutch Schools of Painting, was one of the highest interest. Mr. Ottley commenced by observing "that they were assembled together, through the kindness of their president, within the splendid walls of the gallery of that noble patron of art. It suggested reflections as to the character of such collections, the genius of the masters represented in them, and their influence upon art. It had been the fashion with the free-thinking critics of modern times to discourage the old masters, and to insist upon the superior merits of those of the living age. Without attempting to detract from the undoubted merits of art of the age and country, he would suggest that there had been, and were, continuous interests in common between the arts of all periods; and the influence of the past upon the present, as of the present upon the future, might be considered as direct and salutary in its operations. He then went on to show that his position was supported when they came to consider how little they had of old art amongst them, and how little they knew of old art fifty years ago, when these collections were first commenced, and the vast strides which English art had made since their influence was brought to bear upon it. It was essential to the right appreciation of art to consider them in their respective schools, and in their bearing respectively to one another. It was not enough to admire a pretty picture for the mere interest of its effect, or the attraction of colour and treatment which it produced. He then referred to the various schools of Italy, giving a brief summary of their salient points, and ably demonstrating in what they respectively excelled, at the same time directing the attention of his hearers to the works represented on the walls of the gallery. He afterwards passed to the Dutch school, and gave a most comprehensive view of its peculiarities, insisting upon their claims to respectful attention at the hands of all who studied art in a catholic spirit. There was a class of art critics who, nevertheless, had very strong predilections of their own, who could not see anything good beyond the immediate and restrictive circle of their choice. A very popular and voluminous living writer condemned en masse the productions of the Dutch school as coarse, vulgar, and irreligious; and went the length of saying that the best patronage any monarch could confer upon art would be to collect the whole body into one gallery, and then burn them (a laugh). This, however, was only an illustration of the length to which prejudice would carry even the wisest amongst us; but he trusted there was some hope that the writer alluded to might one day change his opinion (hear) upon the matter, as he had not unfrequently done upon others, and that he would take a wider and more comprehensive view hereafter of the purposes of art."

The discourse, which was listened to with the greatest attention throughout, gave a tone of more than ordinary earnestness to the proceedings of the evening, and served, by contrast, to enhance the attraction of the musical entertainment which followed. This fellowship of the arts, in which music, painting, and sculpture emulate each other in friendly rivalry, is a noble thought, for which the world has to thank Mr. Henry Ottley. That after such communion a parting should take place would be cause for deep regret. We believe, however, that the good seed has been well sown, and that an abundant and full harvest may be anticipated.

We understand that Madame Oury's matinée will this year take place, by the permission of Mrs. Jefferys, at that lady's residence, 16 Eaton Place; when the bénéficiaire will be assisted by some of the most eminent artistes at present in London, including Miss Louisa and Miss Susan Pyne, Madlle. Parepa, Mons. Depret, Mons. Lefort, Madlle. Sophie Humber, &c. &c.

M. LEOPOLD DE MEYER.—The admirers of this accomplished virtuoso will have an opportunity of hearing him in some of his most recent compositions at the approaching concert of the Royal Society of Female Musicians, and at the always agreeable matinée of Mdme. Anichini, which is to be held (as usual of late years), by permission of Mr. Wolley, at Campden House, Kensington.

ANTON RUBINSTEIN.—We are happy to be able to inform our readers that the report of this gentleman's death is unfounded. Herr Rubinstein is at Baden, composing an opera for the Vienna Kürnthner Thor. It is to be hoped that this new work may restore the fallen fortunes of that theatre.

ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST.—(Extract from a private letter.)—"I suppose you know that the oratorio, St. John the Baptist, by Herr Hager, of Vienna, brought out by Mr. Hullah at St. Martin's Hall, is composed by Herr Von Hasslinger (not Haslinger), a good violin player, but a poor composer, who has got the mania into his noddle, and can't get rid of it. Hager is only an assumed name."

CANTERBURY HALL.—A very beautiful English model harmonium, by Evans—with double row of keys—has just been added to this establishment.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

Semiramide was repeated on Saturday, when the theatre was more crowded than even at the first performance. The audience, too, were more enthusiastic. The overture was encored and repeated, an acknowledgment that the execution was far better than on the Tuesday, when it passed with scarcely a hand of applause. Mdlle. Titiens in Semiramide showed a decided improvement on her first performance, and, we have no doubt, will still farther perfect what, in many respects, is already so splendid. Mdme. Alboni's Arsace being faultless, offers no point for reconsideration. She has here (as in other instances), to use the learned diction of a morning contemporary, "achieved the nimbus." Her performance is neither more nor less than incomparable. The Assur of Signor Everardi is excellent, and will ripen into something even better by the aid of experience. Indeed, the whole performance of Rossini's gorgeous work was a manifest advance on the first, and the gratification of the audience was augmented in proportion.

In the ballet of Scintilla the delight caused by Mdlle. Pocchini's dancing was clouded by regret that her last performance should be so near at hand. Mr. E. T. Smith, who had already once renewed her engagement, should have retained Mdlle. Pocchini to the end of the season at any sacrifice. She is an immense favourite both with subscribers and the public; and has succeeded in reviving the prestige of the ballet.

On Monday, an extra night, Don Giovanni was repeated with more than one change in the cast. M. Gassier (his first appearance at Her Majesty's Theatre) played Don Giovanni, and Signor Everardi, Leporello. M. Gassier sings the music admirably; but that is all. Signor Everardi earned golden opinions in Leporello, giving the music with invariable correctness and in the true Mozartean spirit, and acting with vigour and discretion. "Mea anima" was thoroughly well sung; better, indeed, than by any one since Lablache. Rarely has an artist achieved even a moderate success alternately in two such important characters of Don Giovanni and Leporello. Signor Sebastiano Ronconi replaced Signor Mercuriali in Masetto, and not only sang better than his predecessor, but was, in a dramatic sense, far more to the purpose. The other characters were as before; and the only remark we have to make is, that Mdme. Borghi-Mamo sang both the airs of Zerlina as charmingly as on a previous occasion, and without a single ornament or change. Her performance, in short, was irreproachable.

On Tuesday Il Trovatore was given, with Scintilla.

On Thursday Semiramide was performed for the third time, followed by Scintilla, when Mdlle. Pocchini made her last appearance.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

THAT La Gazza Ladra would be better this season than last was fully anticipated when the prospectus appeared. Madame Penco, no one doubted, would be a more satisfactory Ninetta than Mdlle. Lotti, and M. Faure, with equal confidence, was expected to surpass Signor Debassini in Fernando. Neither expectation was destined to be baulked. Both Madame Penco and M. Faure were eminently successful; and we may state at once that a more admirable performance of Rossini's opera has not been heard in London for years than that of Saturday, when La Gazza Ladra was represented for the first time. The Ninetta of Madame Penco is perhaps her most elaborately finished impersonation. Except by Madame Grisi, we never saw the part acted with such genuine feeling and intelligence; while Madame Penco's execution of the music, always satisfactory, at times reached the highest excellence. The aria d' intrata, "Di piacer mi balza il cor," was perhaps the least effective part of her performance, judged from a mechanical point of view; but even here the expression was charming and the manner irresistible. That Madame Penco had studied the character with the utmost care was apparent in every scene, but no mere labour could have realised so perfect an achievement without instinct and impulse to back it. Indeed, for a first performance we can hardly call to mind anything on the Italian stage more unexceptionable. Madame Penco's voice, being a genuine soprano of great flexibility, is suited to the music; which was shown alike in the finale to the first act and in the judgment scene. In the last scene, where Ninetta is led to execution, Madame Penco surpassed herself, acting with intensity and feeling, and singing the pathetic prayer to perfection. We may add that Madame Penco looked the part thoroughly, and never seemed to forget that she was the rustic village maid.

M. Faure was perhaps more arduously taxed in Fernando Villabella than in either Hoël or Alphonso XI. Fortunately his voice is flexible, or with all his talent he could not have surmounted the difficulties presented. The music of Fernando was written for Filippo Galli—"the barytone of his epoch," as M. Fétis, years later, denominated Tamburini. If M. Faure has not yet quite attained the requisite ease and fluency, he is at least in a fair way of attaining it. Increased familiarity with the Italian school of vocalisation will free him from certain peculiarities native to his own French manner, irreconcileable with the nice refinement of execution demanded by Rossini's florid music. The terzetto, "O nume benefico," and the unaccompanied quintet in the condemnation scene, were, on Saturday night, his most successful achievements. In "Ah! qual Colpa" and "Ecco cessato il vento" he was too measured, and evidently less at ease. M. Faure's acting throughout was earnest, intelligent, and impressive.

Signor Ronconi's Podestà is a more consummate performance than ever, more deeply weighed, more artistically elaborated, and more admirably fused into one great whole. The comic phase of the character is not made so prominent as formerly, and more real interest is created in consequence. Of course the humour of the first scene is preserved, and the Podestà allowed to exhibit his vagaries and drolleries as usual. This was necessary in a dramatic sense. After the condemnation of Ninetta, however, and indeed throughout the judgment scene, a tragic colouring is given, consistent with the dramatic situation, and contrasting in a striking manner with the scenes which have gone before. This is Signor Ronconi's new idea of the character, and with what transcendent art and effect he carries it out may be easily imagined.

Madame Nantier-Didiée, who made her first appearance this season as Pippo, was received with distinguished favour. This lady has earned a well-deserved popularity by her capital singing and her clever acting. For small parts, like the goatherd in Linda, and Maddalena in Rigoletto, her place could not be well supplied. In trying to make too much of Pippo, however, Madame Nantier-Didiée occasionally becomes extravagant, and, in spite of the applause she occasionally received from the less refined among the audience, does not create the impression she is no doubt desirous of making on good judges. The performance would certainly be improved if less were attempted to produce effect; especially we advise the omission of the fight with the soldiers in the finale to Act 1. Madame Tagliafico, as the farmer's wife; Signor Tagliafico, as Fabrizio; and Signor Luchesi, as the pedlar, were all excellent. The band and chorus were splendid, and we are inclined to pronounce the performance of La Gazza Ladra, on Saturday night, as the most perfect of the season. The overture, encored amid a storm of applause, was repeated with increased effect. The opera is admirably put upon the stage.

The new divertissement, Les Amours de Diane, produced on Thursday, affords opportunities for the very clever dancing of Mdlle. Zina, and is very prettily placed on the stage.

After the opera on Saturday, the new Floral Hall was thrown open to the occupants of boxes, stalls, and all who promenaded until midnight, while the band of the Coldstream Guards performed a variety of popular pieces. The Hall was brilliantly illuminated and handsomely decorated, and is altogether a magnificent saloon either for balls or concerts.

La Gazza Ladra was repeated on Tuesday, and Il Trovatore on Thursday.

Letters to the Editor.

BEETHOVEN AND MENDELSSOHN.

SIR,—In the very clever letter from "Veteran" given in your last number, I see that Mendelssohn is spoken of as an imitator of Beethoven. I consider this an insult to the lamented musician, and to the thousands who love him not least of all for his originality. I am not a veteran myself, but I dare assert that in originality at least Mendelssohn is quite as great as any of his predecessors. Perhaps if I am wrong you will kindly correct me, as I am only

A MUSICAL STUDENT.

[We are entirely of "A Musical Student's opinion." We shall have a word or two with "Veteran" in our next.—ED.]

THE DOUBLE BASS.

SIR,—Can you oblige me with any information as to the time when the Double Bass was first introduced into the orchestra?

Yours obediently,

Z.

MR. G. A. BARRY'S SONGS.

SIR,—In justice to Messrs. Ewer & Co., the publishers of the English edition of my "Six Songs" reviewed in No. 20. of the Musical World, I beg to correct an error you have fallen into, in stating that in the case of several of them the name of the author of the words is not given. By reference to the songs, you will see that it is given, but at the end of each; a plan unusual perhaps in England, but common enough in Germany.

With regard to M. Meyerbeer's setting of H. Heine's "Du schönes Fischermädchen," (with which you contrast my version of the same) it would be interesting to learn how far the melody produced by that composer was inspired by the words. Charming and original as it is, both in melody, harmony, and in general effect, is there not internal evidence of its having been composed without reference to the text? That it was originally written to other words—unless it be that it was produced in the composer's youth, a time when absolute melody flows more naturally than in maturity, when one is apt to rely on the text for suggestions,—I am led to suspect, from the fact of the contraction of the words "und setze dich" into "setz' dich," as well as from the improbability that M. Meyerbeer, a man of education and not a mere musician, would have so far disregarded the rules of prosody as to allow such words as und, hat, in, mein, to occur on the accented note of the bar, by which the declamation is falsified, and the singer is compelled to quite a different accentuation from that which a good reader would give.

For my own part, having already been long acquainted with M. Meyerbeer's "Fischermädchen," I probably should not have attempted a new version, had not the idea of producing a melody, which should not be a deux temps, but mainly the result of what I took to be the correct declamation of the words, been suggested to me in Leipsic by a musical friend, who (as he said) had just written a "melody like" melody to the same.

Thanking you for your kindly notice of my songs,

I remain, Sir, yours obediently,

ALFRED BARRY.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—The programme of last Monday, selected from Italian masters, was of so interesting a character that we cannot do better than present it to our readers unmutilated.

PART I.

Quintet, in A major (No. 3 3rd set—Op. 20), for two violins, viola, and two violoncellos. Herr Becker, Herr Ries, R. Blagrove, M. Paque, and Signor Piatti ... ... Boccherini

Aria, "Ah! lo crepido, (I Zingari in Fiera). Madlle. Euphrosyne Parepa ... ... Paesiello Aria, "Forbido mai che treme, (La Passione). Mr. Santley ... ... Jomelli

Sonata, in C major (Op. 34, No. 1), for pianoforte alone. Miss Arabella Goddard ... ... Clementi

Aria, "Vado ben spesso." Mr. Tennant ... ... Salvator Rosa

Notturno for two voices, "Puro ciel tranquilla notte," Madlle. Parepa and Madame Laura Baxter ... ... Paer

Grand Quartet, in D minor, for two violins, viola, and violoncello. Herr Becker, Herr Ries, R. Blagrove, and Signor Piatti ... ... Cherubini

PART II.

Quartet, "Come calme e placide," (Nina). Madlle. Parepa, Madame Laura Baxter, Mr. Tennant, and Mr. Santley ... ... Paesiello

Selection from "Harpsichord Lessons" (including the Cat's Fugue). Miss Arabella Goddard ... Scarlatti

Aria, "Alla larga Signore" (La Buona Figliuola). Madame Laura Baxter ... ... Piccini

Aria, "Con ape ingegnosa" by desire, (Tarrare). Mr. Santley ... ... Salieri

Sonata, in G, for two violoncellos. Signor Piatti and Mr. Schroeder ... ... Boccherini

Venetian Air, "La Biondina in Gondoletta," with variations. Madlle. Euphrosyne Parepa ... ... Paer

Notturno for two voices, "Per Valli per Boschi." Madame Laura Baxter and Mr. Tennant ... ... Blangini

Quartet, in E flat major, for two violins, viola, and violoncello. Herr Becker, Herr Ries, R. Blagrove, and Signor Piatti ... ... Rossini.

With the exception of the air by Salieri and Rossini's quartet, all these were given for the first time; and if we may judge by the careful attention with which they were listened to, and the hearty applause accorded by a full audience, the success of the old Italian composers with the modern English public may be looked upon as a fait accompli. Some time since we took occasion to observe that the directors of these entertainments were earnestly working the rich vein of good music, and it being now established beyond a doubt, that there is a very large section of concert goers who can and do appreciate classical chamber compositions, we trust that still further opportunities may be afforded for hearing works which, in some instances, from their antiquity, and in others from being known only to curious dilettanti, bear the stamp and possess all the attraction of novelty. It would far exceed the limits of our space were we to enter upon a detailed criticism of each of the thirteen pieces (too many, by the way,—an embarras de richesses), much less to introduce any remarks from the analytical programme which embodies information of an instructive and amusing character. Suffice it then that Messrs. Becker, Ries, K. Blagrove, Pague, Schroeder, and Piatti, fully sustained their high reputation as instrumentalists; that Miss Arabella Goddard was enthusiastically recalled after her admirable performance of Scarlatti's Harpsichord Lessons; that Mdlle. Parepa and Madame Laura Baxter were encored in their first duet; Messrs. Tennant and Santley used their best exertions in the pieces allotted them, the latter gentleman distinguishing himself highly in the animated air of Jomelli. Herr Ganz officiated as Conductor.

Next Monday will be devoted to various masters. Mdlle. Jenny Meyer, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Sainton, Herr Lübeck, and a new basso, Herr Hermanns, are engaged. We are glad to observe that there is to be another quartet from Dussek's Op. 61.

THE CRYSTAL PALACE.—The annual meeting of the children of the charity schools of the metropolis, which has so long been annually held in St. Paul's Cathedral, will this year be discontinued. Fortunately the disappointment which would have been felt by thousands of persons at the cessation of these time-honoured celebrations will be removed by making the Crystal Palace available for the occasion, and it is announced that a more than ordinarily great gathering of the children will take place at the Palace on Wednesday next, June 6, preparations for which have been in active progress for some time past. The great Handel Orchestra, being double the diameter of the dome of St. Paul's, affords opportunity for the introduction of a much larger number of children than were ever assembled in the cathedral together. The favourable construction of the orchestra also renders it a much more appropriate locale than the old staging in the ecclesiastical edifice. The result will probably, therefore, be more successful than the meetings at St. Paul's, although they have hitherto been regarded as among the great sights of the metropolis. In order that the children may enjoy a lengthened holiday, they will be conveyed to the Palace by special trains and vans at an early hour of the morning. At three o'clock they will be assembled in the great orchestra for the musical performance, and more than ordinary attention will be paid to grouping them according to the colours of the clothes worn by each school. The various schools have for some time past been under careful training by Mr. W. G. Martin, whose success with the great meetings of the Metropolitan Schools Choral Society and with the choir of St. Paul's Cathedral is well known, and a great advance on former musical efforts may reasonably be anticipated. The treasurers of the various schools, under the chairmanship of Mr. Alderman Finnis, with many other influential members of the corporation, including the active hon. secretary to the committee, Mr. John Stewart, have entered most heartily into this holiday scheme, and as, by the liberality of the Crystal Palace authorities, the opportunity will be afforded to the parents of the children to provide themselves beforehand with tickets at the lowest excursion rate, there can be no doubt but that Wednesday, the 6th of June, will be one of the great days at the Crystal Palace, and the popular annual solemnity of the "Charity Children" of the metropolis will more than ever retain its attractions. On Friday, June 8, and two following days, a great Fancy Fair and Bazaar, supported by many of the leading city houses, and under distinguished patronage, will be held in the Central Transept, for the benefit of the Warehousemen's and Clerks' Schools.

TONIC SOL-FA.—The following letter was addressed by the General Manager of the Crystal Palace Company to the conductors of the recent festival given by the Tonic Sol-Fa Association at Sydenham:—

MY DEAR SIRS,—I cannot allow the day to pass over without offering you my congratulations on the very successful execution of the music selected for the meeting of the Tonic Sol-fa Association. Knowing something of the labour requisite for organising such an assemblage; knowing also the difficulty of efficient rehearsal of such a force as that brought under your guidance, I am unable adequately to express my astonishment and pleasure at the result. Whether I look to the attention given to the bâton by this large mass of young persons—the manner in which they kept up to the pitch—the expressive emphasis upon the words—the force of the forte passages—or the delicacy of the piano, I was equally astonished and delighted. I feel it therefore not only an act of great pleasure, but also one of duty, to both of you gentlemen, upon whom must have devolved so much labour and anxiety, to offer you my most hearty and sincere congratulations on the successful issue of this day's meeting. Whatever may be the opinions entertained in some quarters of the system of notation under which your pupils are instructed, I care not here to allude to—that the result of this day's celebration is, however, most honourable to you, I cheerfully attest; that it must result in increasing benefit to musical art in this country I as firmly believe. Believe me to be, my dear Sirs, most faithfully yours,

ROBERT BOWYER.

(General Manager, Crystal Palace Company).

MESSRS. JOHN SARLL & W. S. YOUNG

(Conductors of the Tonic Sol-fa Festival).

Such testimony from one so well qualified to give it must have been flattering to the clever conductors and teachers who labour so zealously in their tasks.

Provincial.

RICHMOND, SURREY.—(From a Correspondent.)—The members of the Richmond Musical Society gave their last Concert for the Season on Monday, May 21st, when the room was crowded by subscribers and their friends. The concert was the best the members have given. The instrumental part consisted of two movements from Mozart's Symphony in C [which of the two?], Weber's overture to Preciosa, and a March, composed for the Society by the conductor, Dr. Sellé, the solos in which, for clarionet, flute, and trumpet, were exceedingly well played. The vocal pieces were also very good. Mr. Costa's song from The Dream, and a song with chorus, composed by Mr. W. Abbott, were both given in an efficient style by a gentleman. The following songs were sung by three ladies: "Vas dir sagete," "Dearest Companions," and "Sweet Bride of Sleep," with clarionet obligato. This last-named gained the only encore, the clarionet part being played by the composer Dr. Sellé. The following gentlemen of the musical profession tendered their valuable assistance: Mr. Sebastian, Mr. W. Abbott, Mr. Callcott, and Mr. Etherington.

HERR BECKER AT MANCHESTER.—Decidedly the great treat of the evening would be found in the violin playing of Herr Becker, who has this season visited London, if we mistake not, for the first time, and who cannot fail to make an impression upon all who love music truly, whether learned or unlearned in the art divine. The manner of Herr Becker has more of the gentleman in its character than the eccentric artist; his bearing is particularly graceful, free from angularities, and giving the impression of spontaneity rather than that baleful and earnest study which must have led to such a result. He dashes off some of the most noted passages in the Kreutzer Sonata for violin and pianoforte, and Mendelssohn's Concerto, with a perfection of manipulation that develops in many instances quite a new reading; you feel that a master hand has possession of the great master's composition, and the value also of every note and point throughout its wondrous intricacy. Not less effective is the andante playing of Herr Becker, so rich and round in tone, so full of that tremulous delicacy which marks true pathos. Rarely have we been more gratified with sterling violin playing, and having Mr. Hallé for his pianoforte companion in the duets we need scarcely say how complete was that particular performance.—Manchester Examiner and Times, May 15.

The Same to his Wife.

Milan, January 8, 1771.

Yesterday we had a little concert at Count Firmiani's, where Wolfgang had a concerto — a very fine one, and quite new — given him to play. Next Monday we shall go to Turin, where we shall spend a week. Our son's opera marches onward amidst universal approbation, and as the Italians say, it is going up to the skies (alle stelle). Every one is curious to behold the maestro and to speak with him.

During the three first performances Wolfgang sat at the first harpsichord, and the maestro Lampugnani accompanies him on the second. Now it is the latter who plays the first, and the maestro Melchior Chiesa the second.

The Same to the Same.

Milan, January 12, 1771.

The Philharmonic Academy of Verona has admitted our dear son among its members, and the Cavaliers dell 'Academie is busy preparing the diploma to send it to us. God be thanked! the opera is so attractive that the theatre is crammed full every day.

P.S. from Wolfgang. — It is long since I wrote, I have been so busy. Now that I have more time I shall attend better to my duty. The opera, God be thanked, pleases, for the theatre is quite full every night, which astonishes every one, as every one says that in Milan no first opera ever drew such a crowd. We are well, and I hope at Easter to be able to tell everything in detail to you and our good mother. A propos—yesterday the copyist came to see us, and to tell us that the court of Lisbon had asked for a copy of the opera. Keep yourself in health, my lady sister.

I have the honour to be and eternally to remain,
Your faithful brother.

The Same to the Same.

Venice, February 20, 1771.

We arrived here the Monday before Shrove Tuesday. We go every night to the opera and to the other places of public recreation. The former impresario, Crosa, miserably drest, crawls about the streets of Milan a beggar. God thus punishes the deceitful.

I have yet to tell you, about our stay at Milan, the following fact:—we heard a thing which will seem to you incredible, and which I thought I never could have heard.—N. B. in Italy. We heard two poor people, a man and a woman, singing together in the streets, and singing entirely in fifths, without missing a single note. This is what I never heard in Germany. From a distance I thought at first that two persons were singing separately. As we drew near we found that it was a duo in pure fifths.

I cannot sufficiently lay stress on the politeness of M. Wider, the merchant to whom I have been recommended, and on that of all his family. It is impossible to give them too much praise. I have learnt a little to read the men of this world; but I have seen few, very few, so obliging as these,—frank, kindly, and open, at the same time that they are polite, well mannered, and free from pride. They have invited us to dinner every day that we have no other engagement. We shall soon have had enough of our journeys in gondolas. To-morrow we dine at Catarina Cornero's, Sunday at the Patriarch's, Monday at Dolfino's, next week, almost every day, with other nobili.

P.S. from Wolfgang.—I am still alive, God be praised, and in good health. Do you know what it is to receive the attacca? In order to become a true Venetian, you must allow your hinder part to be brought violently in contact with the ground. It was decided that I should be initiated. Seven women laid hold of me, and they succeeded in bringing me—how shall I say?—aground.

The Same to the Same.

Venice, March 1, 1771.

We are constantly invited out, now at one place now at another; there is always some lordly gondola before our door ready to carry us to the Grand Canal. On our return we shall have to make a stay for a few days at Vicenza, the bishop of which, who belongs to the Cornero family, will not allow us to pass through the city on any other condition; the same with Verona. I am vexed that we shall only have melancholy fast days during our whole journey. We may, perhaps, reach Reichenhall on Good Friday, where we shall hear the usual opera of the Passion. I will relate to you all we have seen; the arsenal, the churches, the hospitals; there are a thousand things to admire here.

We shall not bring the opera back with us. It is still in the hands of the copyist, who, like all the copyists of Italy, will not let the original of an opera go out of his hands as long as he can make a profit of the copies, in order that he alone may have the benefit of it. When we left Milan the copyist had made five complete copies, one for the impresa (management), two for Vienna, one for the Duchess of Parma, and the other for the court of Lisbon, not to speak of the single pieces of which he had many copies to make. He has not executed all his orders yet.

Tuesday there is a grand concert; Sunday we go to the Imperial ambassador, Monday to Maffetti's.

The Same to the Same.

Venice, March 6, 1771.

We are so plagued and dragged at in every direction, that I cannot say who, of all that ask us, will succeed in getting us. It is a pity we could not have stayed longer here, for we have made a wide acquaintance with all the nobility, and everywhere, in the drawing-rooms, at the dinner table, we are so overwhelmed with honours, that not only are we fetched and brought back in gondolas by the secretary of each house, but the master of the house himself accompanies us home, and they are among the first people in Venice, the Cornero's, Grimani's, Mocenigo's, Dolfins, Valiers, &c.

I am afraid we shall meet with very bad roads, for there have been frightful rains. Basta! we must take things as they come. All these things do not interrupt my repose, so long as we are in health.

The Same to the Same.

Vicenza, March 14*th*, 1771.

We had made everybody believe that we should start a day earlier than we meant, in order to have a day to ourselves, and to have time to pack up. But the trick was nosed out, and we had to dine once more with Cotari, and with Cornero, who presented us with a handsome snuff box, and some fine lace cuffs. We saw all that we could contrive to visit in Padua in one day, for there we could get no rest either, and Wolfgang had to play in two places. He also found some work there, for he is to compose an oratorio for Padua. We paid a visit to the Maestro Padre Valotti* di Santo, and then Ferrandini†, where Wolfgang had to perform. Lastly he played to perfection on the organ of the incomparable church of San Giustiniano. To-morrow we stay over another day—not without cause.

Verona, March 18*th*, 1771.

I am informed from Vienna that a document will reach me at Salzburg, which will astonish you, and confer immortal honour on our son.‡

The Same to the Same.

Innspruck, March 25*th*, 1771.

We are near our journey's end. Thursday, I hope to be in the midst of you.

103.

The Same to the Same.

Verona, August 18*th*, 1771.§

We stayed an entire day at Ala, with the two Piccinis, that we might go to church in our travelling attire, which it was easier to do than at Verona. We have plenty of entertainment in the way of music. We alighted here at Luggiatti's.

P.S. from Wolfgang.—I have only slept half an hour, for I do not like sleeping after meals. You may hope, believe, think, fancy, figure to yourself, be satisfied, and live in confidence, that we are in good health. As for me I can give you positive intelligence to that effect. Ask M. de Heffner if he has not seen Anna Mindl.

The Same to the Same.

Milan, August 24, 1771.

We have been here since the 21st. The poem has not yet been sent from Vienna. The archduke arrives on the 15th of October, and the marriage will take place on the same day.

P.S. from Wolfgang.—We were overcome with heat on the road; the dust followed us up most pertinaciously and impertinently to such a degree, that we should certainly have been stifled and have died, had we not had the good sense to do nothing of the kind. Keep your promise

* A cordelier monk, a chapel master, and the greatest organist of his time. Born at Verceil, 1697, died at Padua, 1780.

† Antonio Ferrandini, born at Naples, 1718, author of a Stabat Mater, considered a masterpiece; died in poverty, 1779.

‡ Count Fiomiani wrote to him from Milan, in the name of the Empress Maria Teresa, to confide to Wolfgang the composition of a grand serenade for the stage, to celebrate the marriage of Archduke Ferdinand. It was called Ascanio in Alba. The opera composed on the same occasion was entrusted to the eldest of the chapel masters, the celebrated Hasse.

§ Mozart returned in August to Milan, with his father, to compose his serenade, and work at an opera at the same time.

to me; you know very well which I mean. O thou all-beloved I beseech thee; I shall most certainly be beholden to thee.

At this moment I am suffocating; I open my waistcoat. Addio. Overhead we have a violinist; there is one below us; in the next apartment there is a singing-master giving lessons; opposite to us there is a colonel. This is an amusing state of things when you are composing, it gives one ideas.

The Same to the Same.

Milan, August 31, 1771.

The poem has come at last. As yet Wolfgang has done nothing but the overture, to wit, a tolerably long allegro, an andante which is to be danced to, but only by a few persons. Then instead of the concluding allegro he has written a sort of contredanse and chorus, which is to be sung and danced to. We shall have a pretty good deal to do this month. We are going to see M Hasse, who has just arrived.

We went to see the Princess, the betrothed of the Archduke. She was extremely gracious; not only did she chat a long time with us, but, moreover, gave us the most charming reception, for as soon as she caught sight of us, she advanced quickly to meet us, drew off her glove and presented her hand, and began to address us before we could say a word to her.

P.S. from Wolfgang.—I have already in your honour eat lots of pears, peaches, and melons. My sole pleasure is talking in signs with the dumb people, for I can do it to perfection. Let me recommend to you my prayer for the other, so long as there is another, you understand.*

I received your few lines; it was a most economical idea to write only a little on the first page and scarcely anything on the second; for so many thousands of letters might add such weight to the epistle, that it would require six horses to convey it to Milan. Heavens what an amount of postage. Blank sheets are always less costly to be conveyed than those which are covered with writing.

Our heads are quite full. We received the poem very late, and even then it still remained some days in the hands of the poet, that he might make all sorts of changes. I hope it will have a good success. But Wolfgang has a heap of things to write, for he is also obliged to compose the music for the ballet which connects the two acts, or the two parts of the serenade.

I did not think it at all extraordinary that the Archduke Maximilian should have become a canon of the Cathedral. I everywhere, and on all occasions have said it, since my return from Italy to Salzburg, that it would happen. We shall see the rest: patience. I am sorry I cannot write all I have to say. Salzburg is not the sole motive for this first step.

The Same to the Same.

Milan, September 13, 1771.

Wolfgang will, I hope, with God's help, have finished the serenade in twelve days; it is properly speaking an azione teatrale in two parts. The recitatives, with and without accompaniments, are all finished, and the choruses also, five of which are sung only, and three others sung and danced to at the same time. We attended to-day the rehearsal of the dance, and we admired the zeal of the two ballet-masters, Pick and Fabier. The first tableau represents Venus emerging from the clouds, accompanied by Genii and Graces.

The andante of the symphony is danced to by eleven personages, eight Graces and three Goddesses. The last allegro of the symphony, is a chorus of thirty-two choristers, eight soprani, eight contralti, eight tenors, and eight basses, and at the same time danced to by sixteen personages, eight women, and eight men.

There is another chorus of shepherds and shepherdesses; and besides choruses of shepherds alone, that is tenors and basses; next there are, choruses of little shepherdesses, that is of soprani and contralti. In the last scene they are all together, Geni, Grazi, Pastori, Pastorelle, choristers, dancers of both sexes, and all dance together to the final chorus. In the above enumeration are not included the solo dancers, namely M. Pick, Mdme. Binetti, M. Fabier, and Mamsell Bimcho. The small solos which intervene between the choruses, sometimes between two soprani, sometimes between alti and soprani &c., are intermingled with solos by dancers of both sexes.

The personages of the cantata are: La Venere, Signora Falchini, seconda donna; Ascanio, Signor Manzuoli, primo uomo; Silvia, Signora Girelli, prima donna; Aceste Sacerdote, Signor Tibaldi, tenore; Fauno Pastore, Signor Solzi, secondo uomo.

N.B.—We have already in hand our Venice affair for 1773.

(Here follows in Italian the agreement for an opera to be performed in Venice at the Carnival of 1773, and requiring the presence of young Mozart in that city from the 30th of November, 1772. The terms are seventy sequins.)

P.S. from Wolfgang.—I shall write only for the sake of writing. I am not very well. I have a cold in my head and chest. Tell Mdlle. de Moelk, I am greatly rejoiced at the idea of returning to Salzburg, if it were only to receive for my minuets such a present as I received once after a certain concert,—she will know well enough what the present I mean was.

NEW SONGS by J. W. DAVISON, "Rough wind that moanest lond" (sung by Mr. Santley at the Monday Popular Concerts); "Swifter far than Summer's flight," (sung by Miss Palmer at the Monday Popular Concerts); "False friend, wilt thou smile or weep," Beatrice's song in the Cenci (sung by Madame Sainton-Dolby, at the Monday Popular Concerts, St. James's Hall); are published by Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201 Regent Street.
The above Songs form Nos. 1, 2, and 3 of Vocal Illustrations of Shelley.
"Mr. Santley was encored in one of the thoroughly picturesque and poetical settings of Shelley, by Mr. J. W. Davison, mentioned a week or two since. His song, 'Rough wind that moanest lond,' is a thoroughly good song."—Athenæum.
"Madame Sainton-Dolby's greatest efforts were called forth by Mendelssohn's 'Night' song, and Mr. J. W. Davison's 'False friend, wilt thou smile or weep' (from Shelley's 'Cenci'), to both of which she did the amplest justice. The latter work is one of the most poetical and beautiful of the 'Vocal Illustrations of Shelley,' composed by Mr. Davison many years ago, and which, though rarely heard, possess far more sterling merit than nine-tenths of the most admired songs of the day. A more intellectual treatment of the words could not well be imagined. Mr. Davison has completely caught the spirit of the poetry, and heightened its beauty by the potent charms which belong only to the sister art. 'False friend, wilt thou smile or weep,' sung to perfection by Madame Sainton-Dolby, was enthusiastically applauded."

GREAT NATIONAL ENTERPRISE

Organised in 1848, and developed at THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC, BRIDGE STREET, MANCHESTER, established by him expressly as a Great National Institution to facilitate the Encouragement and Promotion of NATIVE MUSICAL TALENT, and the GENERAL ADVANCEMENT OF MUSIC AMONG THE RISING GENERATION, upon his new and effective system, also as a NORMAL SCHOOL, for the training of masters to conduct CONSERVATORIES OF MUSIC to be established throughout the United Kingdom, for LITTLE CHILDREN, the whole comprising an entirely new scheme of NATIONAL EDUCATION, by blending music with general instruction, so that the study of music shall become a branch of education in the humblest of schools of this country. To illustrate and to rouse an interest in every town and city for these institutions, Dr. Mark travels with a number of his pupils occasionally through the country—giving lectures, and introducing his highly approved and pleasing Musical Entertainment, entitled DR. MARK AND HIS LITTLE MEN, who number upwards of Thirty Instrumentalists, and a most Efficient Chorus, the whole forming a most unique and complete Juvenile Orchestra, composed of LITTLE ENGLISH, IRISH, SCOTCH AND WELCH BOYS, FROM FIVE TO SIXTEEN YEARS OF AGE, who play Operatic Selections, Solos, Marches, Quadrilles, Galops, &c., and sing Songs and Choruses in a most effective manner, and to whom Dr. Mark gives a gratuitous General and Musical Education.

NEW SONGS by J. W. DAVISON, "Rough wind that moanest loud" (sung by Mr. Santley at the Monday Popular Concerts); "Swifter far than Summer's flight," (sung by Miss Palmer at the Monday Popular Concerts); "False friend, wilt thou smile or weep," Beatrice's song in the Cenci (sung by Madame Sainton-Dolby, at the Monday Popular Concerts, St. James's Hall); are published by Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201 Regent Street.

The above Songs form Nos. 1, 2, and 3 of Vocal Illustrations of Shelley.

"Mr. Santley was encored in one of the thoroughly picturesque and poetical settings of Shelley, by Mr. J. W. Davison, mentioned a week or two since. His song, 'Rough wind that moanest loud,' is a thoroughly good song."—Athenæum.

"Madame Sainton-Dolby's greatest efforts were called forth by Mendelssohn's 'Night' song, and Mr. J. W. Davison's 'False friend, wilt thou smile or weep' (from Shelley's 'Cenci'), to both of which she did the amplest justice. The latter work is one of the most poetical and beautiful of the 'Vocal Illustrations of Shelley,' composed by Mr. Davison many years ago, and which, though rarely heard, possess far more sterling merit than nine-tenths of the most admired songs of the day. A more intellectual treatment of the words could not well be imagined. Mr. Davison has completely caught the spirit of the poetry, and heightened its beauty by the potent charms which belong only to the sister art. 'False friend, wilt thou smile or weep,' sung to perfection by Madame Sainton-Dolby, was enthusiastically applauded."

W. A. MOZART.

By Otto Jahn.

*Fourth Part.

V.

Supplement XXVII. contains the most important points, together with the requisite documents, concerning the long and warm dispute as to the genuineness of the Requiem. The present conclusions have been arrived at by a careful examination of Mozart's original score, containing only his own work; of the score which Count Wallsegg received, and which, written by Süssmayr in wonderful imitation of Mozart's hand, comprehended all the pieces of the Requiem as they subsequently appeared in print; and by a comparison and consideration of several separate facts, which were partly unknown, and partly, out of consideration for persons still alive and implicated in the whole—truly not very satisfactory—matter, suppressed on purpose.

Mozart finished the first two pieces, the "Requiem," and the "Kyrie," and copied them out in perfect score.

From the "Dies iræ" (inclusive of "Tuba mirum," "Rex tremendæ," "Recordare," "Confutatis," "Lacrimosa") he only sketched the score, that is to say, he wrote out the vocal parts completely, with the figured bass beneath, but merely indicated the motives of the instruments, in the ritornellos, intermediary pieces, and wherever else they come peculiarly forward. With the 14th bar—"Judicandus homo reus"—of the "Lacrimosa," Mozart left off; the pen dropped from his hand. As he himself previously said: He had been writing the Requiem for himself.

He had not, however, composed the various pieces in their proper order, but according to the frame of mind he happened to be in. Thus—before the completion of the whole "Dies iræ"—the offertorium "Domine Jesu Christe" was finished, together with the fugue "Quam olim Abrahæ," and the "Hostias," but only in the same fashion as the "Dies iræ," that is to say, in the sketch of the score.

"We now understand" (p. 692) "how Mozart, while going through this sketch of the score with his pupil, Süssmayr, at the piano or at his desk, might hold an instructive conversation concerning the mode of carrying out the instrumentation, allowing Süssmayr to try his hand, and then explaining to the latter how the thing ought to be done, and what he had imagined it, so that Süssmayr was really enabled to get into his head a picture, in many respects a living one, of the score as it was meant to be, and to copy faithfully Mozart's hand. Of this, the way in which the thing is carried out affords us a proof."

Of the last three pieces, "Sanctus," "Benedictus," and "Agnus Dei," there were no such score-plans. Süssmayr, according to his own definite assertion, wrote these pieces "quite afresh" ("ganz neu"), as well as the conclusion of the "Lacrimosa," except that he repeated the fugue of the "Kyrie" at the words "Cum sanctis tuis."

Franz Xaver Süssmayr, born at Steyer, in 1766, was brought up in Kremsmünster, and instructed in music by Pasterwitz. He speedily made his way at Vienna, and was appointed, as early as 1792, imperial theatrical Kapellmeister. He first wrote a "dramatic oratorio," Moses, and then a number of operas for Schikaneder, of which Der Spiegel von Arkadien (1794), and Soliman II. (1800) were frequently played and very popular.†

That in carrying out Mozart's plans for the score, Süssmayr had great scope in the details, is beyond question. "Nevertheless, the whole arrangement has so turned out, that it does not disturb, but allows the essential intentions to stand forth, and any one can convince himself that Süssmayr has not attempted to alter aught, or introduce any of his own scribbling."—(P. 729.)

"With regard to the last three pieces," continues Jahn, "we are confined altogether to conjecture when we raise the question, in opposition to Süssmayr's positive assertion, corroborated by Mozart's widow, whether Mozart had any share, and, if so, what share in them. The question is, consequently, founded only on the fact that these pieces are worthy of Mozart, and that we cannot believe Süssmayr capable of them; at the same time, however, æsthetical criticism is obliged to proceed with great caution, from the recollection of the heavy moral charge it is compelled to make. When Seyfried says (Cäcilia, iv. p. 307), in conformity with the opinion generally held in Vienna, that Süssmayr completed these pieces from rough notes which he discovered, that Mozart wished to carry out grandly the "Osanna" fugue after the 'Benedictus,' which would be against the rule, and also had in his head a new theme for the concluding fugue, 'Cum Sanctis,' the grounds for this opinion can scarcely be said to have been seriously proved.

"Süssmayr, who, as a young man of seven-and-twenty, then received instruction from Salieri and Mozart, and attached himself closely to the latter, walked in and out of his house as he chose, and at that period was, as Seyfried expresses himself, 'the inseparable companion of the immortal Amphion.' He profited by these intimate relations, to work himself completely into Mozart's way; and he succeeded so well in catching Mozart's manner (Factur), in doing which it was not always his object to appropriate the ideas, that Seyfried asserts, when speaking of several of his works of a serious kind, any one would suppose them to be Mozart's were it not an ascertained fact they were Süssmayr's (Cäcilia, iii. p. 295). With regard to instrumental compositions, Hauptmann informed me they showed all Mozart's technicality, and, at any rate, might pass as some of his lighter productions. Sievers, who has warmly espoused Süssmayr's cause, refers to his opera, Der Spiegel von Arkadien, which was first given in 1794, was universally successful, and held its own side by side with the Zauberflöte, as well as to detached pieces, which were considered models of the light, natural, graceful, and yet characteristic, as well as tragically serious style, to prove that he must not be at once rejected as insignificant. The close examination to which I have subjected Der Spiegel von Arkadien and Soliman II., and also some of Süssmayr's smaller sacred compositions, in order to obtain a notion of his productions, has enabled me to discover in him light but superficial invention, a skilful smooth style, and, nearly always, a palpable imitation of Mozart's manner. While people were generally under the immediate influence of this manner, a certain freshness and liveliness might deceive them as to the fact that it can only be a question of the outward appropriation of what is to be caught by study of the original, and that—despite respectable powers—mind, originality, strength, and depth are wanting. This is the standard, therefore, which we must apply to the last pieces of the Requiem.

"The 'Sanctus' and 'Osanna' are scarcely of a kind to allow of a definite decision: the fact that the 'Sanctus' is treated in a very short and meagre way would not militate against its being Mozart's, for all the pieces of the Requiem, where the fugued treatment is not carried out at length, are compressed in a similar fashion; just as little ought stress to be laid on a disagreeable progression of the violins, since the working out does not come in any case from him. On the other hand, it is not sufficient that the piece possesses a character of noble magnificence extremely well expressed, and that the commencement of the 'Pleni sunt cœli' is truly majestic, to deny decidedly that Süssmayr is the author. It certainly does not stand equally high with the best of the previous pieces. The short fugue of the 'Osanna' is lively, forcible, and, in its meagre precision, blameless: it is nothing to object that Mozart could have written it; but that a talented well-schooled musician like Süssmayr could not have written it, is something for which it would be difficult to adduce certain grounds.

"The case is somewhat different with the 'Benedictus,' in which, according to the usual mode, solo parts are introduced in a long, spun-out quartet of a soft character. Zelter says of this (Brief-wechsel mit Göthe, iv. p. 353): 'The "Benedictus" is as admirable as possible, and cannot be by Mozart; the school settles something to this effect. Süssmayr was acquainted with Mozart's school, but had not been in it; he had not followed it in his youth, and of this there are traces here and there in the fine "Benedictus."' He is certainly right. The first motive, executed by the alto, the idea of making the various parts call to each other, might very well arise with Mozart, but the carrying out of the notion decidedly not. The movement evidently stops when the soprano is again introduced in the tonic, after the alt, and the transition into the dominant is very lame, but still lamer after the conclusion of the first part, the laborious settling into F major, and, instead of a working-through, which is here expected, the immediate retrogression through the seventh to the first part, which is then repeated at length; neither the plan nor the execution is worthy of Mozart. Furthermore, it is scarcely credible that, in the intermediate music, he would have copied in so striking a manner as is here the case, the 'Et lux perpetua' out of the Requiem, without having some reason which required an allusion to the passage in question. Then, too, we have the thick, full instrumentation, entirely departing from the subject, an instrumentation which is certainly not carried out by Mozart, even in the other pieces, but which here cannot be well separated from the plan of the whole, besides differing also from that of all the other pieces by the employment of two trombones, which Mozart never introduces anywhere else, and which are here used to make up, as it were, for the horns. Finally, the character of the whole is not only soft and tender, but in many places effeminate and sweet, forming in this respect a remarkable contrast to the seriousness of the other pieces, and even to the 'Tuba mirum.' The 'Osanna' is, as usual, a strict repetition of the first, only, on account of the change of key, the parts are inverted.

* From the Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung. See Musical World.

† As recently as the year 1810, I saw, at the Court theatre, Dessau, Der Spiegel von Arkadien, a magic opera, in which a rascal called "Tarkeleon," if I recollect aright, played the principal part.—Editor of the Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung.

"But the 'Agnus Dei' transports us into a completely different region. Here we find the deep, intense feeling, the noble beauty, and the originality of invention which we admire in the first pieces of the Requiem. The magnificent and expressive figure for the violins: on which the first period is founded, is full of dash, and admirably worked up by the harmonic treatment, a pleasing conclusion being brought about by the soft counter-motive, with its calm movement. The double repetition is effectively modified and worked up, and the conclusion brought prominently forward by a beautiful new turn: certain mastery and perfection are apparent throughout. 'If Mozart did not write this,' says Marx (Berliner Musick-Zeitung, 1825, p. 379), 'all I have to say is that he who did was Mozart!' I have found nothing in Süssmayr which can make one feel justified in ascribing to him the conception of this piece, and I have been compelled to adopt the conclusion that the principal idea, at least, belongs to Mozart, and that Süssmayr can scarcely have any more important share in it than in earlier ones. It is true that his whole assertion loses its trustworthiness if a well-grounded doubt can be raised against a single point, still I do not dare to affirm with certainty that, in the 'Sanctus' and 'Benedictus' Süssmayr necessarily made use of Mozart's sketches.

"If we carefully consider that portion of the Requiem which Mozart himself completed, or carried out so far that, in the eyes of a competent judge, the work of art is clearly apparent, according to its nature, we shall not hesitate allowing this production to possess the same elevation of artistic perfection which Mozart attained in the greatest creations of the last years of his life. It displays the same depth of feeling, the same noble beauty, the same mastery of form, which, by the composer's completely burying himself, mentally and artistically, in an especial task, have brought forth an original production. This is particularly evident if we compare the Requiem with the kindred efforts both of Mozart himself and of his contemporaries; the superiority of the composition is the more striking, since even, in the present instance, Mozart retains the forms laid down by tradition, while, within them, he felt capable of the most original efforts. Just as little does he in any way run counter to the views which the Requiem expresses in its place in the Roman Catholic religion, by endeavouring to go beyond it, or introduce anything foreign to it, and peculiar to himself; perfect, dispassionate devotion, the inevitable condition of really artistic creation, is nowhere disturbed; human feeling, religious views, and artistic conception are in perfect harmony with one another. It is upon this unity that the importance of the Requiem is founded, for upon this ground alone could Mozart's individuality completely assert itself, so as — with freedom and certainty, without ever losing the feeling and consciousness of the sphere in which it worked — to produce, with all the means at its disposal, a work of art, which, every moment, expresses the innermost life of its author. In this sense, we may repeat his assertion, that he wrote the Requiem for himself; it is the true, genuine expression of his artistic nature, which was directed to the very highest things; it is his 'imperishable monument.'"

MADAME CLARA NOVELLO.

Madame Novello's public career began at a remarkably early age. In 1832, when but fourteen years old, at the time of life at which in the ordinary course of nature the voice is unformed,—at a period when most singers are looking forward to the commencement of their studies, this notable artist appeared before the world, with powers naturally matured and highly cultivated. She sang at the Ancient Concerts—a series of performances these twelve years discontinued, which at that time, and for very long before, held the very first place in general consideration of all the concerts given in England; she sang at the Philharmonic Concerts, being the youngest vocalist that ever appeared in the performances of this society; and she sang at the great provincial musical festivals. The enumeration of these very important engagements is as good as a certificate of her success in their fulfilment. Singing is not, like other branches of musical proficiency, dependent only on the mental qualifications and the diligent study of an artist; it requires also a certain condition of physical development, which is rarely attained at so youthful an epoch as that at which Clara Novello was already acknowledged a deserved favourite in the most important musical institutions in the country. Well may we wonder, then, at this brilliant commencement of her career, no less than admire the singular capability which qualified her to command it.

At the famous musical festival held in Westminster Abbey in 1834—from which may be dated the progress if not the origin of the Sacred Harmonic Society, and thus the germ of the colossal performances in the Crystal Palace, which are the marvel of the world,—on this occasion of signal consequence in the history of the art, Clara Novello was one of the principal singers. It is of no little importance in the consideration of the most subordinate persons engaged in that famous festival, to remember that they were concerned in an event which may be believed to have induced an entire revolution in the state of music in England; with satisfaction greater in proportion to the greater responsibility she held, must one of the chief executants in that celebrated performance—the initial step of the great advance of music in this country—regard her participation of an artistic labour to which, and to the impression it created, so very much is to be ascribed. We naturally link the memory on this occasion with the idea of the more recent great musical occurrences in which Madame Novello has been engaged, and we observe with pride that, whereas at Westminster she was one among thirty of the greatest singers in Europe whose co-operation was supposed necessary to an efficient performance, at Sydenham she was the one soprano in all the world whose presence was indispensable, but sufficient in itself to secure all that was required for the solo pieces of Handel's master works.

Mendelssohn, in his first visits to London, was a frequent visitor at the house of Mr. Vincent Novello, who was one of the quickest to perceive, and one of the warmest to acknowledge, the greatness of his genius. Music was the ruling spirit of that artistic home, and the first musician of his time was especially in his element when surrounded by a family every member of which sympathised with his all-pervading feeling, admired his singular powers, and took part with him in the execution of the choicest works the art possesses.

It is said that in summer-weather, parties were frequently formed, of which he was one, and Malibran was another, for excursions into the fields round London — those charming spots where, after an hour's walking, one may suppose oneself a long day's journey from the turmoil of the city and its dust,—those spots justly celebrated by the so-called "Cockney poets," who, we have shewn, were also constant guests of the Novello family. On these occasions, as on all others, music was essential to the day's enjoyment: accordingly the masterpieces of the great Italian and English vocal writers form the necessary baggage of the caravan of pleasure; and with these spread out before them, seated on the grass beneath the shade of hedgerows, and beyond the chance of interruption, the cheerful group would sing the madrigals or the motets, the part songs or the anthems, which delighted their forefathers, and with their melodious art rivalled the choristers of the grove at least in the cordial pleasure they felt in their own performance. Here was abundant opportunity for Mendelssohn to discover the natural and the acquired powers of our heroine; fully estimating which, he invited her to Leipsic to sing at the famous Gewandhaus Concerts then under his direction, whither she went in the autumn of 1836. The extent of her success, in Leipsic—at that time rendered by the presence of Mendelssohn, and by his influence, the most musical city in Europe—may be supposed from the great composer's reply to a request of our Philharmonic directors that he would recommend them some singers to engage for their series of concerts; "The greatest singers in Germany," answered Mendelssohn, "are Miss Clara Novello and Mrs. Alfred Shaw." The very great merit of the latter lady is as well remembered as her loss to the public is regretted: the former is still, and will be till November next, before the world; and her powers and the popular appreciation of them have constantly increased, from the time when Mendelssohn so spoke of her until now that she is about to leave us.

From Leipsic she proceeded to other German cities, and carried her success with her wherever she sped. In Berlin she was received with remarkable favour, and so especially pleased the King of Prussia that he gave her letters in his own hand to his sister the Empress of Russia; upon the strength of which valuable introduction Miss Clara Novello visited Petersburg.

It would seem that Apollo, as if to make up to the dwellers in the frozen North for his scanty allowance of warmth and of light, had gifted them more freely in comparison with the other domain of his godship, endowing them with an extraordinary love of music, or at least—what is perhaps of equal importance to the advancement of the art—an extraordinary liberality in paying for it. There is no place on which the sun shines where musical executants are so warmly welcomed or so munificently remunerated as in the Muscovite capital; and there is no singer who has more fully proved the Petersburg power of patronage than Miss Clara Novello. We may refer to any of the records of the roubles that have been showered upon each and every of the singers and players who have exercised their ability in the North-Eastern Empire for testimony of the openhandedness of the princes and nobles of the land reviled for its despotism: let them read this testimony, and let them understand that neither the praise nor the pay lavished on the most fortunate of others were withheld in the case of Miss Clara Novello.

From Petersburg, with its shining honours thick upon her, she returned to London to resume her career of triumphs, which seemed to flow with still greater force than before, as though in consequence of its interruption by her absence abroad. She sang here for a season at all the principal musical performances, and then went with her father and her brother to Bologna, to consult Rossini as to the desirability of her devoting herself to a yet untried branch of her profession, the art of dramatic singing. The great master was delighted with her voice and charmed with her talent; he earnestly encouraged her inclination to go on the stage, but advised her that she must go through a course of special instruction to fit her for the new artistic character she purposed to assume. Accordingly she went to Milan, where she became the pupil of Micheron, the master of the greatest theatrical singers of the day, and applied herself to diligent study under his teaching for an entire year. It was no little act of forbearance to retire from the admiration her every performance elicited, and to seclude herself from the opportunities of applause for so long a period; but self-reliance gave her confidence in still greater success when she should become qualified to be a candidate for it, and this was amply sufficient to compensate her for leaving thus long unculled the laurels which she knew were everywhere ready for her to gather. She was well repaid for all she denied herself in this year of study, by the result. On her re-appearance in public, she entered upon a new course of success that exceeded all she had previously achieved.

ORGAN.

THE church of St. Michael, Cornhill, one of the oldest and richest churches in the City of London, has recently been re-opened, after the employment of an amount of decoration which renders it scarcely second to any church in the metropolis for internal beauty. The ornamenting of the interior, which is far too elaborate to admit of our entering into a description thereof, has been accomplished under the direction of the architects, Mr. Gilbert Scott and Mr. Herbert Williams: and the wood-carving, which is extensive and of a most interesting kind, has been done by Mr. W. G. Rogers, wood-carver to Her Majesty.

The Drapers' Company, the Merchant Tailors, and the Cloth-workers' Company have interest in this church, the first of these being the patrons of the benefice. Special pews are assigned to them, with appropriate carvings and emblazonments; there is also a royal pew, a diocesan, and a city or corporation pew.

A peculiar legend, relating to a Satanic visit paid to the belfry of this church, is mentioned in Honest John Stow's Survey of London:—"Upon St. James's night certaine men in the loft next under the bells, ringing of a peale, a tempest of thunder and lightning did arise, and an ugly shapen sight appeared to them coming in at the south window, and lighted on the north, for feare thereof, they all fell downe and lay as dead for the time, letting the bells ring and cease of their own accord. When the ringers came to themselves, they found certaine stones of the north window to be razed and scrat, as if they had been so much butter printed with a lion's claw, the same stones were fastened there again, and so remain to this day; I have seen them oft, and have put a feather or small stick into the holes where the clawes had entered three or four inches deep." An embodiment of this tradition appears in wood carving on one of the pews.

A musically interesting fact appears amongst the scraps which have been published respecting the church and the Companies connected with it, being neither more nor less than a record of the production, for the first time, of our National Anthem, at an entertainment given by the Merchant Tailors' Company to King James and Prince Henry on the 16th of July, 1696.

The organ at this church is now one of the most powerful, effective, and complete in London. A liberal grant of the Vestry has provided for its reconstruction by the builder, Mr. Thomas Robson, under the direction of Mr. Limpus, organist of the church. That it possesses all the points necessary to constitute a really grand organ, may be seen by the following list of stops, &c.:—

GREAT ORGAN, CC to G.

TREMULANT.

Every stop in the great organ is complete, and the only exceptions in the other parts are the viol di gamba and cremona in the choir, and the dulciana in the swell, which stop at C. There would have been no advantage in the actual completion of these stops, therefore the instrument must be mentioned as a commendable instance of conscientious building. The full power of the instrument, with its 12 ranks of mixture and its plentiful reed-work—2 of 4 feet, three of 8 feet, and 1 of 16 feet—is very grand. The pungency of the German gamba in the great organ is remarkable. The foundation tone of an organ is always wonderfully strengthened by a stop of this description, and it ought to find a place in every large instrument. The quality of the choir organ stops is unexceptionable, and there is sufficient variety for numerous and happy combinations. The swell is particularly effective. Great weight is of course gained by the double reed and the double stopped diapason, while the presence of two stops of 2ft. pitch, of different qualities, and indeed different material—the piccolo being of wood and the 15th of metal—imparts a singular brilliancy to this portion of the instrument. Taking the stops singly, we found the horn rather coarse, but this is the only objection we can urge. There are 3 composition pedals to the great organ, and 2 to the swell. The tremulant pedal is conveniently placed, and can be pressed by the same foot that is employed on the swell pedal, and simultaneously, which is a considerable advantage.

We are not in possession of the date of the original organ, or of the particulars of its construction; but both Green and Harris appear to have had a share in it, as a small portion of their work remains. The great organ clarion is made out of the old trumpet of Harris's; the principal, and 15th, and part of the open diapason are Green's. The 15th in the choir is also Green's, and the same builder claims part of the flute and stopped diapason. The principal is Harris's.

The case—designed by Robson, we believe—is exceedingly handsome. It is of massive oak; and each front (chancel and north aisle) has a buttress in the centre, a simple but in this instance most felicitous arrangement. The pipes are beautifully and not too gaudily decorated. Private performances have been recently given at the church, the powers and capabilities of the instrument being displayed by Mr. Limpus, Mr. Henry Gadsby, Mr. George Lake, and others.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

The Huguenots was performed on Saturday, for the first time this season. The cast, unusually strong, was as follows:—Mlle. Titiens, Valentina; Mlle. Louise Michal, Marguerite; Mad. Borghi-Mamo, Urbano; Signor Giuglini, Raoul; Signor Everardi, Nevers; M. Gassier, St. Bris; and Signor Vialetti, Marcel. Mlle. Michal, who made her appearance on the stage in this country, was eminently successful; Mad. Borghi-Mamo won golden opinions by her finished singing and graceful acting in the Page; Mlle. Titiens was more magnificent than ever in Valentina; Signor Giuglini excellent in Raoul; Signor Everardi one of the best Nevers we have seen; M. Gassier was admirable in St. Bris; and Signor Vialetti very effective in Marcel. The band and chorus left nothing to be desired. The house was crammed to the ceiling.

On Tuesday, Mlle. Lotti made her first appearance at Her Majesty's Theatre as Elvira in Ernani, and pleased greatly by the quality of her voice and her energetic singing. Signor Mongini was the hero, and Signor Aldighieri the king. A new basso, Signor Antonucci (not mentioned in the prospectus), made his first appearance in this country as Silva. Having a cold, however, he gave little indication of the talent we are assured he possesses.

On Thursday Il Trovatore attracted an immense audience. After the opera a new ballet, entitled Adelina, was produced for Mlle. Claudina Cucchi, whose name has figured in the bills for some time past. The new danseuse is agile and muscular, and achieved an undeniable success. The ballet is got up with considerable taste, the grouping in the last scene being especially effective.

On Tuesday, the new buffo, Signor Ciampi, makes his first appearance as Dr. Bartolo.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

On Saturday La Favorita was repeated.

On Tuesday, the Huguenots, for the first time this season, with two important changes in the cast—Mad. Miolan Carvalho being substituted for Mlle. Marai in the character of Marguerite di Valois, and M. Faure for Signor Polonini in the character of St. Bris. Mad. Miolan Carvalho was as successful in Marguerite as in Dinorah. Meyerbeer's music is sympathetic to this lady, who seems to revel in the florid divisions and brilliant passages of the illustrious master. Indeed, we never heard the aria d' intrata, as the Athenæum would say, nor the duet with Raoul, sung with greater fluency and ease. M. Faure both acted and sang in St. Bris like a real artist. The scene with the conspirators was extremely telling. If we had space we could write an essay on Signor Mario's Raoul, but not having space we can only say it was transcendent. Mad. Grisi's Valentina is one of her grandest performances, even though the music does not always suit her. Mad. Didiée was the Page; and the other characters were sustained as before. The band was superb, and the chorus thoroughly efficient.

On Thursday the second act of Fidelio and Norma were announced, but were postponed in consequence of the illness of M. Zelger, and La Gazza Ladra substituted.

Letters to the Editor.

SCHOOL OF VIOLIN PLAYING.

Sir,—You would oblige every well-disposed violin player in reminding music publishers that, as the modern treatment on the violin is, or will happily be soon, exhausted, it would be advisable to republish some of the works of Corelli, Lully, Tartini, Viotti, Kreutzer, Rode, &c., which at present are difficult to obtain.

I am, Sir, yours,
Leo Kerbusch.

TONIC SOL-FA.

Sir,—It is with the greatest pleasure that I add my testimony to that of Mr. Bowley, chronicled in your last week's impression, touching the musical success of the recent "exhibition" by the Tonic Sol-Fa Association. The precision, singing in tune, and light and shade, were maintained in a most masterly manner throughout. Certain minor peculiarities—the result of perhaps too much zeal, or love of effects, on the part of the two most worthy conductors—excepted, the performance surpassed anything I ever heard, either here or in the land of song—Germany.

I was ashamed to have to acknowledge an utter ignorance as regards the details of the system. Since, however, I heard the glorious results, I have applied myself vigorously to the study of its principles, for I consider it is the solemn duty of every one to whom is entrusted the mental training of the rising generation, to find out the best, the very best means to the end, and having found them, to apply them in the simplest and most practical form.

Yours, &c.
Brighton, June 6, 1860. John Towers.

THE OPERA AT SYDENHAM.

(From Punch.)

Unthinking people may, perhaps, be startled by this heading, and may imagine that "Her Majesty's" has been transplanted near to Norwood, after the manner of the flying Palace of Aladdin. But the removal of an opera is possible without the removal of a theatre, and so Rossini and Mozart may migrate weekly down to Sydenham without having, like snails, to carry their house with them. Il Trovatore and Otello may start off arm-in-arm with Lucrezia and Fidelio, and their music may be heard where the orange-trees of Paxton by no means waste their sweetness on the seldom desert air.

In plainer words, the Opera Concerts at the Crystal Palace are a means of giving vocalists a pleasant change of air, and of letting people hear the pleasant airs they bring with them. It is no new thing to hear an opera in a hot house; for thoroughly well ventilated as theatres may be, the way is not devised yet to prevent the gas from heating them. But an opera in a green house is a form of entertainment which, until the Crystal Palace came, we never had been treated to. Instead of dingy walls and a close and dusty atmosphere, we have there cool air to breathe and sweet flowers to smell and look at. Eyes and nose have equally a profit in the change; nor indeed are ears in any measure losers by it. The lark-notes of Alboni gush forth all the more joyously for being in fresh air, and Mongini sings the clearer when the fog and the smoke of London are no longer in his throat. Nor can we much regret the absence of stage-scenery, surrounded as we are by such delicious greenery: while, if we miss the acting, we have our minds more left at liberty to give heed to the singing, and so we easily may master our sorrow for the absence of the creations of Grieve and Telbin.

To fathers of a family, the Opera at Sydenham offers great advantages; for it enables them to take their wives and daughters to a concert without losing a good appetite by having to dine early, or else deranging their digestions by jumping up from table and jolting in a carriage, instead of sitting quietly over their dessert. Paterfamilias, when he hears the inevitable question, "My dear, when are you going to take the girls and me to hear Alboni?" will do well to reply "My love, I think we'll go next Friday." On which a chorus will arise from those well-informed young ladies, "Friday! Why, Papa dear, Friday's not an Opera night!" Whereto, in his wisdom, the Pater may rejoin, "No, my loves, but Friday is an Opera afternoon; and as young persons are advised to keep out of the night air, you would not wish Mamma or me to risk our precious health by exposing ourselves to it."

Opera-goers who dislike to turn out after dinner, should therefore pay a visit and a crown to the C. P., and they will have occasion to repent of neither payment. Good music is there to be heard in good society, and what more could the Haymarket habitué desire? It is said that it is possible to have too much of a good thing; but good music is a thing that we can hardly have too much of. Even if one could, there is very little fear of being surfeited at Sydenham; for the Crystal Palace Concerts are confined to such a length, that even people with short patience must often long for more of them.

MR. AND MRS. GERMAN REED'S ENTERTAINMENT. — Mr. John Parry, after a retirement of seven years from the scene of his many successes, reappeared on Monday evening at the benefit of Mr. and Mrs. German Reed. His return to the concert-room must be regarded as an event of no ordinary importance, and much credit is due to Mr. and Mrs. Reed for the manner in which they contrived to introduce him without giving rise to an impression that the original entertainment had been interfered with. Mr. Reed is seated at the pianoforte, fulfilling the task which is set down for him in Mr. W. Brough's entertainment, "Our Home Circuit," when he is interrupted by a voice outside singing "Ah che la morte," and suddenly he is surprised by the entry of a young artist, who is on a sketching tour. The artist proves to be his old friend John Parry, who takes part in the business of the scene, joining in a trio with Mr. and Mrs. Reed from Le Pré aux Clercs, and singing "Fayre Rosamonde," one of those récitations by which he gained his well-earned fame. That the John Parry of the present moment was the John Parry of days gone by was beyond all question. Every gesture he made was received with laughter. That power which he possesses of blending humorous verbal expression with musical effect was illustrated as forcibly as ever; and the scene which followed "Fayre Rosamonde," representing a volunteer march, suggested by the "Rataplan" from La Fille du Regiment, proved that his talent for entertaining an audience has in no way degenerated. The trio commence the march together, and each alternately keeps up the tune on the piano, whilst the others preserve the order of the manœuvre. This scene was as effective as it was novel, and the audience testified their delight by unanimously demanding an encore. We need only add that Mr. Parry's last contribution to it (in some amusing reminiscences of Il Barbiere di Siviglia) was as full of excellence as the first; and when the curtain fell, a most satisfactory impression prevailed that an old, though long-lost, friend had been restored to his proper place before the world, and that Mr. and Mrs. Reed had done wisely in making so valuable an addition to their already popular "Illustrations."

ENGLISH GLEE AND MADRIGAL UNION.—The taste for vocal exhibitions of the "drawing-room calibre" is on the wane, and is giving room to the more healthy concerted music of the English writers, which latter category comprises some of the most elegant compositions extant. The above-named association may claim a high position, possessing in its phalanx Miss Banks, always pure and simple in style, and never failing as to tune*; Mrs. Lockey, an admirable contralto; her husband, a tenore of great accomplishment; Mr. Foster, alto of the first class; Mr. Montem Smith, always capable and clever, but who lately has much improved; and to finish, Messrs. Thomas and Winn, two English basses of the genuine national breed. The programme of the first concert, on Wednesday afternoon, which was not like many other programmes—too long—comprised among others "Come see what pleasures," Elliott, beautifully sung, particularly as to the soprano; and "Shades of the heroes," T. Cooke, where the bass of Mr. Winn may have similar commendation; a four-part song by Mr. J. L. Hatton, "Sweetly blows the western wind;" "The silver swan," Gibbons; "Let me careless," T. Linley; and "Here in cool grot," Mornington. The Gibbons and Mornington compositions, and "Under the greenwood tree," Bishop, were encored.

One instrumental piece only was given, duet for concertina and pianoforte, by Mr. Richard Blagrove and Mr. Harold Thomas. It is a pity, we think, that no vocal solos were in the programme. A song or two with obbligato accompaniments from Miss Banks or Mr. Thomas would have been very welcome to the audience. The absence of Mrs. Lockey, who was prevented by indisposition from appearing, was the only drawback to the performance, which took place in the new and elegant concert-room of Messrs. Collard and Collard.

THE MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—A Fellows' meeting for discussion was held at the Society's Rooms, St. James's Hall, on Wednesday evening, the 6th inst., at which the Rev. Sir William Henry Cone, Bart., presided. Mr. Duggan proposed the following question for discussion: "What is the Tendency or Aim of Modern Composition?" Several fellows took part in the discussion, after which, Mr. Charles Salaman, the honorary secretary, read a Paper on "The Intimate Connection of the Dance with Music in Ancient Times." A vote of thanks was given to Mr. Charles Salaman for preparing and reading the paper, with the hope that the subject would be continued by him at a future meeting.

UNMUSICAL POETS.—Pope, though so musical a poet, had no ear for music: the same is reported of Swift; but the strongest instance is found in Garrick; it is an undoubted fact that he had no ear. This seems to decide the question at once, for it was universally allowed that no one ever possessed the tones of speaking in a superior degree to this man. I could much strengthen what has been advanced by many other instances, but my proof must rest on Garrick, in whom no defect of tones could ever be discovered. Perhaps the mistake may have arisen from using the same terms in poetry, oratory, and music: as ear (that is the discrimination of intervals) is absolutely necessary in music, so it has been supposed essential to poetry and oratory; and this is not the only instance of confusion arising from the wrong application of terms.—Ancient Leaf.

LEEDS TOWN-HALL ORGANISTSHIP. — Last Monday the committee decided to invite the following eminent organists to act as umpires at the contest for the organistship at the Leeds Town-Hall:—Mr. Best, Liverpool; Mr. Goss, St. Paul's, London; and Mr. George Cooper, Chapel Royal, London. The trial-day is not yet fixed, but as the seven candidates are each to be allowed fifteen hours practice, the contest can scarcely take place before the end of this month.

VIVIER AND ALBONI.—One evening, after a performance of the Barbiere, Vivier—who is not given to pay compliments—stepped out of his usual indifference, to pay one to Alboni, which (Vivier's compliments being as original as his bons mots) was equally original and expressive: "Je voudrais bien, Mademoiselle," he said, "que vous fissiez, de ci et là, quelques petites notes fausses. Vous chantez tout avec une telle perfection que celà ne me fait aucun effet; il me manque un peu de mauvais, pour fair sortir vos admirables qualités. Une seule note douteuse, je vous prie de grace, de temps en temps." But Vivier remonstrated in vain.

AN ANAGRAM.

Pantagruel.—I am trying to find an anagram for Messina, significant of the present condition of affairs.

Panurge.—In a mess.

* As we pen the last remark we cannot but remember how many otherwise talented vocalists are wanting in this important qualification.

The Musical World.

LONDON: SATURDAY, JUNE 9, 1860.

WE think we may take it upon ourselves to reassure Mr. Punch on a matter which, judging by an article in his last week's impression, he seems to take much to heart. We allude to the festival of the metropolitan charity children, held on Wednesday last in the Crystal Palace, against which our usually philosophic brother, whose placidity on most debated questions (the "debates" excepted) is notorious, delivers himself of a vehement protest.

"Rumoured sacrilegious project. — We hear, with horror, indignation, rage, and fury, that it is intended to transfer the annual festival of the charity children of London this year from St. Paul's to the Crystal Palace. We do hope that there is some mistake in the information which we have received to that effect. The yearly chorus of the little girls and boys under the great dome of St. Paul's is an institution of the country, as well as one of the finest of the established phenomena of London. We are old enough to remember the coronation of Her Majesty, and we feel now what we should have felt then if the Crystal Palace had been in existence, and a set of insensate innovators had proposed to shunt the royal solemnity to that place of amusement from Westminster Abbey. Transfer the children's festival to the Crystal Palace! Remove the Lord Mayor's show to Astley's. Banish the Rotten Row cavalcade to Victoria Park. Have the Derby run on Wormholt Scrubbs. Let the House of Lords adjourn to the Coal-Hole!"

That the information received by Mr. Punch was (as is invariably the case) authentic, was shown on the very day when the eloquence of his indignation revealed itself in type. On that day, 4000 of the children were singing "All people that on earth do dwell," in the great Handel orchestra of the central transept. Nay, at the very hour while this was taking place, some thousands out of the 20,000 who came to hear them sing had Punch in their pockets. These were able to read (p. 230) the fervently expressed hope of Mr. Punch—who is never misinformed—that, in this particular instance, he may have been misinformed, to the familiar tune of the "Old Hundredth," which proved, beyond the possibility of doubt, that all our contemporary's worst fears were realised. For our own parts, aware that the causes which prevented the usual demonstration taking place this year in St. Paul's Cathedral would be only temporary, and that in 1861 (D.V.) we should again listen to "All people that on earth do dwell," under that dome which canopies the immortality of Wren, we had no inquietude in the matter. The ire of Mr. Punch is therefore superfluous, and the eloquence wasted of his concluding paragraph, which, nevertheless, to show how utterly unfounded are his apprehensions, it is necessary to cite:—

"Who could have the heart, that is the want of heart, to think of destroying a tradition so venerable? We should say that John Bright was at the bottom of the subversive proposal, had we not reason to believe that John has music in his soul, notwithstanding that he sometimes talks like one that has none. Such an one was the author of the abominable scheme on which we are now invoking public execration; and we should like to punish him and all his abettors by compelling him to hear Handel's Hallelujah Chorus executed on the grandest scale in St. Paul's Cathedral every day for six months. The Crystal Palace is a very proper place to take the children to for a holiday. By all means let them be taken thither after church for a treat, which, by considerable amendment in the victualling department, they may have there. Or give them two festivals, and let them repeat at the palace what they sang in the cathedral. But spoil not a spectacle and a concert, which, even to the veriest Cockneys, imparts a delight which they seem to share in fellowship with angels. The annual assembly and song of the innocents in St. Paul's was a fact that we learned together with the fiction that London was paved with gold. Another place is paved with the best intentions of the dolts who design to remove that hallowed celebration to the Crystal Palace."

Mr. Punch will perhaps be appeased when we inform him that neither John Bright nor any other revolutionary firebrand has thought of destroying "a tradition so venerable." The simple fact is, that the interior of St. Paul's is not at present in a condition to allow of the annual festival to be held as usual. But this state of things will not last, nor the metropolis be deprived of one of its "finest established phenomena." Of this our contemporary may rest assured.

On the other hand, the holiday provided for the children in the salubrious atmosphere of the Crystal Palace and grounds is quite a distinct affair from the anniversary meeting in St. Paul's. As the palace is not a cathedral so their voices are not enlisted for a cathedral service; and though the music given them to sing is all to words of a sacred character it forms no part of an act of worship. Moreover (which Mr. Punch—though, of course, not uninformed of the fact—may have forgotten), the meeting of Wednesday had already been preceded by two others in the same cheerful locality, and it is hoped the children may be invited to congregate there at least once a year. Why should one interfere with the other? Why should the anniversary in the Church of Stone preclude the annual recreation in the Palace of Glass? One thing is unquestionable, viz.—that the children derive far more genuine enjoyment, and their health and spirits far more real benefit, from the last, however the first may present a more unique and impressive spectacle to indifferent lookers on. The ceremony in St. Paul's, it should be understood, was never intended in the light of a "spectacle" or a "concert." Let there be then always henceforth (as Mr. Punch humanely suggests) "two festivals," one in London, the other in the country; but by no means let the children "repeat at the palace what they have sung at the cathedral," for we are much in error if, in a strictly musical sense, they might not be better employed both for their own profit and the edification of their audience.

IF the spread of musical knowledge only kept pace with the increase in the number of our musical entertainments, England would be fast becoming the most musical country in the world. Enough morning concerts are now given in London (every afternoon) to entertain, or, to say the least, occupy, the amateurs of any other capital, morning, noon, and night. Then there are the evening concerts, of which some ten or twelve take place hebdomadally; and, in addition to all this mixed musical provender, sufficient in itself to give a musical indigestion, there are from six to nine grand operatic banquets every week, at which the public are invited, and what is more, actually expected, to attend. People sometimes express their astonishment that when, according to general report, one Italian Opera could never be carried on in London with anything like uniform success, there were found singers, subscribers, and other speculators sufficiently enterprising to start a second. It is true the managers of the second Italian Opera did not stipulate for the continued existence of the first, nor (as we imagine) did they even take into their calculations the possibility of its lasting; but the general body of the public, which includes few critics and connoisseurs, saw one thing only in the change which had taken place in operatic affairs—the impossibility of two operas prospering when a single one had never succeeded. With such considerations as these, the "general public" need not perhaps trouble themselves; but they are, of course, interested in the effect of managerial rivalry upon the performances, and this has not been quite so satisfactory as the admirers of competition in all things may believe.

When Mr. Lumley ascended the directorial throne at Her Majesty Theatre, it was the custom to give two operatic representations a week, and no more. Thus there was plenty of time for rehearsals in the intervals between the performances, and the same singers could sing every opera-night for weeks together, as often happened, without being fatigued. The manager engaged one complete company, and, now and then, a star which had wandered from its natural orbit, and had reached London. Otherwise the subscribers found it sufficient variety to hear one night Grisi and another Persiani, one night Rubini and another Mario — at that time a lighter and a thinner tenor than he is now. We like variety ourselves when the change is from good to good; but when it is from the tolerable to the tolerable, with an occasional taste of the intolerable, we naturally object to it, and therefore object to the plan on which both Her Majesty's Theatre and the Royal Italian Opera are at present conducted, tending, as in our opinion it does, to the very unpleasant alternative just mentioned.

Let us explain. Formerly, as we have said, two operatic performances a week sufficed for all London. The singers were not overworked; the habituées who made a point of not missing a single performance (to say nothing of the critics) were not bored; and the manager, if he did ruin himself, at least did so more agreeably than the managers of the present day, who have three and often four performances a week to attend to instead of two. Mr. Lumley was the first to depart from the twice-a-week system. He it was who introduced what The Times used to call "long Thursdays," and which were so long that they usually finished on Fridays. At first the Thursday performance was like a Saturday's dinner at a boarding school, consisting of all kinds of scraps and fragments; but when the Royal Italian Opera was opened, Thursday had become accepted as a regular operatic day: it was included in the subscription, and was honoured at the new theatre with an entertainment as good as that of Tuesday or Saturday.

Byron, speaking of Scott's inventive power, remarked, that after introducing a new form in poetry, by the publication of his "Tales in Verse," he introduced a new form in prose with the "Waverley Novels;" and added, that if readers had got tired of the "Waverley Novels," Scott would have thought of some other new form in which to address them. With similar felicity Mr. Lumley, after there had ceased to be anything remarkable in his "long Thursdays," straightway invented "interminable Mondays;" and the ingenious Mr. E. T. Smith has not only adopted the Monday notion from his predecessor, but has himself introduced what are already beginning to be known as "intolerable Wednesdays and Fridays."

As a manager pays the same rent whether he gives two, three, or even six performances in the week, it is easy to see that on extra nights he gets the use of the theatre as it were for nothing. But the singers do not sing nor the musicians play for nothing; nor is it possible to increase the number of opera-goers proportionably with the number of operatic representations. It appears to us that the managers must lose in the end by these extra Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays; and we are sure that they are hurtful to the singers and musicians. Principal vocalists, as we are aware, are seldom called upon to sing several nights in the week (though Giuglini sang so often last year at Drury Lane that he to some extent injured his voice); but the orchestra and chorus are the same at each performance, and they must be, and evidently are, wearied by the onerous duties at present imposed upon them.

The effect of these perpetual extra nights is, that there is no time to get up the operas properly, and that when they are produced the performers are too tired to do justice to the music or to themselves. The system is equally unfair to the artists and to the public, for music misrendered is not music at all, but only formalized noise. How is it possible that such a system can in the long run benefit the managers?

Concerts.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The fourth concert of the season took place on Monday evening, "by command," and was honoured by the presence of Her Majesty and the Prince Consort, the King of the Belgians, and the Princesses Alice and Helena. The royal party entered the Hanover Square Rooms shortly after eight o'clock, and the National Anthem was played by the band, both on the arrival and departure of the illustrious visitors. The programme, although it included two symphonies—namely, the so-called Italian of Mendelssohn, and the Eroica of Beethoven—(both finely executed under the able direction of Professor Bennett), was much shorter than usual, and included but one novelty—the first appearance at these time-honoured concerts of Mlle. Artôt, a young French singer of remarkable merit, possessing a very fine voice, and much musical feeling of the best kind. Mlle. Artôt sang the intensely dramatic "Ah mon fils" of Meyerbeer, and the divine air "Deh vieni non tardar," from Mozart's Nozze di Figaro, and in both instances met with well-merited success. The other pieces in the programme were the fine overtures to the Ruler of the Spirits and Ruy Blas, to each of which ample justice was done by the unsurpassable band of the Philharmonic Society. The rooms were crowded.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—The programme of the twenty-fourth concert, last Monday, was selected from the works of various masters. The instrumental pieces were—quartet in G major (Op. 61), Dussek; Sonata Apassionata, Beethoven; quartet in E minor (Op. 44), Mendelssohn; a trio in F (No. 2), Spohr. Of these Mendelssohn's magnificent quartet—introduced by general desire—created the greatest effect. Dussek's quartet was played for the first time at the Monday Popular Concerts, and was quite as successful as its companion in E flat, introduced by the directors on a previous occasion. The one in B flat (No. 2) will doubtless come next; and this will exhaust the string-quartet repertory of this master. Herr Lubeck was recalled after the sonata of Beethoven, which he played in his accustomed style. The players in the quartets were M. Sainton, Herr Goffrie, Mr. Doyle, and Signor Piatti, whose performance in both instances merit the highest praise. Spohr's trio did not go well. The singers were Mlle. Jenny Meyer (who has a lovely mezzo-soprano), encored in Gluck's "Che faro," which, as also Schubert's "Ungeduld," she sang with the utmost purity of expression; Herr Hermanns, a young German singer, with a superb bass-voice and great declamatory power, who was encored in two songs "An dem sturm," (Carl Evers), and "Falstaff's song" (from Otto Nicolai's Merry Wives of Windsor), for which he substituted "In diesen heilegen hallen" (Die Zauberflöte); and last not least Mr. Sims Reeves, who was encored in Mr. Howard Glover's exquisitely beautiful setting of Shelley's "I arise from dreams of thee," and in Rossini's "Gita in Gondola" (soirées), accepting the compliment in the first instance and courteously declining it in the last, both songs being given to perfection. Mr. Benedict accompanied the vocal music with masterly skill. Although this was the twenty-fourth concert of the second season, St. James's Hall was crowded in every part. And yet some will insist that "the people" don't like good music.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—By far the finest performance of Mendelssohn's Elijah that has been heard for a long time was given last week at Exeter Hall, before one of the most densely crowded audiences we remember. Indeed so great was the demand for places that the Society have found it advisable to announce a repetition of the oratorio, although this was intended to be the last of the season, and Elijah will consequently be heard again on Friday, the 22nd instant. Lately we had occasion to comment on its performance, by 3000 performers, at the Crystal Palace, when, owing to acoustic difficulties, impossible to overcome, much of the effect was lost. At Exeter Hall, however, it is a different thing; the 700 are quite sufficient (more than sufficient as far as the brass is concerned) to carry out the intentions of the composer, and every note is distinctly heard, not only of the vocal, but the instrumental parts, which is absolutely necessary to a proper understanding of the work. The principal soloists were Miss Parepa, Mad. Sainton-Dolby, Miss Palmer, Mrs. F. Lucas, Messrs. Sims Reeves, Santley, and Patey. The first-named lady sang the soprano music with energy and expression throughout, especially distinguishing herself in the opening air of the 2nd Part, "Hear ye Israel." Mad. Sainton-Dolby is so thoroughly at home in this, as in all other oratorios, that criticism would be superfluous. Suffice it to say then that she was compelled to repeat the air, "O rest in the Lord." Miss Palmer was heard to decided advantage in the recitative, "Now Cherith's brook," and the air, "Woe unto them," both given expressively and energetically. Of Mr. Sims Reeves's singing in this work we have had frequent occasion to speak in the highest terms, and have nothing but unreserved praise to award upon this occasion; the two airs, "If with all your hearts," and "Then shall the righteous," being of course the most salient points; the latter so admirably rendered that it would have been ungracious to resist the very enthusiastic demand for its repetition. Upon Mr. Santley devolved the arduous rôle of the prophet, which he sustained in a manner that will considerably add to his reputation as one of the purest and most legitimate vocalists of the day. The band and chorus acquitted themselves à merveille, and with one exception (the Baal chorus) were more in accordance with the times indicated by the composer. It only remained for Mr. Costa to alter the exception, and the performance of Elijah would have been irreproachable.

THE CHARITY SCHOOLS AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE. — The entertainment given on Wednesday by the children of the Metropolitan Charity Schools, was partly in consequence of the Annual Meeting at St. Paul's Cathedral being prevented taking place this year on account of the repairs now being made in the interior of the building, and partly because the friends of the children were desirous to give them a holiday, and repeat the festivals of 1858-9, which were found so eminently successful. No less than forty-six schools sent their juvenile choirs, and the whole force amounted to nearly 4,000. Mr. G. W. Martin, to whose beat the children are familiar (and who has succeeded to the position vacated by Mr. Bates), conducted; Mr. James Coward presided at the organ; Mr. T. Harper was first trumpet; while, to strengthen the accompaniments (which some of the pieces in the programme required), there were a second trumpet, two horns, four trombones, and the gigantic drum played by Mr. Chipp. The following was the selection:—"The Old Hundredth Psalm;" Chorus, "Lord of Heaven and Earth" (Haydn); Chorale, "Come, sound his praise abroad" (G. W. Martin); Chant, "O sing unto the Lord"; Chorale, "Martin Luther's Hymn"; "Hosanna," for three trebles (G. W. Martin); "God and King of Jacob's Nation" (Costa); Chorale, "God that madest earth and heaven" (T. B. Southgate); Psalm, "O praise ye the Lord"; Chorale from St. Paul, "Sleepers awake" (Mendelssohn); and "God save the Queen." The performance on the whole was most admirable, more especially in the unison pieces, in which the singers felt no timidity, and sang with their hearts as well as their voices. There were three encores—the Chorale, "Come, sound his praise abroad," the "Hosanna" for three trebles (both by Mr. Martin), and the Chorale from St. Paul, "Sleepers awake." At the end of the Concert, when the National Anthem had been sung, there was a tremendous demonstration on the part of the singers as well as the audience. First the audience clapped their hands sore, and then the children roared themselves hoarse, and then both joined issue and screamed and applauded in unison, until fairly wearied, the juveniles holding out the longest. At last the schools retired from the orchestra in military order, and were soon seen swarming over the terraces and walks, where the Upper Fountains were made to play for their gratification; and here we must leave them, having no doubt that they enjoyed themselves heartily, and went home happier than princes, potentates, or members of the House of Commons.

MR. J. L. HATTON'S CONCERT on Wednesday attracted one of the most crowded audiences we have seen this year at St. James's Hall. The fact that money was returned, and that numbers were sent away from the doors, is strong evidence of Mr. Hatton's popularity. With the exception of Mendelssohn's trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, played, need we say, to perfection by Miss Arabella Goddard, M. Sainton, and Signor Piatti, and a solo on the violin by M. Sainton, the entire programme was vocal. From eighteen pieces, sung by twenty-one artists—strange proportion!—we can only select for special notice, Mr. Hatton's songs, "It was fifty years ago," sung by Mad. Sainton-Dolby, and loudly encored; "Sweet Love, good night to thee" (first time of performance), sung by Mr. Sims Reeves, uproariously redemanded; "Good-bye, Sweetheart," by Mr. Sims Reeves, also sung twice; and "The Bird of Song," by Mrs. Weiss; Beethoven's "Adelaida," by Mr. Sims Reeves (accompanied on the pianoforte by Miss Arabella Goddard), who only bowed in acknowledgment of the encore; and, "Pray, Good, please," by Miss Poole. Other songs and ballads, the composition of Mr. Hatton, were allotted to Miss Parepa, Mrs. Sims Reeves, Mad. Sainton-Dolby, and Mr. Santley. The English Glee and Madrigal Union were announced, but arrived too late to sing, and Mr. Hatton, as a compensation to the audience, gave "The Little Fat Grey Man." Miss Palmer, too, whose name figured in the programme, was not forthcoming.

Mad. Rieder's Matinée (May 28), at Campden House, Kensington, was remarkable for the second part being devoted to the performance of M. Victor Masse's one-act operetta, Les Noces da Jeannette, the characters of Jeannette and Jean being sustained by Mad. Rieder and M. de Fontanieu. The representation took place in the handsome little theatre belonging to Mr. Wolley's splendid mansion, which was crowded with a brilliant assemblage of rank and fashion. Mad. Rieder's facile execution and neat style are well suited to M. Victor Masse's music, which, if trifling, is pleasing. In the first or miscellaneous part, in addition to the bénéficiaire and M. de Fontanieu, Miss Augusta Thompson, Miss Lascelles, and Signor Oliva sang; and Mlle. Fanny Rubini and Mr. Lindsay Sloper (pianists), Herr Becker (violin), Mr. Sidney Pratten (flute), and M. Paque (violoncello), performed on their several instruments. The conductors numbered Herr Wilhelm Ganz, M. Lauben, Herr S. Leymeyer, and Mr. W. G. Cusins.

Mr. Melchor Winter and Mr. Benjamin Wells—tenor and flautist respectively—gave a concert at the Hanover Rooms on Monday evening, assisted by Mad. Weiss, Miss Mahlah Homer, Miss Chipperfield, Miss Clarissa Crighton, and Mad. Sainton-Dolby, vocalists; and Mr. F. Scotson Clark (harmonium), instrumentalist. The programme offered no particular feature. Mr. Winter sang Mr. Wallace's "Home of my heart," Lutz's "Under the Linden Tree," and "The Death of Nelson," besides joining Madame Sainton-Dolby in Mercadante's "Di conforto," and taking part in the quartet, "Un di si ben," from Rigoletto. Mr. Wells, a capital flautist, executed two solos of his own composition. Mad. Sainton-Dolby introduced a new song "The Skipper and his Boy," which she sang with great effect. Herr Wilhelm Ganz conducted.

Mr. Allan Irving's Morning Concert (May 29th), at the Hanover Rooms, was above the average order. Beethoven's trio in C minor (op. 11) for piano, violin, and violoncello, was well performed by Mr. Charles Salaman, Herr Ries, and Herr Lidel. Mr. Salaman also played Handel's air, with variations, in D minor, and his own rondo in B flat. Mr. Irving was assisted in the vocal department by Mad. Rudersdorff, Miss Eyles, Mad. Louisa Vinning, Mad. Laura Baxter, and Mr. George Perren. Mr. Frederick Chatterton executed a fantasia on the harp, and Herr Engel a solo on the harmonium. Mr. Frank Mori and Herr Wilhelm Ganz were the conductors.

Miss Palmer's Concert was given at St. Martin's Hall, on Thursday evening week. Miss Palmer is a great favourite, more particularly in this locality,—and no wonder! St. Martin's Hall was crowded in spite of the inclement weather. The fair contralto—who was assisted by Mlle. Parepa, Miss Mina Poole, Mr. Wilbye Cooper, and Mr. Thomas, vocalists; Mr. Charles Halle and Mr. George Collins (violoncello) instrumentalists—sang seven times, was applauded uproariously after each performance, and encored twice—viz., in a new song, composed for her by Mr. J. L. Hatton, "The Sailor's Wife," and in Mr. Balfe's duet, "The Sailor sighs," which she sang with Mr. Wilbye Cooper. Mlle. Parepa introduced the "shadow song" from Dinorah, "My mother bids me bind my hair," and M. Clapisson's "Alouette," the last being encored. Mr. Wilbye Cooper and Mr. Thomas, in sundry popular airs, contributed to the gratification of the audience. Mr. Charles Hallé performed one of Beethoven's sonatas, Op. 27, a nocturne by Chopin, and a valse caprice by Schubert and Liszt, in his most brilliant manner, and with immense effect.

The Annual Concert of Miss Fanny Huddart (Friday, May 25) took place at St. Martin's Hall. The selection was good, though too long. The instrumental feature was M. Sainton's admirable performance of his own fantasia on Lucrezia Borgia. The vocal pieces offered no novelty, excepting a rondo valse, sung by Mad. Catharine Hayes. The quartet from Lurline, "Though the world with transport bless thee," sung by Mad. Rudersdorff, Miss Fanny Huddart, Mr. Allan Irving, and Mr. Patey, was a first-rate performance. Mad. Valckemaere Albertazzi (a daughter, we believe, of the late Mad. Albertazzi) sang Adolph Adams' "Le retour à la montagne," and, with Mr. Allan Irving, the duet, "La ci darem;" exhibiting a pleasing and well-regulated voice. Miss Huddart's share of the programme comprised the cavatina, "Mille volte," from Donizetti's Pia di Tolomei, Mr. Hullah's new ballad, "The Mother's Song," and Mr. Wallace's ballad, "Old friends and other days," all extremely well sung, and the last eliciting an unanimous encore.

Miss Helen M'Leod's Concert was held at the Hanover Rooms, on Tuesday evening. This young lady—a soprano, with a pleasing voice and agreeable style, new to the concert-room—sang "The Last Rose of Summer," and "Una voce," besides taking a share in two duets, a quartet, and a part-song. Miss M'Leod, being encored in the cavatina from the Barbiere, substituted "Charlie is my darling." The same compliment was paid her in a duet with Mlle. Behrens. Herr Herrmanns, the German bass, who the previous night had created so marked a sensation at the Monday Popular Concerts in St. James's Hall, again achieved a great success. He sang two songs, and was encored in one, viz., "Falstaff," from Otto Nicolai's Merry Wives of Windsor. Miss E. Wilkinson, Mr. Tennant, and Signor Ciabatta were the other singers; and Mr. George Osborne (pianoforte), Signor Piatti (violoncello), and Herr Oberthür (harp), were the solo instrumentalists. There was a numerous and fashionable assemblage, the concert being given under distinguished patronage.

The Matinée of Mr. Harold Thomas, the Pianist, on Monday, at Collard's pianoforte and concert-rooms, Grosvenor Street, calls for notice, as presenting in almost every respect an unexceptionable programme. The special pieces were Beethoven's quartet in E flat for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello (an arrangement of the quintet with wind instruments, Op. 16), and Mendelssohn's trio in D minor (Op. 49) for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, executed by Messrs. Harold Thomas, H. Blagrove, R. Blagrove, and Signor Pezze. Mr. Thomas also played several solo pieces of his own composition, and, with Signor Pezze, the "Moonlight scene" from M. Gounod's Nonne Sanglante, transcribed for pianoforte and violoncello. Miss Augusta Thomson, Miss Poole, Mr. Wilbye Cooper, and Mr. Santley were the singers. A selection was given from Professor Bennett's May Queen, accompanied on the pianoforte by the composer, and comprising—song "O meadow clad in early green," sung by Mr. Wilbye Cooper; song, "'Tis jolly to hunt," by Mr. Santley; and trio, "The hawthorn in the glade," by Miss Poole, Messrs. Wilbye Cooper and Santley. Praise may be awarded to Mr. Thomas's song to Tennyson's words, "Wind of the western sea," which was charmingly given by Miss Poole. Mr. Lindsay Sloper and Mr. W. G. Cusins were the conductors.

Madame Laura Baxter recently gave an attractive concert, when the list of executants included the names of Mad. Catharine Hayes, Mad. Weiss, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. G. Perren, and Mr. Weiss; Mr. Blagrove, Herr Lidel, Miss Matilda Baxter, and Mr. S. Noble; Mr. Vincent Wallace officiating as conductor. In the first part, Mayseder's trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, was admirably executed by Miss M. Baxter, Mr. Blagrove, and Herr Lidel; and in the duet, "La dove prende," Mr. and Mad. Weiss were deservedly applauded with more than ordinary warmth. The recitative and romanza, "Sombre Forêt," though not quite suited to Mad. Catherine Hayes, who was, moreover, suffering from a cold, was charmingly rendered. The aria and accompanying recitative, "Lascia ch' io pianga," were very effectively sung by Mad. Laura Baxter, who was no less warmly applauded in her interpretation, with Mad. Hayes, of "Quis est homo." Mr. Sims Reeves elicited, as usual, fervent applause by his singing of "Adelaida," and bowed his acknowledgment in return for the general encore; the first part was brought to an effective conclusion by a grand pianoforte duet, admirably played by Miss Baxter and Mr. Noble. The second part commenced with the trio, "Turn on, Old Time," by Mad. Laura Baxter, Mr. G. Perren, and Mr. Weiss. Mr. Sims Reeves achieved an encore by his expressive interpretation of Vincent Wallace's ballad, "Sweet Form," from Lurline, and gracefully responded to the demand for its repetition. A similar compliment was justly awarded to Mad. Laura Baxter in "The last Good Bye," by the same composer. The chief features of the remaining portion of the concert were the performance, by Mr. Reeves and Mad. Baxter, of the duet from Tancredi, "M' abbraccia;" Mr. G. Perren's rendering of the ballad, "The Old Green Lane;" and Miss M. Baxter's pianoforte solo, "Home, sweet home." The concert-room was crowded, and the entire entertainment passed off in the most satisfactory manner.

MR. AGUILAR'S CONCERT.—Mr. Aguilar, one of our very best native professors of music, gave his annual concert on Monday morning at the Hanover Square Rooms, which were crowded on the occasion by a most fashionable audience. Mr. Aguilar courted criticism in the two-fold character of composer and pianist, and in both completely vindicated his claim to the lofty position long ago conceded to him as one of the ablest musicians this country has produced. Mr. Aguilar's creative powers were strikingly exemplified in a trio for piano, violin, and violoncello; three songs, "The Appeal," "In a wood on a windy day," and a Reiter Lied; a fantasia upon Weber's (so called) "Last Waltz," and a sestet for piano, flute, oboe, clarionet, horn, and bassoon; whilst his ability as an executant was displayed with no less effect in his own compositions and the too rarely-heard sonata of Beethoven, each movement of which, illustrating respectively the sentiments (to use the French terms employed by the great German composer) of "Les Adieux," "L'Absence," and "Le Retour," demands the soul of a poet and the hand of a master. Mr. Aguilar's admirable trio has already been criticised in these columns, but his sestet was quite new to us, and we were gratified to discover in it an unmistakeable manifestation of that improvement which time cannot fail to bring to a conscientious and persevering student. The sestet affords evidence of such originality and freedom of expression as can only be looked for in the work of an accomplished artist who has learned to think and feel independently. It is, in short, a masterly composition, poetical in sentiment as it is skilful in execution. To the eternally fresh and beautiful character which belongs to the expression of pastoral life Mr. Aguilar has here given an individual, though perfectly truthful, colouring; and his work, though its subject is old as Adam, may, by virtue of his peculiar treatment of it, be described as a new and highly valuable addition to the repertory of instrumental music. Mr. Aguilar was assisted by Miss Lindo (one of our most promising concert singers), Miss Parepa, Signor Belletti, the brothers Holmes (violinists of great ability), and Herr Lidel, the violoncellist; and his concert was altogether most interesting and excellent of its kind.—Morning Post.

HERR LIDEL'S MATINÉE (May 31) took place at Collard's pianoforte Concert Rooms, Grosvenor Square. The singers were Mad. Catharine Hayes, Miss Messent, Mad. Laura Baxter, and Mr. Allan Irving; instrumentalists, Mr. Charles Salaman and Herr Adolph Ries (piano), Signor Regondi (concertina), Herr Oberthür (harp), Herr Louis Ries (violin), and Herr Lidel (violoncello). The feature of the programme was Beethoven's grand Trio in B flat, Op. 11, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, played by Mr. Charles Salaman, Herr Ries, and Herr Lidel. Herr Lidel also introduced two compositions of his own, and joined Signor Regondi in Bohrer's Duo Concertante for concertina and violoncello. The vocal music was excellent. Miss Messent gave Mr. Charles Salaman's "Good bye! a long good bye!" in her most pleasing manner; and Mad. Laura Baxter, in a ballad by Mr. Wallace, "The last good-bye," (not the "last" by many we venture to guess) charmed the audience by the fine quality of her voice and the purity of her style. Mad. Catharine Hayes achieved her usual success in "Ah! mon fils," and "Il ritorno." Mr. Charles Salaman and Herr Adolph Ries accompanied.

MR. CHARLES HALLE gave his first pianoforte recital on Thursday week afternoon, at 8 Mansfield Street, Cavendish Square, when the following splendid selection was given:—Grand Sonata in C, Op. 2, No. 3—Beethoven; Partita, in B minor—Sebastian Bach; Sonata in D major, No. 7—Clementi; Sonata in E minor, Op. 90—Beethoven; Impromptu in B flat, Op. 142, No. 3—F. Schubert; Nuits Blanches, Nos. 9 and 17, Dans le Bois, No. 6—Stephen Heller; Berceuse in D flat, Op. 57, and Mazurkas—Chopin. The great pianist played throughout magnificently, enchanting his aristocratic audience from the first movement of Beethoven's Sonata to the last Mazurka of Chopin.

MISS POOLE'S CONCERT (May 29), at the Hanover Rooms, attracted a large audience. From a number of pieces, vocal and instrumental, we can only select a few for special notice: these were—Gabriel's song "The forsaken," sung by Mad. Catharine Hayes, and encored; Mr. Wallace's new song "The Happy Birdling," by the same lady, accompanied on the concertina by Signor Regondi; "Pray, Goody, please," by Miss Poole (encored); duet, "Tell me, gentle stranger," by Miss Poole and Mr. Ramsden (encored); and the trio, "My lady, the Countess," from the Matrimonio Segreto, by Mad. Hayes, Mad. Weiss, and Miss Poole. Miss Freeth, Signor Regondi, and Mr. William Graeff Nicholls played solos on the pianoforte, concertina, and flute; and Miss Freeth and Mr. Harold Thomas executed a duet for pianoforte and harp.

MR. VINCENT WALLACE'S CONCERT.—At the grand concert in the Handel Orchestra of the Crystal Palace, for the benefit of Mr. Vincent Wallace, the programme was exclusively made up of this popular writer's compositions. We give it at length—a concert devoted to the works of one Englishman being a rather unusual occurrence:—

Overture to Maritana; Ballad, "In happy moments;" Ballad, "Alas! those chimes;" Duet, "Of fairy wand;" Ballad, "Old friends and other days;" Cavatina, "This heart by woe o'ertaken;" Variations on La Cracovienne; Scena, "Hope in sorrow;" Ballad, "Scenes that are brightest;" Song, "The Bell Ringer;" Ballad, "Lily bells;" Ballad, "There is a flower that bloometh;" Grand scena, "At length in absence;" Fairy trio, "'Tis now our festal hour!" Overture to Lurline; Romance, "Sweet form;" Quartet, "Through the world;" Ballad, "Gentle Troubadour;" Ballad, "A Father's Love;" Romanza, "The Gipsy Maid;" Concertino for Violin; Ballad (MS.), "They say that all things change;" Ballad, "The Coming of the Flowers;" Trio, "Turn on, Old Time."

About 12,000 persons were present. The vocalists were Mlle. Parepa, Mad. Lemmens, Mrs. Weiss, Miss Augusta Thomson, Miss Poole, Mad. Laura Baxter, Miss Fanny Huddart, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. George Perren, Mr. Ramsden, and Mr. Weiss. Miss Arabella Goddard was the exponent of the brilliant Cracovienne, and Herr Becker of the concertino, written expressly for this clever violinist. The programme was too long. Had one sample of the composer's talent in each style been introduced, it would have been sufficient for a Saturday in May at the Crystal Palace, which is half fête, half concert. There was, however, little extension by means of encores, the only repetitions being "Sweet form," and "A father's love," sung respectively by Mr. Sims Reeves and Mr. Santley. Mr. Vincent Wallace conducted the greater part of the concert, and presided at the pianoforte for the chamber songs. Mr. Manns conducted the overtures. No harp was forthcoming for "Scenes that are brightest," so the composer played the part on the pianoforte. The day was beautifully bright, and the company was of a very gay character.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS.—The annual performance of Handel's Messiah, for the benefit of this excellent institution, took place on Friday evening, at St. James's Hall, in the presence of a very large and brilliant audience. Handel himself bequeathed a handsome amount to the Royal Society of Musicians, but his immortal work, which has many a time and oft clothed the naked and fed the hungry, has proved a far more valuable legacy, for its annual announcement, in the cause of this particular charity, is sure to draw an enormous audience. The performance on this occasion, under the direction of Professor Sterndale Bennett, was excellent, and in many respects peculiarly interesting. There was a large and thoroughly professional band, an efficient chorus, and the solos were distributed amongst a larger number of vocalists than usual. Mlle. Parepa was the chief soprano, supported by Miss Eleanor Wilkinson, Mad. Rieder, Mrs. Weiss, Miss Augusta Thomson, Miss Clara Smithson, Miss Lascelles, Mad. Sainton-Dolby, Mr. Wilbye Cooper, Mr. Montem Smith, Mr. Santley, and Mr. Lewis Thomas. Mr. Thomas Harper played the obbligato to "The trumpet shall sound." Mr. Turle presided at the organ, and Mr. Willy led the band.

ITALIAN OPERA CONCERTS AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE. — The second Opera Concert of the season, signalised by the appearance of Mad. Alboni, came off yesterday week. The great contralto was in splendid voice, and we never heard her sing with more effect the favourite and popular pieces she selected. The well-known rondo-finale to Cenerentola displayed the extensive compass, the rich quality, the perfect evenness of tone, the unequalled flexibility, and the exquisite modulations of Mad. Alboni's highly cultivated and incomparable voice; and these rare qualities were not less striking in the popular brindisi from Lucrezia Borgia, to which the great singer gave a fresh vivacity and brilliancy which quite accounted for the clamorous cries with which it was redemanded. Mad. Alboni at first resisted the appeal, but the audience would accept no denial, and the song was repeated. We need scarcely say that she did full justice to Rosina's part in the "Zitti, zitti" trio from Barbière; but to expatiate on its numberless excellences would be but to add expletive to expletive, to heap panegyric on panegyric, and to indulge in phrases that would sound hyperbolic to ears that have not heard this perfect vocalist, and weak and ineffectual to those more fortunate mortals who have drunk in the streams of melody that flow from the "golden-mouthed" Alboni.

Mlle. Marie Brunetti was much applauded in the grand scena from Der Freischütz, which she sang in French, but which is best known in England as "Softly sighs the voice of evening." Signor Belart, invariably admirable in Rossini's music, both in the aria "S'ellam'è ognor infedele," and in the duet with M. Gassier, "All' idea," displayed his powers to signal advantage. Signor Mongini's noble voice was highly effective in the scena, "Tutto è sciolto," from La Sonnambula. He was encored in "La donna è mobile."

The chorus, "Va Pensiero," from I Lombardi, and the prayer from Mosè in Egitto, were efficiently given. Mr. Benedict conducted the overtures Fra Diavolo and Zampa.

The Yorkshire, Halifax, and Huddersfield Choral Societies, together with Mrs. Sutherland, and other well-known Yorkshire solo vocalists, sang on Saturday afternoon at the Palace. After the concert the entire series of great fountains were displayed for the first time this season.

CONCERT OF THE SOCIETY FOR THE ENCOURAGEMENT OF THE FINE ARTS.—After Mr. Henry Ottley had delivered his lecture in presence of the brilliant company in the Bridgewater Gallery, to which we alluded in our leading columns last week, a Concert took place, supported by several artists of the Royal Italian Opera and Her Majesty's Theatre. The programme consisted of a trio by Méhul, for piano, violoncello, and harmonium, executed with much taste by Messrs. Pezze, Miolan, and Méhul; Mrs. Gilbert sang with considerable effect Macfarren's "Beautiful May," which was deservedly applauded. Herr Steger —who has been recently engaged for Her Majesty's Theatre, and who will shortly appear—sung Mercadante's aria, "La dea di tutti i cor," and a lied by Esser, "Abschied" with considerable ability. Mlle. Michal, from Her Majesty's Theatre, gave the lied, by Mendelssohn, "Auf flügeln des Gesanges" with great spirit and effect. Mad. Csillag sang Schubert's "Post" in a most finished manner. Mad. Csillag likewise sang, in conjunction with Herr Steger, a canon MS. by Herr Schachner—(whose death, we are happy to announce, was erroneously reported in the Belgian Guide de Musique). It is a charming composition, and was admirably rendered. Mlle. Jenny Meyer delighted the audience with Schubert's lied "Horch du Lerche," as also Fesca's "Der Wanderer;" and Mr. Santley was compelled to repeat Wallace's "Bell Ringer" in obedience to the unanimous demand of the assembly. Mrs. Henry Webb and Herr Becker performed the last two movements of Beethoven's "Kreutzer" sonata. The playing was brilliant, and the applause thoroughly merited. Mr. Walworth, in Mendelssohn's song "I am a Roamer," and Herr Herrmanns' singing of "Falstaff" by Nicolai, which obtained an encore, contributed to the success of the concert. Mr. Gilbert (who has superintended several conversaziones), together with Herr Schachner and Mr. Benedict, were the conductors. The conversazione, which was attended by upwards of 800 persons, and included a large number of distinguished artists and connoisseurs, terminated at 11 o'clock.

Miss EMMA BUSBY, the talented pianist, gave a Morning Concert at the Hanover Square Rooms, on Monday week. Her performance included Hummel's Trio in E Major, with M. Sainton and Signor Piatti; a Scherzo, by Chopin; one of Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne Worte; and, with Signor Piatti, Beethoven's Duet in F Major, for piano and violoncello, in all of which the fair pianist exhibited both refinement of style and dexterity of finger. The voice music was supplied by Mlle. Jenny Meyer, Miss Marian Moss, Miss Augusta Thomson, and Mr. Santley. Mr. W. G. Cusins was the accompanyist.

A CONCERT was given at MYDDELTON HALL, on Wednesday week, on behalf of the Royal Medical Benevolent College. The singers were—Misses Clari Fraser, Annie Cox, and Eyles, Messrs. A. Lester, Winn, and the Quartet Glee Union. Miss Fraser introduced a new song by Mr. Clement White, "The lone old tree," a most melodious and graceful composition, which she sang with perfect taste and feeling. Miss Fraser also gave "Where the bee sucks," and was encored. Miss Eyles received a similar compliment in Mr. Linley's "Annie," and the two ladies joined in Weber's duet "Come be gay." The Quartet Glee Union sang Bishop's glee, "Under the greenwood tree," Horsley's "Sweet is evening's tranquil time," Mr. Hatton's part-song "Stars of the summer night," and Webbe's catch "Would you know my Cecilia's charms?"

MOZART—CHILD AND MAN.

The Same to the Same.

Milan, September 21, 1771.

To-day is to take place the first rehearsal, with orchestra, of M. Hasse's work, who is quite well, God be thanked. Next week will come the rehearsal of the serenade. Monday that of the recitatives; on the other days those of the choruses. Monday, Wolfgang will have quite finished. Manzuoli often comes to see us: Tibaldi almost every day at about eleven; he stays at table with us till one. Wolfgang composes during the whole time. All are extremely polite, and evince the greatest consideration for Wolfgang. We have not the slightest annoyance to complain of, for we have to do with good singers only and reasonable people. This serenade is, properly speaking, a little opera, and the opera itself is no longer, as regards the musical portion, for it is only prolonged by the two grand ballets, each of which lasts three-quarters of an hour.

Two days ago the Italian comedy terminated its performances, because the theatre was wanted for the preparations to be commenced. These comedians are extremely good, especially in character pieces and in tragedy.

You tell me, in your previous letters, that many persons have gone mad in Salzburg. Now you inform me that many die of dysentery. This is very bad, for when people are seized by the head and by the —— at the same time, the thing becomes dangerous. I must have carried away something myself from Salzburg, for I still frequently have vertigo. It is not astonishing, for when the air is infected one may easily catch something; that is why I asked you for some pills. I want to cure my head.

P.S. from Wolfgang. — As for me, God be thanked, I am well. I cannot write to you at any length. First of all, I have nothing to say; next, my fingers ache with scribbling notes. I often whistle and call—but no one answers. Only two airs more and the serenade is finished.

I have no longer any wish to return to Salsburg.—I am afraid of going mad like the rest of them.

The Same to the Same.

Milan, September 28, 1771.

Our holidays and amusements have commenced. We are going out a-walking. To-day the first full rehearsal takes place. I can tell you beforehand for your solace, that I am in hopes Wolfgang's composition will have a great success. First of all, because Manzuoli and all the singers, male and female, not only are in the highest degree satisfied with their pieces, but are still more anxious than we are to hear the serenade with all the accompaniments; next, because I know what he has written, and what effect it will produce, and because he is quite certain that he writes as well for the voice as he does for the orchestra. We are quite well. Tell me always about the weather.

The Same to the Same.

Milan, October 19, 1771.

The serenade so astonishingly pleased the people on the 17th, that it has to be played again to-day. The Archduke has asked for two copies (besides the two copies made for the Emperor and the Archduke which we are having bound). Every one accosts us in the streets to congratulate Wolfgang. In short, I am sorry for it, but Wolfgang's serenade threw Hasse's opera into the shade to a degree impossible to describe.

Give thanks to God and pray for us.

The Same to the Same.

Milan, October 26, 1771.

The public were witnesses yesterday at the theatre of the enthusiasm of the Archduke and Archduchess, who not only caused, by their applause, two airs in the serenade to be repeated, but during the serenade, and at the end, both leant out of their box towards Wolfgang in the orchestra, and betokened their approbation by crying out, "Bravissimo maestro!" and clapping their hands, an example which all the nobility and all the people imitated by applauding with all their might.

If you want any dresses, have made what is necessary; neither you or Nanette should be without what is proper. You must do whatever is to be done. Don't take anything bad. It is false economy to buy inferior goods. Have a fine gown made for yourself for grand occasions, and the one you had at Vienna you can wear every day. No woollen stuff—it is not worth a curse.

P.S. from Wolfgang.—My work being finished, I have more time to write, but I have no news to tell you, unless it be that the numbers 35, 59, 60, 61, and 62 came out at the lottery, and thus if we had staked upon those numbers we should have won, but not having staked we have neither won nor lost, but made fun of the people. The two airs in the serenade asked for again were those of Manzuoli and Ottrell.

The Same to the Same.

Milan, November 24, 1771.

M. Hasse and Wolfgang as well have been richly recompensed for their compositions. Besides what they touched in money, M. Hasse has received a snuff-box, and Wolfgang a watch set in diamonds. We shall see each other again soon if it be God's will. It is very certain that the serenade has pleased everybody to a singular degree. But that the Archbishop will bethink him of Wolfgang when there is an appointment vacant is a point on which I have my doubts.

P.S. from Wolfgang.—Manzuoli, who, however, passed in people's eyes for the most reasonable of castrati, has committed in his old age an act of folly and of pride. It was agreed he was to have 500 gigliati for the opera; but as there was no mention made of the serenade in the scrittura, he demanded another 500 for this, consequently altogether 1000. The Court only gave him 700 and a handsome snuff-box (I should think that was enough). But he like a true castrato returned the 700 gigliati and the snuff-box, and departed without taking anything. I do not know what is likely to be the end of this history; a bad one I imagine.

Brixen, December 11, 1771.

We shall not arrive before Monday. Count Spaur, who is here, will not hear of any other proposal.

113.

*The Same to the Same.

Botzen, October 28, 1772.

We were not able to start from Insbruck before seven o'clock, because there was no mass before the six o'clock one at St. John's. From Insbruck we went out driving as far as Hall to see the Ladies' Institute there, which was shown to us in detail by the Countess Lodron. Wolfgang played on the organ in the church there. Botzen is a melancholy place. But the pleasant disorder which is of the essence of all journeys has put my health in order. If, therefore, travelling be necessary to keep me in health, I shall try and get a place as courier, or at any rate as conductor of a diligence. Wolfgang is well; he is just now writing a quatuor to while away the time.

P.S. from Wolfgang.—Here we are already at Botzen. Already? Only! I am hungry, I am thirsty, I am sleepy, I am lazy, but I am well. I hope you will keep your word.

Wolfgang Mozart to his Mother.

Milan, November 7, 1772.

Don't be alarmed at seeing my writing instead of the father's. He has not time to write, because we are at M. d'Osto's, and Baron Cristiani has come here, and these gentlemen have so much to gossip about that he cannot leave them. We arrived here on the 4th without mishap. There is not a word of truth in the rumour of a war in Italy, of which there is so much talk in Germany, any more than there is in that of the fortifications of the castle of Milan.

We embrace mother 1,000,000 times (I cannot get in any more 0's here, and I prefer embracing my sister in persona to doing so in fancy).

P.S. from Mozart.—We spent Wolfgang's fête day merrily at Ala, at the brothers Picilli: we stopt also at Verona, and this is why we go to Milan so late, where we have already seen the opera buffa.

The elder Mozart to his Wife.

Milan, Nov. 14, 1772.

After living tranquilly for several weeks at Milan I am beginning to feel some symptoms of indisposition. I allow myself to get thinking of Salsburg, and without being conscious of it take a pleasure therein; when I come back to myself, I shake myself up, or endeavour to shake myself up and cast aside these reminiscences as I used to cast aside the evil thoughts with which the devil inspired me in my youth. There is no one here of our company but la Signora Saarti who plays the parts of the secondo uomo. Meanwhile Wolfgang has had enough to do, having had to write the choruses to the number of three, and to rewrite in part the recitatives which he had composed at Salzburg; for the poet had shown his manuscript to Metastasio, at Vienna, and he modified it, improved it, and added an entire scene to the second act. Lastly, Wolfgang has composed all the recitatives which were wanting in the Overture.

There is at Brescia a certain Count Lecchi, a capital violinist, and a great connoisseur and amateur of music, at whose house we promised to alight immediately on our return.

* Mozart arrived at Salzburg at the end of December, 1771, and the following year composed another serenade, Il Sogno di Scipione, by Metastasio, to celebrate the election of the new Archbishop of Salsburg, Jerome, of the princely house of Colloredo and Niöls, elected March 14, 1772. In October, 1772, father and son set out for Milan, where Mozart wrote the opera seria, Lucio Silla.

MUSIC AND THEATRES IN PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

June 12, 1860.

It is always interesting to recur to the early works of a composer who has succeeded in taking the rank of a classic, and to note how those qualities which chiefly distinguish the after productions with which his renown is associated, may sometimes be altogether absent, or exist only in a very faint germ. To students such opportunities are especially valuable, and teach the golden lesson how even genius cannot dispense with patient perseverance, and might never assert itself but for tenacity under disappointment. The management of the Théâtre Lyrique has, therefore, done a useful and a graceful thing in bringing out Hérold's first operatic work, Les Rosières, an opera comique in three acts, produced at the Salle Feydeau in 1817. On its first production, this work achieved a decided success, and at once informed the world that a composer of the highest promise was born to France. It kept the stage until 1826, when Marie, a much riper and more masterly work, threw it into the shade, whence it has never been rescued until now. Les Rosières, though much inferior to the composer's subsequent productions, exhibits in a considerable measure the fundamental characteristics of Hérold's style. It lacks the rich and brilliant instrumentation, and the startling modulations for which he was afterwards distinguished; but the grace and facility of his melodic inspirations, the elegance, piquancy, and neatness of his style are already clearly discernible. The libretto of this work, although old-fashioned, is still amusing; and the plot has a merit also somewhat out of date—clearness and simplicity. The principal female part, Florette, is played by Mlle. Girard, whose easy, correct, and brilliant execution, keen intelligence and agreeable organ, allied to graceful and spirited acting, place her among the first lyrical artists of the French stage. The other prominent characters are filled by Mlle. Faivre, and MM. Fromant, Ricquier Delauney, and Gabriel. A little one-act opera, entitled Les Valets de Guscoigne, has been produced for the first time at this establishment with sufficient success. The composer is M. Dufresne. Mlle. Faivre, M. Girardot, M. Wartel, and M. Potel, are engaged in it.

M. Henry Wuille, the well-known clarionetist, one of the many distinguished artists whom poor Jullien introduced to fortune and to fame, has made his début in Paris at the concerts Musard, and has won from the public as well as from the critics, the amplest acknowledgment of his uncommon talents.

In the theatrical world the advent of summer, if I may be allowed the expression, when the paletot is as yet an indispensable garment, is producing its usual desolating effects. Several houses have already closed their portals for the season, and others are threatening to follow their example. The Odéon made its last bow the other day, with the Testament de César Girandot, and the Bouffes Parisiens are strolling in the provinces. The Italian company, which had settled itself in the Salle Ventadour, hanging to the tragic skirts of Mad. Ristori, has likewise taken flight. Just before the departure of Alexandre Dumas the elder, for his periplous of the Mediterranean, it was rumoured that he had written a piece for the Théâtre Français, but that the reading of it had been suddenly interrupted through some dispute about the usual premium. It was said that the question was brought up on purpose to induce Dumas père, reckoning on his known irritability of temper, to withdraw the piece of his own accord; whether this was the intention or not, the haughty dramaturgist without deigning to read his work to the end, and thus throw his pearls to swine, ill-mannered enough to cavil over their price, packed up his manuscript, and walked off to the manager of the Vaudeville, to whom he transferred the privilege of producing the new work, with the magnificent stipulation that no premium should be demanded for it, thus setting a glorious example to the grovelling council of the Théâtre Français, and showing that he at least could set the interests of art above paltry considerations of finance. This piece has just been produced under the title of l'Envers d'une Conspiration, and the public may now judge whether or no it was right to haggle over the price of such a work. The subject is supposed to be historical, that is to say, Charles the Second figures in it, and Catherine of Braganza. Every one knows, however, with what freedom the elder Dumas is in the habit of treating the muse of history. He acts towards her certainly as a student, but as a student of the Quartier Latin. He strips her of her classic toga, takes her to a masquerade warehouse, decks her in the most captivating carnival costume, and familiarly clapping his arm round her waist, hurries her through a succession of exciting adventures. The conspiracy to which the title alludes, is that which effected the restoration of Charles; and the "Envers," or underside, is represented by a certain Lady Hamilton, and a Scotch adventurer, one Evan Macdonald, who having come to London to join the commonwealth party, is entangled by his love of Lady Hamilton into the royalist plot, to which he innocently renders essential service. This part, in the hands of Dupuis—formerly of the Gymnase—becomes broadly comic; and if M. Dumas' ambition soared no higher than this, and disdained that attention to literary form which he once condescended to cultivate, he can hardly find fault with the judgment of the Théâtre Français.

An extravagant absurdity called Les trois Fils de Cadet Roussel has just appeared at the Palais Royal, and not without danger attained success. It is incredible how many times this mythical personage of the first French Revolution has been dramatically served up, yet is his vitality apparently not exhausted. A new drama at the Gaîté—Une Pêcheresse, works up afresh a subject worn somewhat threadbare,—a husband's jealousy of his wife's past existence.

The indisposition of Mad. Ferraris has not yet ceased, and her place is filled by Mlle. Villiers. When is this lady to appear at Her Majesty's Theatre? The first performance of Semiramis is announced for the 29th of June, or at the latest the 2nd of July. The singer Wicart has been re-engaged at the Opera, and will make his re-appearance as Arnold in William Tell; he is then to play Raoul in the Huguenots. The engagement of Mlle. Tedesco is signed and sealed; she is to place herself at the disposal of M. Alfonse Royer on the 1st of September, when the rehearsals of Tannhäuser will commence in view of its production at the end of January, 1861.

At the Opéra Comique, the bills still alternate with L'Etoile du Nord, Le Roman d'Elvire and Rita, and Château Trompette with l'Habit de Mylord. A new opera, by M. Paul Dupuch, Gertrude, is in rehearsal, and will take its turn after Le Petit Chaperon Rouge, which is very soon to appear. The following artists will be engaged in this once most popular of Boieldieu's works—Rodolphe, M. Crosti; Roger, M. Warot; the Bailli, Lemaire; the Hermit, Barrielle; Rose d'Amour, Mlle. Marimon; Annette, Belia.

Before closing for the season the Théâtre Lyrique will produce a new operetta, the title of which has been changed since the first announcement from Le Mariage aux Epées to Maître Palma. The music is by Mlle. Rivay, her first essay, and the book by Mad. Furpille and Gille. It is also expected that La Madone, by Lacombe will shortly be forthcoming. The manager has just engaged Mad. Wekerlin Damoreau for next season.

The tenor Fraschini has just signed an engagement with the manager of the Orienta, at Madrid, for the ensuing season; and it is reported that Mad. Borghi-Mamo has contracted to appear at the Scala, in Milan, during the carnival season next year.

Roger has just returned from his provincial tour. He appeared last at Bordeaux, where he brought the season to a brilliant close. He is to proceed to Baden in August, where he is engaged, together with Mad. Miolan-Carvalho, to appear in a new opera, by Gounod.

M. Mirès, one of the millionaires who have sprung up under the Imperial regime, and who is the proprietor of two daily papers, Le Pays and Le Constitutionnel, has just married his daughter to the Prince de Polignac. There is something quite bewildering in this alliance, from the welding of principles and associations so widely dissevered and apparently so incompatible. The ceremony took place in the church of the Madeleine, and was attended by a crowd of distinguished people, whether by rank, intrinsic eminence or fortune. Finance, politics, officialism, art, literature, and even pride of birth were there amply and showily represented. The nuptial benediction was pronounced by Monseigneur the Bishop of Marseilles, and the sacred music executed on the occasion was composed by Prince Edmund of Polignac, the youngest of the four brothers composing this illustrious family. The executants were selected from the orchestra of the French opera and the choir of the Madeleine, and were under the direction of the chapel master, M. Dietsch. The organist of the parish, M. Saint Saens, presided at the grand organ.

MADAME CLARA NOVELLO.

Madame Clara Novello made her theatrical début at Padua, and chose the character of Semiramide for the occasion. Her success was complete, and this even increased as the experience she gained in her after engagements gave her greater familiarity with the special requirements of the stage. She appeared, in course of time, at Rome, Bologna, Fermo, Milan, and other places. Triumph walked in her footsteps, and the rich Italian language was almost exhausted in epithets of admiration, and taxed to the utmost of its sweetness to furnish poems in her praise. The Musical Antiquarian Society, established in London for the resuscitation of the works of early English composers, was at this time actively carrying on its operations, and, as a means to its end, collecting a library of works that might illustrate its purpose. It may or may not prove Mad. Novello's Italian popularity, to state, that her father contributed towards the accumulations of this institution a very extensive series of the laudatory verses addressed to his daughter, enjoining that, in case of the dissolution of the society, the entire collection should be transferred to the library of the British Museum, where the poems were accordingly deposited when the Musical Antiquarian was broken up, and where they will for all time be open to the examination of whomsoever may be interested in them.

The public performance in Paris of Rossini's Stabat Mater, some ten years or more after the production of his last opera, gave a new impetus to the universal esteem of this composer, and added a fresh laurel to his evergreen crown. The work was immediately transplanted to London, and reproduced in every musical city in Europe. It was first heard in Italy, at a performance in Bologna, where Rossini then resided, who was consulted upon every arrangement for the occasion. Donizetti was the conductor, than whom no one then living could more completely identify himself with the true spirit of the composer; and, by Rossini's expressed stipulation, Mad. Novello was preferred above all the singers in Italy to sustain the soprano solo; and the grand vocal effects of the famous "Inflammatus" were thus first made known to the countrymen of the composer through the medium of her beautiful voice. When the Stabat was given in Florence a year afterwards, the same lady again, by the composer's desire, was engaged to fill the same part in the performance.

In Italy all theatrical engagements are effected by means of correspondenti,—agents whose entire occupation is to negotiate the arrangements between the impressario and the composers, the singers, the players, and every other functionary of the operatic establishment, which holds so important a place in public consideration and exacts so large a share of government attention, that it may almost be regarded as one of the chief political institutions of the country. Through some mistake of the correspondenti—mistakes will happen, even in the transactions of the most trusted officials—Mad. Novello was engaged for the carnival season of 1842, at both Rome and Genoa, and the director of each theatre demanded the fulfilment of the scrittura. Universal as we may esteem the talent of the lady, the person of the prima donna was certainly not ubiquitous, and the possibility of her completing the two discrepant contracts was consequently non-existent. The Roman and Genoese manager had each the law in his favour—alas! that jurisprudence should be so imprudent as to see a parity of right on each side of a dispute—but the impressario of the Papal States had more than the law, in having possession, which constitutes the nine points that supersede all the others. In the autumn season of 1841, Mad. Novello was the prima donna at Fermo, a city, as is well known to all familiar with Romagnian topography, that is located within the papal territory, and consequently under the jurisdiction of the Roman authorities. She could not quit the place without a passport, which document he of the opera house at Rome had the power to prevent her obtaining, and he thus held the lady in such firm possession as would effectively hinder her from appearing at the other theatre, if it did not compel her to sing at his own. The minister of police at Fermo, Count Giglucci, communicated to the cantatrice the restraint imposed upon her by the Roman manager, whereof he, the count, was the unhappy instrument; and communicated, too, that he was under the sad necessity of placing the lady under arrest until she should have made arrangements satisfactory to the impressario, whose interests he protected. The courteous captor became in turn a captive, his captivation being effected by the personal charms of the fair prisoner whose person he held in durance, and he did not release her from her thraldom until she had vowed to bind herself to him for ever. Her hymeneal engagement, however, was not to interfere with the two theatrical contracts which then perplexed her, nor with subsequent professional duties to which she had already pledged herself; but it was to be discharged when she had freed herself, by fulfilment, from all the legal demands upon her talent at that time pending. The first of these was, of course, that which was the subject of the Romano-Genoese controversy, and was the immediate occasion, therefore, of her connection with her future husband. The said controversy was finally settled by arbitration, to the following effect:—It is permitted to the flock of the pope to eat flesh and to hear operas for the entire period intervening between the Feast of the Nativity and the solemn term of Lent, and the carnival season of 1842 was thus to extend over twelve weeks, for six of which, dominion over the vocal and histrionic powers of the songstress was adjudicated to the manager of Rome, and for the other half moiety, the same advantage was ceded to him of Genoa.

One of the engagements that Mad. Novello had upon her hands was to Mr. Macready, who was then conducting Drury Lane theatre upon a principle of truly poetic purity, which has vainly been emulated by subsequent directors of dramatic taste in London. Mr. Serle, the actor and dramatist, and the husband of Mad. Novello's retired sister, was the chief confident of all the arrangements of the great manager, and it was to his suggestion that the London public owed the opportunity Mr. Macready afforded them of witnessing the lady's talent in a capacity in which she had not yet appeared in her native country. Her début on the stage in England was in the summer of 1842, and she chose Paccini's opera of Saffo for the display of her ability,—a work, however, which was far better fitted to exercise the refined classic taste of the director of the theatre in the arrangements of the mise-en-scène, than to place the artistic talent of the prima donna in an interesting light before the public. Her brother-in-law translated the libretto, and everything that could possibly be accomplished to give good effect to the performance was done; but nothing could render a weak opera of a weak composer an interesting work, and the error of judgment in choosing such a piece for her appearance was not a little injurious to our heroine's first impression on the London playgoers. In the repertory of Drury Lane theatre was Handel's Acis and Galatea, the production of which, with Mr. Stanfield's scenery and Mr. T. Cooke's instrumentation, was one of the most remarkable events of Mr. Macready's management—nay, of modern theatrical history. On the withdrawal of Saffo, Mad. Novello sang the chief character in this immortal work, and produced an effect in it which was impossible to her in the feeble music of the modern Italian composer.

She sang that year at our provincial music meetings; and then, without a formal farewell of the public, she retired from the field of her constantly fortunate efforts, and became the Countess Giglucci. The historian may not pry into the incidents of her private life, and there occurs, therefore, a necessary hiatus in the current of our narrative, which cannot be resumed until the period when Mad. Novello returned o the exercise of her profession.

Concerts.

MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—The fifth and last concert of the season was no less interesting than its predecessors, as will be seen by the subjoined programme:—

PART I.

Overture, "Leonora"	Beethoven
Aria "Act nur einmal noch in leben"	Mozart
Fifth Concerto, violin	Molique
Recit. "E mi lasci cosi" / Aria "Tu m' abbandoni"	Spohr
Overture "Les deux Journées"	Cherubini

PART II.

Symphony in A minor (Op. 56)	Mendelssohn
Recit. "Di ostili tende" / Aria "Dall' asilo della pace"	Costa
Recit. "Krafft meines heiligen Amtes" / Aria "Wenn Romeo den Sohn erschlagen"	Bellini
Overture "Der Freyschütz"	Weber

So magnificent was the execution of the first overture that a very strong demand for its repetition ensued even after Mlle. Meyer had ascended the platform; but Mr. Mellon declined to accede to the compliment, gratifying as it must have been to himself and the perfectly trained band under his control. Equally praiseworthy was the execution of the other two overtures, both of which were given to perfection. The great treat, however, was Mendelssohn's superb symphony in A minor, best known perhaps as the Scotch symphony, having, it is said, been composed (like the Isles of Fingal) while the illustrious master was influenced by reminiscences of his visit to North Britain, and impregnated with the character of the locality. From beginning to end the playing of the orchestra was irreproachable: it was evident that every member was earnestly imbued with the spirit of the composition, and all did their best to render justice to its marvellous beauties. The consequence was one of the finest performances of this picturesque work we have ever heard; and no wonder that the audience were worked up to enthusiasm; so much so was this the case indeed, that there were loud calls for the scherzo to be repeated, but Mr. Mellon, deaf to the solicitation, went on with the next movement. Herr Molique met with an "ovation" both on entering and leaving the orchestra, and was frequently applauded during the performance of his very fine concerto, which he played to admiration, and in which the orchestral accompaniments were given with the utmost delicacy and precision. Miss Louisa Pyne's charming voice and facile vocalisation were conspicuous alike in the air of the German and Italian composer—the latter although replete with difficulty not being very effective—no fault of Miss Pyne's, however. Mlle. Meyer's rich mezzo soprano told to greater advantage in the air from Titus than that from I Capuletti, in which the time was somewhat dragged.

NEW PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—The fifth performance on Monday brought the series to a termination. The programme included the overtures to La Clemenza di Tito and Preciosa, Beethoven's symphony in D, No. 2, Mendelssohn's concerto in D minor, and Spohr's dramatic concerto for violin and orchestra. In consequence of both Italian operas giving extra nights, Dr. Wylde was deprived of some of his regular "hands," and forced to look for recruits in all directions. Fortunately, good players in London are not scarce. To the execution of Beethoven's symphony, we have scarcely anything to award but praise, and the liberal applause which followed each movement proved that the audience were thoroughly satisfied. Herr Becker played the dramatic concerto—so great a favourite with Ernst, and introduced by that distinguished violinist on the occasion of his first performance in this country—in masterly style, and the applause at the end was uproarious. The grand concerto of Mendelssohn also was a triumph for Mr. John Barnett, who created a marked sensation. The last movement more particularly displayed the young pianist's execution and taste to equal advantage. The voice music was allotted to Miss Louisa Pyne, Mad. Lemmens Sherrington, and Herr Herrmanns, the new German bass, who made so great a hit the week previously at the Monday Popular Concerts. Herr Herrmanns introduced "Falstaff's song," from Otto Nicolai's Merry Wives of Windsor, with the same success as before. He is an unquestionable acquisition to the concert-room. Miss Louisa Pyne sang a grand scena from Spohr's Jessonda, "Batti, batti," and a romance from Mr. Wallace's Lurline. The expressive manner in which she gave the air from Don Giovanni received the liveliest sympathy and won a hearty encore. Mad. Lemmens Sherrington gave an air from Weber's Euryanthe to perfection, but the audience were more pleased with Adolph Adams' "Ah! vous dirai-je mamma," which was redemanded. The hall was crowded in every part. Dr. Wylde may congratulate himself that the season has been one of the most successful in the annals of the New Philharmonic Society, which merely shows that energy and perseverance in a right cause are capable of surmounting any difficulties.

MRS. ANDERSON'S CONCERT.—The annual concert of Mrs. Anderson, pianist to Her Majesty and instructress to the Princesses Alice, Helena, and Louise, took place on Wednesday afternoon, in Her Majesty's Theatre, which was crowded by a fashionable audience. The programme comprised no less than three hours and a half of vocal and instrumental music, for the most part consisting of excerpts from the popular Italian operas of the day, and therefore not calling for detailed criticism. Among the singers were Mad. Alboni, Mlle. Titiens, Mad. Borghi-Mamo, Mad. Lotti della Santa, Mlle. Michal, Mlle. Brunetti, Signors Giuglini, Mongini, Belart, Vialetti, Everardi, Gassier, &c.—in short, the whole of Mr. E. T. Smith's company, with the single exception of Signor Ciampi, who had only made his first appearance the night previous. It is scarcely requisite to add, that with such a galaxy of talent—enriched, moreover, by the addition of Miss Louisa Pyne, Mlle. Artôt, and Mlle. Parepa—a feast of vocal music was provided, ample enough to satisfy the hungriest dilettante. A more brilliant and well varied selection of favourite pieces could hardly have been offered; and, although concerts in the daytime seldom provoke many outward signs of approbation, the repeated applause bestowed on the present occasion showed that either the audience were more impressionable or the programme more enlivening than usual. The solo instrumental department, with the exception of a fantasia on the violin by Herr Becker (admirably played, and thoroughly appreciated), was exclusively represented by Mrs. Anderson and her nephew, Mr. W. G. Cusins. Every amateur of the pianoforte was pleased to see Mrs. Anderson once more come forward in a great work which she used formerly to play with such success at the Philharmonic and other concerts of importance. Beethoven's concerto in E flat—not very long since—was frequently associated with the name of this lady, who had studied it with ardour, and mastered it so completely as to grasp, at one and the same time, its technical difficulties and poetical meaning. On Wednesday she confined herself to the first allegro, which, probably, she never rendered with greater spirit, taste, and effect; and, to judge by the warm reception it obtained, notwithstanding the length of the programme, no one would have objected to hear the two movements that were omitted. In Mr. Osborne's very ingenious and showy duet for two pianofortes on themes from L'Etoile du Nord, with Mr. Cusins as her associate, Mrs. Anderson was equally happy. This was a vigorous and highly effective performance on both hands, well meriting the hearty plaudits it elicited. The concert began at half-past one, and did not terminate till considerably after five; nevertheless, the attractions it presented were so many and so sterling, that the majority of the audience remained to the end.

PROFESSORS' CONCERT UNION.—Mr. Henry Blagrove, the distinguished violinist, has organised a series of concerts of "chamber" music, under the above title, which we suppose implies a sort of joint-stock arrangement between vocalists and classical instrumentalists of repute. The first concert took place on the 1st inst., at the Beethoven Rooms, the programme comprising Mozart's quintet in G minor, Spohr's quartet in B flat, Beethoven's quartet in E flat, songs by Miss Augusta Thomson and Mr. Wilbye Cooper, and a violin solo by Mr. H. Blagrove. It was a model programme in respect to form and quantity, and the only objection that could be urged was, that the pianoforte did not figure in any of the concerted pieces. The quartets, &c., for stringed instruments, require the relief afforded by contrast — a fact of which the Monday Popular Concert directors appear to have been all along aware, as they have taken care to secure the services of a first-class pianist for every concert, and to insert a trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, a sonata for pianoforte and violin, or a sonata for pianoforte alone, to brighten up the performances. The executants at Mr. Blagrove's first concert were Messrs. H. and R. Blagrove, Clementi, Colchester, and Daubert. Mr. Sidney Smith accompanied the vocal music.

MR. W. G. CUSINS gave his matinée musicale at Willis's Rooms, on the 2nd inst. This gentleman—a zealous pianist, a clever violinist, and an industrious composer—is remarkable for his easy and finished style of playing, and for his leaning towards the higher order of music. He played on this occasion Beethoven's sonata in E flat, No. 3 of Op. 31, joined Mr. Henry Blagrove in Mozart's sonata in A, and M. Paque in Mendelssohn's sonata in B flat. He also played a polonaise by Chopin, and assisted Herr Engel in a duo for harmonium and pianoforte, on airs from Le Prophète. Mr. John Thomas contributed a harp solo, Il Mandolino, by Parish Alvars, which was much applauded. The vocal music was excellent. Miss Messent introduced a charming song by the late F. E. Bache, "What wakes me from my slumber;" Miss Lascelles sang a well-written and graceful romance, "Eloisa," by the beneficiaire; Mad. Rieder created a sensation by her vocalisation in a bravura from Auber's Actéon, a duet by Boieldieu, and a Tyrolienne, in which she was accompanied by the Orpheus Glee Union. M. Lefort gave a not very interesting song by Adolphe Adam, with harmonium accompaniment, and the Orpheus Glee Union achieved honour both for themselves and Mr. Cusins in two part-songs, "Daybreak," and "As the sunshine to the flower." Mr. Harold Thomas was accompanist. The rooms were well filled.

MESSRS. RIES'S CONCERTS.—The concert of Messrs. Louis and Adolph Ries, at the Hanover Square Rooms, was a thorough classical entertainment. The concerted instrumental pieces were, Ferdinand Ries's grand Sextuor in C, for piano, two violins, viola, violoncello, and contrabasso, played by Messrs. A. and L. Ries, Diechmann, Webb, Lidel, and Severn; and Spohr's stringed instrument quartet in D minor, Op. 74, in which the first violin was played by Mr. L. Ries. M. Vieuxtemps' Fantasia appasionata, for violin, was admirably executed by Mr. L. Ries, whose excellence as a solo performer is not sufficiently known to the public. On the other hand, his brother, by a fine performance of Beethoven's sonata in A, for piano and violoncello (in which he was ably supported by Herr Lidel), and of two solos by Rubinstein and Chopin, showed himself entitled to an honourable place among the pianists of the day. Several vocal pieces, sung by Mlle. Jenny Meyer and Miss Eleanor Wilkinson, afforded an agreeable variety to the concert.

THE LONDON GLEE AND MADRIGAL SOCIETY last week gave their hundredth performance with unabated vigour and success, and their present season will terminate positively this day. Their répertoire has consisted of above a hundred different pieces—glees, madrigals, catches, and old ballads — the most favourite of which have been included in the programmes of the recent performances. We looked forward with pleasure to the resumption of this society's pleasant entertainments next season, and hope to find Mr. Oliphant, whose literary illustrations have added so much to the success of the performances, provided with a fresh budget of information.

MR. BRINLEY RICHARDS'S CONCERT, at St. James's Hall on the 8th inst., was of more than average excellence, the selection generally being in good taste, the artists of the highest stamp, and the execution throughout unexceptionable. If a fault could be found, it was with the modesty of the bénéficiaire, in not affording his patrons the gratification of a solo. However, Mr. Richards made amends by his admirable performance of the C minor sonata of Beethoven, for piano and violin (Op. 30), the violin being in the able hands of M. Sainton, and no less distinguished himself in the duet of Mozart (Op. 53), for two pianofortes, in which he shared the laurels with Miss Arabella Goddard herself, and in Hummel's trio in E flat, the violin and violoncello parts being supported, with their accustomed ability, by MM. Sainton and Paque. Moreover, Mr. Richards did honour to his fatherland by producing a new song, "The Harp of Wales," which is sure to become a favourite of the Cymri, who are justly proud of their bards. So admirably was this sung by Mr. Sims Reeves that an encore was inevitable, and the ballad was as warmly applauded the second time as the first. The "Suliote War Song," another effective composition of Mr. Richards, had ample justice rendered it in the perfect singing of Mr. Santley, who, earlier in the evening, contented himself with reappearing and bowing his acknowledgments to the very strong demand for a repetition of Mr. J. W. Davison's song, "Rough Wind that moanest loud" (from the Vocal Illustrations of Shelley). Miss Arabella Goddard contributed a fantasia of M. Ascher's, on airs from Dinorah, evoking great applause by the united grace and brilliancy of the performance. Miss ("Mlle. Euphrosyne") Parepa gave Paer's variations on "La biondina in Gondoletta" (recently introduced at the Monday Popular Concerts), and the "Shadow Song" from Dinorah, with remarkable spirit and effect, and was rewarded by the heartiest acclamations. She also joined Mad. Laura Baxter in Paer's Natturno, "Puro ciel tranquilla notte" (another Monday Popular Concert discovery); Mad. Baxter, in addition, giving a new song by Mr. Vincent Wallace, "The last Good-bye," written expressly for her, and accompanied by the composer. Miss Eleonora Wilkinson (a débutante?) essayed the bolero from Verdi's Vespri Siciliani. Miss Messent's rendering of Secker's song, "Oh! happy is the little bird" (violoncello obbligato by M. Paque), was deservedly applauded, and Mr. Reeves was compelled to repeat the popular "Come into the Garden, Maud." Herr Engel's harmonium solo was also redemanded, and we almost wonder that there was not a bis for the "Adelaida," so exquisitely sung by Mr. Sims Reeves—the accompaniment of Miss Arabella Goddard being as charming as the singing. The room was well-filled, and the audience thoroughly qualified.

THE MORNING CONCERT OF HERR CARL DEICHMANN, on Thursday, at Willis's Rooms, introduced a new pianist from Berlin, in the person of Herr Sigismund Blumner, who played a prelude by Chopin, and Weber's "Polonaise," with considerable skill. The special pieces were Beethoven's quintet in C major, Op. 29, for string instruments, and Schumann's quintet for piano and strings in E flat, Op. 44. The quintet of Beethoven—executants, Herr Deichmann, Herr L. Ries, Mr. Webb, M. Zerbini, and Herr Hausmann—was extremely well played, if we except the last movement, presto, which, though presto, was not as clear and distinct as it might have been. Mad. Sainton-Dolby was encored in Herr Deickmann's new, graceful and extremely well-written song, with violin obbligato, "The Brook," and the English ballad, "The Skipper and his Son;" the latter a very pretty piece of melody. Herr Deichmann's solo displays were an adagio and fugue by Bach, and a solo entitled L'Allegrezza, of his own composition, both of which were executed with admirable dexterity. The attendance was large.

MLLE. SEDLATZEKS' MATINEE took place at Campden House, Kensington, on Thursday. The programme was remarkable in one respect only, the artistes being nearly as numerous as the pieces. Mlle. Sedlatzek's solos were Signor Arditi's "Il Baccio," written for Mlle. Piccolomini, and Mr. Balfe's ballad, "I'm not in love, remember." She also sang Mr. Wallace's trio, "Stay, fleeting time," with Mr. G. Perren and Mr. Patey. Among the vocalists were Mad. Catherine Hayes, Miss Poole, Herr Herrmanns, and the Glee and Madrigal Union. Miss Freeth (pianist), Herr Oberthur (harp), Mr. Lazarus (clarinet), and Signor Pezze (violoncello), played solos on their respective instruments. Conductors—Mr. J. E. Callcott, Herr A. Ries, and Herr W. Ganz.

MAD. PAEZ gave a matinée musicale at the Grosvenor Concert-Room, on Tuesday. This lady, but little known to the London public, has a fine voice and brilliant execution. She sang the cavatina "Ernani, involami," and an air from Torquato Tasso, both with great effect. Mad. Paez was assisted by M. Depret, and Herr Herrmanns as vocalist, and M. Rene Douay (violoncello) and Master Henri Ketten (pianoforte) as instrumentalists. Master Ketten played Mendelssohn's "Rondo Cappricioso;" "Fantaisie Impromptu," by Chopin; and "Saltarello," by Alkan, with surprising mastery and ease considering his years. He promises indeed to become one of the players of the day. Herr Herrmanns as usual astonished his hearers by the power and volume of his voice. M. Vera and M. Emile Berger were the accompanists.

MISS FANNY CORFIELD, the clever pupil of Professor Sterndale Bennett, gave a concert of classical pianoforte music at 14 Montague Place, Bryanstone Square, on Saturday, the 19th ult., assisted by Mad. Sainton-Dolby and M. Redfearn, singers, and M. Sainton and M. Paque, instrumentalists. The programme, with one or two exceptions, was strictly classical, and comprised, for the pianoforte pieces, Dussek's sonata in B flat, with violin (Monday Popular Concert Library); Mendelssohn's sonata in D, Op. 58, with violoncello; Beethoven's sonata solos, Op. 22; and Hadyn's trio in G, with violin and violoncello. Miss Corfield, who last season exhibited such undoubted promise, has much improved, having gained both in strength of finger and neatness of execution. She plays the music of the great masters, too, con amore — an important point. Mad. Sainton-Dolby sang Mr. Hatton's song, "Day and Night," and Professor Bennett's "Dawn, gentle Flower," both in her most graceful manner; and M. Redfearn was very successful in the aria, "Dalla sua pace," from Don Giovanni, and "The Garland" of Mendelssohn. This gentleman has a capital tenor voice, and sings like a musician.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF FEMALE MUSICIANS' CONCERT.—The concert at the Hanover Square Rooms in aid of the funds of the Royal Society of Female Musicians was attended by a large audience. The artistes were Mlle. Parepa, Mad. Reider, Mad. Sainton, Miss Palmer, Miss Rachel Gray, Miss Eliza Hughes, Miss Emily Gresham, Miss Augusta Thomson, M. Jules Lefort, Mr. Wilbye Cooper, Mr. Santley, the London Glee and Madrigal Union, Mr. G. W. Cusins, M. Leopold de Meyer, Herr Engel, Mr. Sydney Pratten, and the London Quintet Union—Professor Sterndale Bennett officiating as conductor. The programme included twenty-two pieces, the most noticeable of which were Hummel's "Quintet in E flat major," admirably played by Mr. W. G. Cusins (pianoforte) and the London Quintet Union (Messrs. Willy, Webb, Pettit, and Reynolds); the "Shadow Song" from Dinorah, given with much brilliancy by Mlle. Parepa; the scena from John Barnett's Fair Rosamond, "Ah me! he comes not!" sung with genuine dramatic expression by Miss Augusta Thomson; Beethoven's "O beauteous daughter of the starry race," most effectively rendered by Mr. Wilbye Cooper; and Engel's Octobre, so well delivered by M. Jules Lefort, that it was re-demanded; Vincent Wallace's new song, "The Bellringer," sung by Mr. Santley and similarly honoured; a new ballad, by Miss Virginia Gabriel, "The Skipper and his Boy," well suited to Mad. Sainton, who sang it with that exquisite expression which she knows so well how to infuse into pathetic ballads; the prayer from Lurline, given with great taste by Miss Hughes, and the trio from Spohr's Azor and Zemira, "Semi fugge l'ombra intorno," excellently interpreted by Mad. Reider, Miss Augusta Thomson, and Miss Palmer. The chief instrumental feature of the concert was M. Leopold de Meyer's execution of a fantasia of his own composition; the astonishing power and brilliancy of this accomplished pianist has on several occasions been remarked, but never was the originality of his style more apparent than last night; he not only delighted but fairly astonished the audience by the delicate play of light and shade—the ease, the piquancy, and the command over the instrument that characterised his performance, and the applause at the conclusion was so vociferous that an encore was the result. Herr Engel also deserves honourable mention for his solo on the harmonium; while the London Glee and Madrigal Union were encored in Elliott's "Come see what pleasures in our plains abound." The concert was most successful, and it is to be hoped that in a pecuniary sense it may benefit a charity which has for its object the relief of those who, after administering for years to the gratification of the public, find themselves from various causes reduced to poverty in their declining days.

MR. F. SCOTSON CLARK, the pianist and harmonium player, gave a concert on Thursday morning at Collard's Pianoforte Rooms, Grosvenor Street, which was attended by a crowded audience. The programme was enriched by Professor Bennett's trio in A major, Op. 26, for piano, violin, and violoncello, played by Mr. Scotson Clark, M. Horace Poussard, and Mr. W. Pettit. Mr. Clark also performed in a grand duo for pianoforte and harmonium, Sur des Motifs de Robin des Bois, with Miss A. M. Wyatt—Mr. Clark presiding at the harmonium, and a solo of his own composition on the harmonium, on airs from Sonnambula. Among the vocalists we may name Miss Henderson, Miss Palmer, Miss Augusta Thomson, and Miss Eliza Hughes, as having especially distinguished themselves.

A MORNING CONCERT, in aid of the funds of the London Home, Notting Hill, was given at St. James's Hall, on Thursday, and attracted a large assembly. The following artistes assisted gratuitously:—Mad. Catherine Hayes, Miss Parepa, Mad. Lemmens Sherrington, Miss Stabbach, Mad. Sainton-Dolby, Mr. Wilbye Cooper, Mr. Santley, and the London Glee and Madrigal Union, vocalists; Miss Arabella Goddard, M. Sainton, and Master Drew Dean, instrumentalists. The first part was conducted by Herr Wilhelm Ganz; the second by Mr. Lindsay Sloper.

ORGAN FOR GODMANCHESTER PARISH CHURCH.—This large and powerful instrument, containing 32 stops distributed over two complete manuals, and an independent pedal organ, was publicly opened on Monday and Tuesday last at the factory of the builders, Messrs. Bryceson and Fincham, Brook Street, Euston Road. Mr. Frederic Archer (late organist of the Royal Panopticon) gave two grand performances. The selection comprised the following overtures,—A Midsummer Night's Dream, La Gazza Ladra, Melusine, Zampa, Oberon, William Tell, Jubilee, Preciosa, besides the graver works of Bach, Handel, Mozart, Rinck, &c. Mr. Archer's dexterity and manipulation was the subject of general remark amongst the large and musical audience assembled on each occasion. Mr. W. H. Strickland, of St. Mary Magdalen, Munster Street, gave the concluding performance, also of sacred as well as secular music, and received frequent encores. The organ is chiefly remarkable for its rich and powerful swell, as well as the evenness and beauty of the numerous solo stops. Amongst the novel appliances introduced is a "Tremulant" acted on by a bar occupying a horizontal position between the swell and the great manuals, which is a great improvement on the ordinary pedal or draw stop, and allows the performer to introduce far more delicate effects by its use.

CHRIST CHURCH, MARYLEBONE.—There were twenty-three applicants. The Vestry met on Thursday, 31st May, and reduced them to six, viz., three ladies and three gentlemen. The following had the highest number of votes:—Mrs. Arthur Willmore, 83; Miss Lindley, 31; Miss Bloomer, 20; Mr. Swannell, 22; Dr. Hatchens, 19; Mr. George Loder, 18. These had to play at the church on the succeeding Thursday, and go to the ballot on Saturday. The pieces selected to be played were the double choruses, "Fixed in his everlasting seat" (from Handel's Samson), the "Old Hundredth Psalm," and a chant and voluntary selected by the candidates. The result of the ballot on Saturday was—for Mrs. Arthur Willmore, 58; Miss Bloomer, 22; Miss Lindley, 12; Mr. George Loder, 9; Mr. Swannell, 1; Dr. Hatchens did not make his appearance at the contest.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—This Evening (Saturday, June 16), will be repeated (third time this season) Mozart's chef-d'œuvre, IL DON GIOVANNI, with the following powerful cast:—Donna Anna, Mlle. TITIENS; Donna Elvira, Mlle. VANERI; Zerlina, Mad. BORGHI-MAMO; Leporello, Signor CIAMPI; Don Ottavio, Signor GIUGLINI; Masetto, Signor RONCONI; Il Commendatore, Signor CASTELLI; and Don Giovanni, Signor EVERARDI. The Minuet will be danced by Mlle. CLAUDINA CUCCHI and Mlle. MORLACCHI. In active preparation, and will shortly be produced, with new and extensive scenery, properties, and decorations, Weber's grand romantic opera of OBERON. Principal characters by Mlle. TITIENS, Mlle. LEMAIRE, Mlle. VANERI, Mlle. BADIALI, Mad. ALBONI, Signor BELART, Signor EVERARDI, Signor ALDIGHIERI, Signor CASTELLI, Signor MERCURIALI, and Signor MONDINI. In order to secure places for these grand performances, early application is earnestly recommended to be made at the Box-office of the Theatre, which is open daily from 10 to 6, under the direction of Mr. Nugent. NOTICE.—In consequence of the numerous applications at the Box-office of the Theatre, from the gentry residing in the vicinity of the metropolis, the Lessee and Director has decided upon giving one Grand Morning Performance, which will take place on Wednesday, June 20, when will be performed Meyerbeer's grand Opera of LES HUGUENOTS. Raoul, Signor GIUGLINI; De Cosse, Signor SOLDI; Tavannes, Signor MERCURIALI; St. Bris, Signor GASSIER; Nevers, Signor EVERARDI; De Retz, Signor CASABONI; Maurevert, Signor FELLAR; Meru, Signor CASTELLI; Guardiano, Signor ROMILLI; Marcello, Signor VIALETTI; Urbano, Mad. BORGHI-MAMO; Margherita, Mlle. LOUISA MICHAL (her second appearance in this country); Dames d'Onore, Mlles. NARDI and DELL'ANESE; Valentina, Mlle. TITIENS. Conductor, Signor ARDITI. The Opera will commence at 2 o'clock. In order to secure places for this grand Morning Performance (positively the only one this season), early application should be made at the Box-office of the Theatre, which is open daily from 10 until 6, and on the nights of performance until the end of the Opera.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—IL DON GIOVANNI. TITIENS, BORGHI-MAMO, VANERI; CIAMPI, EVERARDI, RONCONI, GIUGLINI. This evening (Saturday, June 16) will be repeated Mozart's chef-d'œuvre, IL DON GIOVANNI, with the following powerful cast:—Donna Anna, Mlle. TITIENS; Donna Elvira, Mlle. VANERI; Zerlina, Mad. BORGHI MAMO; Leporello, Signor CIAMPI; Don Ottavio, Signor GIUGLINI; Masetto, Signor RONCONI; Il Commendatore, Signor CASTELLI; and Don Giovanni, Signor EVERARDI. The Minuet will be danced by Mlle. CLAUDINA CUCCHI and Mlle. MORLACCHI. Conductor—Mr. BENEDICT. The Opera commences at 8 o'clock. Pit tickets, 8s. 6d.; Gallery Stalls, 5s.; Gallery, 3s.; to be had at the Box-office of the Theatre, which is open daily from 10 to 6.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.—Grand Concert.—Production of ORFEO.—On Wednesday, June 27, a GRAND EVENING CONCERT will take place. On this occasion the first part of the Concert will consist of a Miscellaneous Selection. After which will be produced the celebrated lyric work, by Gluck, entitled ORFEO E EURYDICE, illustrated by costumes, scenery, and decorations. The Subscribers to the Opera for the Saturdays of the season, as well as those for the second alternate weeks, will be presented with the entrée to the above performance. The Musical World.

LONDON: SATURDAY, JUNE 16, 1860.

M. FERDINAND HILLER has addressed the following letter to the Editor of the Niederrhainische Musik-Zeitung, with reference to a subject which must interest all musical readers :—

"In a note to an account of Beethoven's Fidelio, in Paris, the question is mooted whence Berlioz hit upon the idea of attributing to Beethoven a joke given at length in the article mentioned. I told it him years ago, and it was communicated to me by a person who certainly did not invent it, namely by old Paer himself. The latter—whom I frequently met during my youth, in Paris, and part of whose character it was to be more than friendly with every one—often spoke to me about his acquaintance, in Vienna, with Beethoven, for whom he expressed deep admiration. Among other things he informed me that Beethoven went with him one evening to the Theater an der Wien, when his (Paer's) Leonora was performed. Beethoven, he said, sat next him, and, often repeatedly exclaiming 'Oh, que c'est beau, que c'est intéressant!' at last observed, 'Il faut que je compose cela.' Paer appeared quite proud of having thus been the cause of the composition of Beethoven's Fidelio, and the truth of this story, which I had from his own lips, is beyond a doubt. FERDINAND HILLER."

Every trait which can contribute to an elucidation of Beethoven's character, and to the history of the origin of his works, is welcome. Paer's statement, however, differs materially from the version given by M. Berlioz. According to Paer, Beethoven was ingenuously moved by what he saw and heard, and involuntarily expressing his feeling and inclination to set the same subject to music. Here we find no indication of the rudesse humoriste, nor of the "malicious irony" which Berlioz describes: Votre opéra me plaît, j'ai envie de le mettre en musique!

Friedrich Treitschke *, at that period stage manager and poet of the two court theatres in Vienna, and who, at Beethoven's request, arranged the libretto of the opera when it was revised in 1814, has written as follows:—

"It was at the end of 1804, that the Baron von Braun, the new proprietor of the Imperial Privilegirtes Theater an der Wien, suggested to Ludwig van Beethoven, then in the prime of his youthful powers, that he should compose an opera for that establishment. It was thought, from the oratorio of Christus am Oelberg (Christ on the Mount of Olives), that the composer would produce as great things in dramatic music as he had previously done for purely instrumental music. Besides a money payment, he was offered free lodgings in the theatre. Joseph Sonnleithner undertook to furnish the libretto, and selected the French story L'Amour Conjugal (by Bouilly), although it had been already set to music by Gaveaux, as well as composed, with Italian words, by Paer, under the title of Leonora, both versions being translated into German. Beethoven did not, however, fear his predecessors, but set, heart and soul, about his task, which was nearly concluded about the middle of 1805."

The first performance took place on the 20th November, under unfavourable circumstances. The nobility had quitted the capital, and the inhabitants avoided the theatre, so that the audience, at the first three representations, consisted principally of the French military.

The question now arises: When was Paer's Leonora written, and at what period of Paer's residence in Vienna was it performed? In the autumn of 1798, Gaveaux's Amour Conjugal was produced for the first time in Paris. At that time Paer was living in Vienna, where Beethoven also had been since 1792. Paer remained in the Austrian capital till 1802, but as early as Easter of that year accepted the post of Capellmeister in Dresden, his wife (previously Mlle. Riccardi) being engaged as prima donna at the Dresden Italian Opera. From Dresden, in 1806, Paer followed the Emperor Napoleon to Warsaw, and thence, after the peace of Tilsit, to Paris, where he occupied a very honourable position until his death, on the 3rd May, 1839. Paer's Leonora, therefore, while he, the composer himself, was in Vienna, can only have been given during the interval between 1799 and 1801 inclusive, or, if not then, in 1803, at the beginning of which year, according to Gerber's Lexicon, Paer "again visited Vienna for a short period, and composed a new oratorio for the Witwen Akademie, during Lent (den Fasten), 1803."

In the list of Paer's operas from 1799 to 1808, in Gerber, Leonora is wanting; 1799, Camilla; 1800, Griselda, Il Morto vivo; 1801, Achilles, Poche ma Buone, Der Brausekopf, Der lustige Schuster; 1802, L'Intrigo amoroso — his first opera in Dresden; 1803, Die Wegelagerer Sargino. According to this, Leonora may have been composed in 1802, and produced in Vienna at the beginning of 1803, when Beethoven may have experienced the impression described, have nourished his design till the following year, and then suggested the subject to Sonnleithner for the opera which the Baron von Braun wished to obtain.

THE extra performances at the two Italian Operas continue, and resemble one another. The singers do not seem to enjoy them, the public does not attend them, and we need scarcely add, that the managers, to all appearances, lose money by them. Why then do these representations take place? Last Monday, at the Royal Italian Opera, the Puritani, in many respects the most masterly of Bellini's works, was performed to empty boxes—and this at a theatre where the "cast" of the Puritani is as good if not better than could be formed in any other in Europe. To frequent an Italian Opera in England a certain amount of musical taste (due allowance being made for the mere fashionableness of a certain kind of amateurism), and a considerable amount of money are required. Accordingly, the operatic habitués of London constitute but a limited class; but as this is the class that support Italian Operas, it is to it that the managers of our Italian Opera Houses should appeal. It is easy, no doubt, and, for a time may be profitable, for directors to address themselves to persons outside this circle (as on the extra nights of which we complain), but in the long run any such scheme must be attended with failure. The singers and musicians, by a natural law which makes oft-repeated pleasures no pleasures at all, cease to take interest in an occupation which, from delightful, becomes irksome; the subscribers soon remark the journalier tone which pervades not only the extra, but also the so-called (and justly entitled) ordinary, performances; and suddenly the director is surprised to find that these extra performances represent to him simply an extra loss. They not only fatigue the artists but weary the public, and, as the number of opera-goers is not increased by them, but rather the contrary, it is somewhat difficult to understand what can prompt managers to persist in giving them.

If questioned on the subject managers would, we believe, reply that an increased number of performances is rendered necessary by their increased expenses, and by the extraordinary number of singers which it is now the fashion at each house to engage. This argument is based, of course, upon the supposition that the amount of money received from the public is in proportion to the number of representations given. We believe any such hypothesis to be false, but it is one that is likely to find, and indeed has found, favour in the eyes of directors. The rival lessees of our two Opera Houses are so determined to ruin one another, that at the beginning of a season each endeavours to cut off the other's supplies by buying up all the singers, from soprano sfogato to basso profondo, that happen to be in the market. At Her Majesty's Theatre, the parts of "Raoul," the "Duke of Mantua," "Almaviva," and "Edgardo," are played by four different tenors. Mr. E. T. Smith does not absolutely want four tenors, but he does not want either Giuglini, Mongini, Belart or the newly acquired Steger to be engaged by Mr. Gye. Mlle. Lotti again, and several other vocalists who might be mentioned are chiefly of negative service to Her Majesty's Theatre; singing there only at long intervals, but prevented by their engagements from singing at Covent Garden. Mr. Smith has a number of artists in his company who are of no use to him, except in so far that by retaining their services he has prevented them from being of any use to Mr. Gye; and Mr. Gye pursues much the same method with regard to Mr. Smith. This system of management, however ingenious, is expensive, and has moreover this disadvantage—that unless carried out to the fullest extent it answers no purpose whatever. It is of no avail to retain the services of four tenors if there are four other tenors alive just as good—and to engage eight (supposing eight to represent the maximum of really attractive tenors in the world) is what, even in these days of managerial extravagance, no one has yet dreamed of.

In their efforts to ruin one another we are very much afraid the rival impresarii will in the end ruin themselves. On the other hand, if they would pursue an emulative, instead of an envious, line of policy, there is just a chance that both might succeed. We should be glad, for our part, if they would content themselves with engaging small but highly efficient companies, so that, at least, the apparent necessity would be done away with of giving these wearisome extra performances.

PRINCE GALITZIN advertises a "Russian Concert" for the 20th at St. James's Hall, and amateurs of music are asking one another who this Prince Galitzin is, and what this Russian Concert is to be that he proposes to give for the benefit of Garibaldi, and at which the Prince himself is to conduct. Some even go so far as to ask how it is that a Russian nobleman in such a position as Prince Galitzin occupies, ventures to get up an entertainment in honour of a man whom the despotic party in Austria and Russia regard as a rebel and a revolutionist of the worst kind. The late Czar would not precisely have smiled on a Russian prince who had announced a concert for the benefit of Garibaldi; but though the Garibaldi of 1860 is still the Garibaldi of 1848, the Emperor Alexander is not the Emperor Nicholas, nor is the Russia of the present day to be judged of by the Russia of the past reign.

As for the Prince Galitzin, who is to make his appearance on Wednesday at St. James's Hall, he is the son of Prince Nicolas Galitzin, to whom Beethoven dedicated three of his last quartets, and under whom Prince George (he of St. James's Hall) served against us and our quondam allies in the Crimean war. Prince George Galitzin has an estate at Tamboff, and has long paid especial attention to the musical education of his peasants. He himself teaches the children to sing, and admits those who have attained a certain proficiency into a choir which he has spent eighteen years in forming, and which includes every range of voice from the highest sopranos to lower basses, by at least half an octave than are met with in this country or in Italy. These picked choristers—of whom, when we heard them four years ago at Moscow there were as many as eighty, of all sizes and ages—are excellent musicians, and read any part music at sight. That they have a good knowledge of harmony may be inferred from the fact, that they will sing any chord of four notes in any key on the chord being named, and without hearing it struck. This was shown at the time of the coronation of the Emperor Alexander, in Prince Galitzin's house at Moscow, where the Tamboff choir sung various sacred compositions by Mozart, Bortniansky, &c., and afterwards underwent a sort of examination in the presence of Oulibicheff, Josse, the chef d'orchestre of the Théâtre Français, Durand, the organist of the Panthéon, Lablache, Tagliafico, and a number of other musicians and amateurs. A variety of chords were named, all of which were satisfactorily given by the singers. The service of the Russian Church is sung without accompaniment, and Prince Galitzin's singers, who are, above all, singers of sacred music, are in the habit of performing without the aid of any instrument. Several times at the conclusion of a long piece the Prince verified the final chord at the piano, when it appeared that, contrary to all precedent, the voices had not fallen even the eighth part of a note.

Another remarkable thing in the performance of these Tamboff singers, is the manner in which, in certain compositions, they do, or rather do not, take their breath. Thus, they will chant the creed or the Lord's prayer from beginning to end without stopping to breathe even for an instant. Such at least is the effect upon the audience; but as the Galitzin choristers live, like the rest of us, by inhalation, we imagine the Prince must have arranged some system by which they take their breath in sections, say ten at a time, so that out of the eighty, seventy only are continually singing.

The advertisements do not set forth explicitly that Prince Galitzin has brought his choristers with him to London; but we know that it was his intention to do so, and if he has left them behind, all we can say is, that he had better telegraph for them to Tamboff without delay.

M. LEOPOLD DE MEYER'S pianoforte-playing seems to be universally appreciated. Such a result is by no means surprising, inasmuch as he comes forward with ingenuous frankness, and says "Je suis VIRTUOSE—et voilà tout." To be a virtuose of the first water, however, is no such easy matter, and M. de Meyer is doubtless aware that the way of the virtuose-proper, and the way of the "classic"-performer (so termed), who gives undivided attention to the old masters, differ entirely. Like two parallel lines they can never meet; or at the best—supposing an idiosyncratic sympathy on the part of the virtuose towards the "classic" style, or on the part of the "classic" towards the brilliant mechanical feats of the virtuose—they may be compared to the asymptotes of the hyperbola, which, though continually approaching each other, can never by any possibility come into actual contact. A critic in The Times (apparently a new hand), writing of M. de Meyer's performance at Mad. Anichini's recent concert, would seem to entertain this opinion, to judge by the tenor of some of his observations:—

"Among the instrumental pieces was a grand fantasia, for pianoforte alone, composed and performed by Herr Leopold de Meyer, pianist to the Emperor of Austria, and in his particular walk, the most extraordinary 'manipulator' now before the public. This gentleman combines a force and vigour of hand, which few have equalled, with a delicate lightness of touch and liquid softness of tone that have never been surpassed. He brings these opposite qualities into play with marvellous address, blending or alternating them as the humour seizes him, and with such consistency that, while the ear is always satisfied, the taste is never offended. M. de Meyer's fantasia-playing, moreover, —like his music—is quite as original as it is astonishing. He has a vein exclusively his own, and is indebted to no other source than that of his invention, whether for ideas or for the method of handling them. Making no pretence to be an exponent of what is conventionally termed the 'classical' school, he does not provoke criticism by an imperfect conception and execution of acknowledged masterpieces. He moves within the sphere most congenial to his artistic nature, and he does wisely, for in that sphere he stands aloof from competition. It is not intended by this to insinuate that M. de Meyer would fail if he ventured on higher and more intellectual ground; but at the same time, as sincere appreciators of his really exceptional talent, we should counsel him to leave the "great masters" (and especially the "old masters") to themselves; for, in order to ride comfortably over their domain, he would have to invent a new and peculiar bridle to restrain his Pegasus within bounds."

The Morning Post, without theorising, expresses itself with unreserved enthusiasm about the playing of M. de Meyer at the concert for the benefit of the Royal Society of Female Musicians:—

"Of the instrumental performances, unexceptionably excellent as they all were, Herr Leopold de Meyer's Fantaisie Originale, composed by himself, unquestionably produced the greatest effect. His 'exécution foudroyante'—to use the words of an eminent French critic—seemed to electrify the audience, who listened with evident astonishment to the prodigious tours de force of the Briarean pianist; and at the termination of his performance gave vent to their delight in a perfect storm of applause, which could only be quelled by a repetition of the entire piece."

We could quote further, but have copied enough to show that when a really clever artist, be he foreigner or be he native, prefers to do no more than he can do to perfection, he may rely upon unanimous acceptance.

THERE has just been founded in Russia an institution which does honour to that country. The Gazette du Nord published in its last number but one, an account of the situation of the Fund for the Relief of Literary Men and Savants in Russia. This society, established only a few months by the élite of Russian authors, and by the directors of the principal papers and reviews, is not, the Gazette du Nord says, a mutual benefit society. To share in its advantages, it is sufficient for any one to be a literary or scientific man, to be presented by a member, or merely to write to the Committee. Widows and orphans also have a right to assistance. A great degree of eagerness, exceedingly honourable to the national character, has been manifested among all classes to aid the Society in carrying out its proposed aim. The Emperor and his family have been pleased to put their names down for an annual subscription of 1,300 silver roubles, 240*l.* The most celebrated literary men have engaged to give a certain per-centage on the produce of their works; several artists have done the same; and the directors of the principal reviews have resolved to pay the Society a fixed royalty on every subscription to their publications. Some well-known publishers have entered into a similar agreement for the works they may bring out; and many private individuals, connected neither with literature, science, nor art, have liberally contributed to show their wish for the diffusion of knowledge, as well as their respect for those who devote themselves to it. The Society has already been enabled to grant annual pensions to the amount of 2,160 silver roubles, 365*l.*, and to distribute in the form of temporary aid, 1,300 silver roubles, 208*l.* The capital, which, on the 2nd (14th) February, was only 8,536 silver roubles, 1,365*l.*, at present amounts to 18,236 silver roubles, 2,918*l.* The number of members is 407. M. Sasonoff announces that the Gazette du Nord has opened, in favour of the Literary Fund, a subscription list, and invites not only his compatriots in Paris, but every one interested in the cause of liberty of thought, to contribute to it.

THE THEATRES.

JUST at this present time the non-lyrical theatres do not afford much matter of discourse, nor are we aware that any important novelty is forthcoming. Bills wear a stereotyped look, as if managers had resolved to depend on the same resources for a long time.

The immobility of the Olympic programme rests, we believe, on a solid success. Mr. F. Robson's Uncle Zachary is stamped as one of his very best semi-serious parts, ranking with Daddy Hardacre and Samson Burr in the Porter's Knot; and the farce called B.B. chiming in with the prize-fighting mania, caused by the arrival of Heenan, has continued efficient as a provocative of mirth, though the feeling to which it immediately appealed no longer animates the public. Whenever Robson makes a "hit" in a new part, the prosperity of the Olympic is certain for weeks; of that fact there can be no question. The other members of the company, particularly Mr. Addison, have had an opportunity of distinguishing themselves in the new version of La Belle Mère, which, under the title of Dearest Mamma, has been played with great success.

Thanks to the pre-eminence of Mr. and Mrs. Wigan in their own natural style of acting, and to the broad humour of Mr. Toole, the drama, It's an ill Wind that blows nobody Good, though scarcely substantial enough for the Adelphi Theatre, has kept its place for several weeks, and will not be removed till the end of Mr. and Mrs. Wigan's engagement. Mr. Falconer's comedy, The Family Secret, assailed with more or less vehemence by nearly all the critics, gives equal signs of vitality at the Haymarket, and promises to remain there as long as Miss Amy Sedgwick. For practical purposes in the theatrical world, what are all the rules of art, all the laws of taste, compared to that stage-tact, by virtue of which a number of established favourites are placed effectively before the public. Mr. Falconer has written a very indifferent play, but he has allowed his audience to look at a great many persons, who are constant objects of delight, and he can laugh at his censors, sound as their doctrines may be.

A successful burlesque at the Strand is certain of longevity, and though we are now forgetting Whitsuntide, Mr. F. Talfourd's Easter-piece, The Miller and his Men, still flourishes in the bills. There is a large class of Londoners that never grows weary of burlesque, and this finds its particular source of recreation at the Strand Theatre, where all is done to give effect to the most grotesque kind of humour.

The symbol of immobility at the Princess's is Mr. Phelps, who fills up the recess produced by the closing of his own theatre, with a course of legitimate performances before a West-end audience. He is steadily and creditably working his way through all his leading parts, and some weeks will probably elapse before his agreeable task is finished. Messengers from the East inform us that Mr. James Anderson is labouring with similar zeal for the same cause at the National Standard.

The French plays at the St. James's Theatre, under the management of M. Talexy, deserve much more extensive patronage than they apparently receive. M. Octave Feuillet's last new comedy, La Tentation, is a heavy work to produce, with a long list of dramatis personæ, and we do not know where we should find a play of such magnitude, acted with such general efficiency as by the company of which M. Brindeau and Mlle. Duverger were chiefs. Then, for a light piece of the conversational kind, nothing can be more charming than the Cheveu Blanc, as acted by Mlle. Duverger and M. Paul Devaux. Since the days of Mr. Mitchell there has not been an attempt made for the establishment of French drama in London, that can in any way compare with the enterprise of M. Talexy.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

ON Saturday the Huguenots was repeated.

On Monday — an extra night — Semiramide was the opera.

The Barbiere, on Tuesday, introduced Signor Ciampi, the long-announced buffo, in the character of Doctor Bartolo. The attractions of the opera and new singer were further enhanced by the last act of Rigoletto for Mlle. Brunetti, Madame Lemaire, Signors Mongini, Sebastiano Ronconi and Vialetti, and the new ballet Adelina, and drew one of the most crowded audiences of the season. Signor Ciampi made an immense "hit," one of the most legitimate, in fact, ever remembered at Her Majesty's Theatre. The place left void by the death of Lablache seems likely to be filled up. This is saying a great deal when it is considered that Signor Ciampi is only 21 years of age. But his powers are rare indeed. He has a capital full-toned voice, sings like a thorough artist, possesses the finest musical instincts; and, as an actor, is natural, versatile, and entirely original. The first decided sensation he produced was in the air which Bartolo sings to Rosina, after discovering she has purloined his paper to write a letter. This was rendered with such true comic spirit and unction, and so admirably vocalised —not a note being slurred, nor a point missed, as to create quite a furore. The artist from this moment was scrutinised with eager eyes from all parts of the house; he did not quail, however, under the examination, but went on improving his position, satisfying the entire audience at the end that a genuine artist stood before them—one destined to take his station in the highest rank. We shall soon have an opportunity of speaking more definitively of Signor Ciampi, who will shortly appear in Don Pasquale, the Matrimonio Segreto, and Cenerentola.

On Thursday, the Huguenots was repeated.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

A VERY admirable performance took place on Monday night of Bellini's Puritani, the melodies of which, always fresh, exquisite, and expressive, have rendered, and will continue to render it, one of the most popular operas, not only with the crowd, who are only able to feel its sensuous beauty, but with those sufficiently well informed to appreciate the qualities which constitute it the artistic masterpiece of the composer. Had Bellini lived to go on writing, his Puritani may be accepted as a guarantee that he would have progressed in the right direction.

Much was said last season in praise of Mad. Penco's "Elvira," but not a word beyond its genuine deserts, as a remarkably earnest, intelligent, and refined impersonation. An objection might be raised, that, in the great scene of the second act, where the unhappy Elvira is distracted and demented by the supposed infidelity of her lover, a laudable anxiety to give all the necessary pathos, leads her into an abuse of the occasionally effective vibrato.

But for this her "Qui la voce," like "Son vergin vezzosa," and all the rest, in short, would have been perfect.

The music of Giorgio is too low for Signor Ronconi, who, however, sings it artistically, and acts the part of the old Puritan with graphic truthfulness. Signor Graziani's fine voice is heard to great advantage in the music of Riccardo, although it is sometimes too deep for his register. The first movement of the cavatina, "Ah non sempre," is better suited to him than the cabaletta, which demands more even and fluent execution. The Arturo of Signor Gardoni is one of his best performances. The amorous and yet heroic Cavalier is well impersonated by this gentleman, whose singing is invariably careful and finished. In the last scene Signor Gardoni rises with the situation. The small part of Henrietta was extremely well sustained by Madame Tagliafico. The band and chorus were faultless, and the performance thoroughly enjoyed by the audience. The house was but moderately well attended.

On Tuesday Dinorah was given, when Her Majesty attended, and at the end of the opera inspected the show of flowers in the new Floral Hall. The exhibition elicited unqualified admiration from Her Majesty, the Prince Consort, and a numerous suite.

On Thursday, Fra Diavolo was given for the last time this season.

WORDS FOR MUSIC.*

HAPPY swallow! heaven's darling,
Blest above all birds that fly!
Blackbird, linnet, finch, or starling
Winter's blast must brave or die;
But the swallow
Still doth follow
Balmy summer through the sky.

What, though still for ever roving,
Parting never brings a sigh,
Tender friends and mate so loving Wander with thee through the sky;
Where the beaming
Sun is gleaming
There thy home and country lie.

I, alas! who, like the swallow,
Journey brighter days to find,
Still a fleeting phantom follow,
Leaving friends and love behind.
Skies may lower,
Sleets may shower;
Summer is where hearts are kind.

C. L. K.

TO MARIETTA ALBONI.

SONG has two spells—the one a heav'nly birth,
That carries with its strong and upward flight,
As with an eagle's clutch and wing of might,
The panting spirit far beyond the earth;—
It sweeps the skies, and belts the star-paved girth
Of that broad road, where travel day and night
Sublime and unapproachable delight,
Measureless sadness, or Titanic mirth.
The other lowlier, yet not less divine—
A child of love and laughter, smile and tear,
Softly or sadly fans the soul to sleep;
A rapture not so boundless, though more deep;
A joy less mighty, yet a bliss more dear;—
And that, sweet voice, the song whose spell is thine.

M. ADOLPHE HENSELT, the well-known pianist and composer, has received, in his capacity as Inspector-General of the Musical Establishments of St. Petersburg, the Cross of Knight of the Order of St. Wladimir. It is the first time that this decoration, which the Emperor confers in person, and which is generally given to persons of high rank, has been bestowed on an artist.

HISTRIONIC POPULATION OF EUROPE.—According to statistical returns, there are now in Europe 18,140 actors, 21,609 actresses, and 1,733 theatrical managers. The number of persons connected in various ways with dramatic establishments amounts altogether to 82,216.

HERR KOPPITZ, a performer on the flute, of continental reputation, has just arrived in London. He has not yet appeared in public, but is, we understand, to play at the Philharmonic Society's concert, on the 2nd July—the last of the season. Having had an opportunity of hearing him, we may assure our musical readers—those especially who are amateurs of the flute—that his performance is calculated to give them an extraordinary treat. He not only plays with a brilliancy of tone and execution which we have never heard equalled, but possesses the singular facility of producing sequences of double notes, forming regular harmony in two parts—a thing hitherto considered impossible on that instrument. —Illustrated London News.

LAST HOURS OF ALBERT SMITH.

UNTIL nine years of age Albert Smith was so delicate and of so fragile an appearance, that he was nicknamed by a friend "Little China." After this time, however, he became strong and so healthy, that, to use a common expression—probably more true in his case than in many others to whom it has been applied—he knew not what a day's illness was until December last.

On the 22nd of December, 1859, after giving his entertainment as usual at the Egyptian Hall, he returned home, and occupied himself till one o'clock in the morning by hanging pictures in a new room. He retired to rest without a complaint of any kind. Early in the morning of the 23rd he had a convulsive seizure while asleep, and from this he passed into a state of profound coma, with stertorous breathing; rousing from this coma after nearly an hour's interval, he became violently excited in manner, but was unable to speak. The period of excitement lasted for twenty minutes, and was followed by another fit, this by coma, and again by violent excitement. He was bled freely by his medical attendant, Dr. Ree, the back of the neck was blistered, and sinapisms applied to the feet and legs; but the severity of the convulsions, coma, and excitement continued until two o'clock P.M., the patient passing through a series of them, about eight in the hour. After taking Indian hemp the convulsions ceased, the excitement diminished, but, with the exception of two or three words, the power of articulation was lost. There was no paralysis of either face or limbs; there was no albuminuria. Sleep followed in the evening, and about midday on the 24th the faculty of speech returned, and from this time there was rapid amendment. Within a few days his repeated expression was, "I never felt better in my life; I am only surprised I have not lost strength."

On Friday, the 11th of May, Mr. Smith was exposed to wet, and suffered in the evening from "cold." On the 12th he was again more severely exposed, getting "wet through," and did not change his clothes for three hours, and on the evening of this day he coughed much, and felt weak. On the Sunday he rested; but on Monday resumed his duties at the hall. He felt weak, wheezed in his breathing, could scarcely lie down at night, lost all appetite, but continued his avocations daily and nightly until Saturday afternoon, May 19th, and until that time had no medical advice. On Saturday he was seen by Dr. Ree, who found generally diffused bronchitis, with dulness on percussion at the base of the right lung posteriorly, and fine crepitation in the same locality. The pulse was laboured, not more than eighty-six per minute. The obstruction to the respiration was great. The expectoration, very little of which was raised, was sanguinolent; the face pallid; the tongue extremely foul, and breath very offensive. Cupping-glasses were very freely applied to the back of the chest, and blisters were raised by strong acetum cantharidis; at the same time a mixture of squills, nitric ether, and ammonia was given every four or five hours.

Delirium supervened on the night of Saturday, but on Sunday there was slight relief to the respiration. The stomach now rejected everything, and continued to do so until Monday, the 21st. On this day the patient resolved to get up and attempt his performance at the Egyptian

Hall, and in the afternoon dressed himself for this purpose. He was persuaded to relinquish the idea, and was seen in consultation by Dr. Reynolds and Dr. Ree. The vomiting had now ceased, after taking a dose of a mixture containing a small quantity of dilute hydrocyanic acid. The bronchitis was general throughout the whole of the thorax, on either side, and both above and below. There was fine mucous and subcrepitant rhoncus. Expiration was extremely prolonged. In the left subclavicular region, where there was slight pain, friction sound was audible. The base of the right lung was dull on percussion, and, except when a strong effort at respiration was made, was silent, no air appearing to find entrance. The pulse was laboured, and only eighty per minute; the surface cool; the face pallid; the tongue very foul; and the bowels confined. There had been no sleep for several nights. Complained of prostration. From several causes, no examination of the urine could be obtained. The chest was enveloped in spongio-piline, wrung out of hot water; and at night, calomel, colocynth, and opium were given: beef-tea, sherry, and Seltzer water were taken freely and ad libitum.

Tuesday, May 22nd, nine A.M.—Some sleep in the night, but much wandering; condition of the chest much the same as at last report, but air appears to enter rather more freely; complains of great prostration, but says his breathing is easier; the pulse is slow and laborious; the surface dusky; no headache; no pain. Ammonia and decoction of bark, with tincture of squills, were ordered to be taken every four hours; and brandy, beef-tea, and wine with beaten eggs, were given and taken freely.

In the afternoon at six o'clock he was seen by Dr. Burrows, Dr. Reynolds, and Dr. Ree. By this time the bowels had acted very freely; the chest condition was the same as in the morning, but there was less feeling of prostration, and the aspect was somewhat improved. Another blister was ordered to the right side, the mixture was to be continued, and calomel and opium to be given every six hours.

At eleven P.M., he was again seen by Dr. Ree, when he was about the same, and, in answer to a question, said, "I feel no pain whatever, and nothing else but extreme weakness." He was ordered to continue the use of the medicine, the stimulants, and nourishment.

At five o'clock on the following morning Dr. Ree was summoned in great haste, and found the patient much prostrated, bordering on collapse. Hot water bottles had been applied to the feet and legs, and brandy with eggs and strong coffee were freely administered, under the influence of which the pulse got up, the surface became warm, and he was able to answer several questions. At this time (half-past seven), although it was painfully evident the poor invalid could not last long, there was no sign of rapid dissolution, and Dr. Ree left, under a promise to return in an hour; but within that time an urgent message called him again to the house, too late, however, to see his patient alive: he had just breathed his last.—The Lancet, June 2.

CAMBRIDGE.—The festival holden last Tuesday in the chapel of King's College, in aid of a fund for providing for the wants of widows and orphans of members of cathedral and collegiate choirs, was a complete success. The committee who worked so hard may congratulate themselves that no untoward occurrence marred the effect of their labours. From first to last there was no "hitch;" and the most eager promoter of the scheme could not, if he had had the power of selection, have provided a day more brilliant and enjoyable. It was bright, warm, and dry: and the eye was continually refreshed by that luxury of green which Cambridge boasts in early summer.

One saw on Monday that something was "looming in the future" by the arrival of strangers, who were promenading the streets and the college grounds all the evening; and on Tuesday morning the early trains brought so many reinforcements that the question forced itself upon notice—how are they all to be seated? The arrangement was, that the doors should be opened at eleven: but it is not written in the history of festivals that people wait patiently until the appointed time. Before ten, streams began to converge towards the centre of attraction, the holders of blue tickets making their way to the great gates of the college and the south door of the chapel, the entrance appointed for the nave; and the holders of red and pink tickets getting into the grounds by the gate near Clare College, and into the choir by the north door of the chapel. The early comers had to wait an hour or more at the doors before they could get in. The doors were opened at 11.

It takes a long time to fill King's College Chapel as it was filled on Tuesday, through two small doors. On and on flowed the stream into the nave and the unreserved part of the choir. Speaking of the latter, one might have thought that every seat was filled long before there was the least break in the constant flow. "The cry was still, they come," even after the avenues had got choked up by crowds apparently looking in vain for a resting-place. Somehow or other, people got gradually shaken down into their places. Fresh forms were brought in, although we supposed every available form in Cambridge had already been seized, and the number of persons left without a seat was materially reduced. Meanwhile, by twelve o'clock, chaos was reduced to order, and the entire area presented a dense mass of living beings. The whole space could not be taken in by the eye from any part of the floor of the chapel; those in the choir could see only the choir, and those in the nave could see only the nave; but in this limited way, the sight was one not soon to be forgotten.

It was a few minutes past twelve when morning prayer began. The service was intoned by Mr. Beard, and the Provost read the lessons. The order of the service was as follows:—

MORNING PRAYER.

Preces, Responses, &c.	Tallis.
Venite	Humphrey.
Psalms.	Pratt.
Service in F	Travers.
Anthem, "O sing unto the Lord"	Purcell.

ANTHEMS.

1 Hallelujah	Beethoven.
2 Lord, who shall dwell?	Prof. Bennett.
3 I beheld, and lo!	Blow.
4 Praise the Lord	Goss.
5 Blessed be the God	S. S. Wesley.
6 Hosanna to the Son	O. Gibbons.
7 O be joyful	G. J. Elvey.
8 Praise the Lord	Croft.
9 Hallelujah	Handel.

The effect of sacred compositions rendered by a large number of trained human voices, aided by the tones of such an organ as the one in

> "That tall pile,
> Whose ancient pillars rear their marble heads,
> To bear aloft its arch'd and pond'rous roof,
> By its own weight made steadfast and immovable," is not unknown to many; and if it were, we can frame no language which would convey a proper idea of it. Perhaps the best performed anthems were Professor Sterndale Bennett's "Lord, who shall dwell in thy tabernacle?" and Dr. Elvey's, "O be joyful in God." But the gem was Handel's "Hallelujah" chorus, which one can never hear without emotion.

Professor Bennett directed the performance throughout, except that Dr. Elvey, of Windsor, conducted his own anthem. Mr. Amps, organist of King's College, played the organ, assisted by Mr. Hopkins, organist of Trinity College, and Mr. Garrett, organist of St. John's College. Members of the following choirs took part in the performance: St. Paul's, Westminster Abbey, Temple, Windsor (St. George's Chapel), Norwich, Peterborough, Lincoln, Ely, and the College chapels of Cambridge. The number of voices was 125. The number of persons accommodated in the choir, exclusive of Fellows and attendants, was 1,374; and in the nave 1,940; making a total of 3,314. The sum collected at the doors was 266*l.* 0s. 6d., of which 77*l.* was in gold. This is an increase of about 34*l.* over the sum collected at the festival six years ago. After the proceedings in the chapel had terminated, the members of the various choirs were entertained in a sumptuous manner in the hall, at the expense of the college. Provision was made for 160. The Vice-Provost presided, and the Provost joined the party before they broke up. Professor Bennett and several members of the university were also present. Few things even in the chapel produced a finer effect than the "Non nobis, Domine," at this entertainment. To conclude, 80 policemen and attendants were entertained in the hall, after the choirs. —Cambridge Chronicle, May 26, 1860.

THE PIANOFORTE: its Origin, Progress, and Construction; with numerous Musical Illustrations. By E. F. RIMBAULT, LL.D. One vol. royal 4to. 436 pages, illustrated with a Frontispiece in colours and 68 Woodcuts and Diagrams. Price, bound in cloth, £1, 16s. This work, with HOPKINS and RIMBAULT'S celebrated "History of the Organ," constitute the only reliable (and hitherto much wanted) authority on these Instruments.

HAUSER'S LIEDER OHNE WORTE, for Violin; with Accompaniment for Pianoforte. Six Numbers, each 2s. Most beautiful compositions, admirably arranged for Violin and Piano. Most highly appreciated by violinists.

HAUSER'S DECAMERON, Favourite Operatic and National Airs, arranged for Violin, with Pianoforte Accompaniment. Twelve Numbers, each 1s. 6d. These elegant arrangements are remarkable for facility of execution. They supply a desideratum long felt, viz. the want of music for Violin and Piano, popular and graceful in character, but such as not to overtax the powers of ordinary performers.

THE WEDDING WALTZES, for Piano. By W. VINCENT WALLACE, composer of "Lurline." Splendidly illustrated, 4s. "A beautiful set, full of melody."—BRIGHTON HERALD.

THE DEPARTURE of the SWALLOWS: a Musical Sketch for the Pianoforte. By HENRY F. LIMPUS. A very effective little piece, easily committed to memory.

FIGARO, Polka pour Piano. Par D. MAGNUS. 2s. 6d. Characteristic, and full of vigour.

LE REVE d'une MERE, Berceuse, pour Piano. Par D. MAGNUS. 2s. A charming little piece, reflecting honour upon the Composer.

AU GRE' des FLOTS, Caprice Etude, pour Piano. Par D. MAGNUS. 2s. 6d. Not difficult, but brilliant and effective.

LADY CLARA VERE de VERE: Song. By Miss M. LINDSAY (Mrs. J. Worthington Bliss). Poetry by TENNYSON. 2s. Every way worthy of the composer of "Excelsior," "The Bridge," and "Maud."

"TOO LATE, TOO LATE:" Sacred Song. By Miss M. LINDSAY (Mrs. J. Worthington Bliss). Words by TENNYSON. Elegantly decorated title. 2s. 6d. The composer has been unusually happy in setting these favourite lines of Tennyson.

SOUVENIRS de VERDI. Par W. C. FILBY. Trois Fantaisies pour Piano. No. 1. Rigoletto; No. 2. Ernani; No. 3. Macbeth. Each 2s. "Most agreeable operatic reminiscences."

FLOWERS of MELODY, by ERNEST HENSEL (Sechs Ton Blümchen aus beliebten Opern), for Piano. No. 1, Il Balen, from Il Trovatore. No. 2, Durch Die Wälder, from Der Freischütz. No. 3, Cavatina, from Semiramide. No. 4, Finale, from Der Freischütz. No. 5, [Cavatina, from] Lucia di Lammermoor. No. 6, Qui la Voce, from I Puritani. Each 1s. Much admired for their graceful flow and facility.

THE TEAR: Valse Sympathique, for Piano. By E. BENNETT GILBERT. 2s. 6d. "Mona (pensée fugitive pour Piano, by the same composer) and The Tear are two very charming productions."—BRIGHTON HERALD.

STAR of the EVENING. By ALPHONSE LEDUC. Fantasia for Piano. 2s. A most pleasing arrangement by the elegant French composer, and perfectly easy.

"MARGUERITE:" Song. By the admired Authoress of "Fading Away." 2s. "In Marguerite we can safely recommend one of the most charming ballads we have heard for a long time."—BRIGHTON HERALD.

MUSIC AND THEATRES IN PARIS.

(From our own correspondent).

June 20.

I HAVE not much to tell you of this week as touching musical events. The principal fact to be recorded under this head is a concert given by a M. L. Wiest, a German violinist, but whether by birth, or education only, I know not. He is chapel master to some prince at Bucharest, but seems to devote himself to the light fantastic style, and to eschew serious and solid music. What he played was his own handiwork, and served mainly to display certain sentimental graces mingled with dashing feats of execution. Indeed I should not mention the concert at all but that among the executants was Theodore Ritter, the pianist, who your readers will remember produced such a legitimate sensation at the last Philharmonic Concert in London, in one of Hummel's concertos. He is indeed an artist of pure and correct taste as well as rare mechanical ability, entirely free from those paltry tricks and affectations, those senseless caprices of accentuation by which so many artists strive to entrap the judgment of their audience and pass for persons of unusual depth of perception. All he does is simple, clear, and honest, and distinguished withal by a rare degree of finish. In scale passages he is brilliantly clear and rapid, and when he has a melody to deliver it receives all the expression due to its character without any attempt to torture it into extra impressiveness.

M. Wicart, the Belgian tenor, whose re-engagement at the Grand Opera I announced in my last, made his appearance last Friday as Arnold in Guillaume Tell. A great deal of curiosity was felt, to ascertain whether this artist had indeed made all the progress attributed to him since his first appearance in Paris. The result has proved in excess of whatever was anticipated, and so decided was his success that the strongest desire is expressed that he should in future make Paris his artistic home. His voice is of considerable extent, powerful, and especially clear and telling in the upper notes. In the celebrated air, "Asile héréditaire," followed by the stretta, "Amis, secondez ma vaillance," which is the trying piece of the part, and the one which would decide the character of his success, Wicart was enthusiastically applauded and several times re-called. He is to appear again in the same opera, and then twice as Raoul in the Huguenots; his engagement being only for four nights. I understand that the report of the commissioners appointed to make enquiries as to the most suitable locality for the new Opera House has been sent in, and that the decision is in favour of the site on the Boulevard des Capucines. The commission consisted of the following personages, M. Chaix d'Estange, chairman; M. Caristie, architect; and MM. Cornudet, Eugène Scribe, Varin, L. Véron, and Denière. Herold's maiden triumph at the Opéra Comique, Les Rosières, just revived, as I mentioned last week for the first time since 1826, is still running, and meets with increased success every night. It is admirably executed, every part being well filled.

At the command of the authorities all the theatres in Paris broke out last week into lyrical ecstasies of patriotic enthusiasm at the annexation of Savoy and Nice to the French territory. M. Méry, whose muse is ever at the disposal of official grief or rejoicing, emitted three strophes on the occasion for the use of the opera, and M. J. Cohen wedded them to strains of befitting harmony. The Opéra Comique, the Théâtre Lyrique, and the Théâtre Dejazet, had each its cantata, called France et Savoie in each instance. It may interest your readers to know that the amusements of the Parisians during the month of May, in the way of theatres, concerts, balls, and other public entertainments, reduced the contents of their pockets to the extent of 1,206,523 francs 40 centimes, or £48,260.

A correspondent at Strasburg informs me that Mad. Sanchioli is shortly expected there to give a grand concert at the theatre. This singer, you will remember, was engaged at Her Majesty's Theatre in 1847, the first year of the opposition to Mr. Lumley's establishment. She appeared in La Favorita with Signor Gardoni; both artists making their débuts at the same time. Mad. Sanchioli has been making a tour in the French provinces, accompanied by M. Bazzini, and takes Strasburg on her way. The alliance between the corps diplomatique and the lyrical stage, commenced by Mad. Sontag, and continued so illustriously by Lady Crampton, will be further cemented by a marriage that I hear of as shortly to be celebrated between the Prussian ambassador at Stuttgard, Count Schullenburg, and Mlle. Pannetrat, of the Opéra Comique. The same writer who furnishes me with this piece of gossip informs me that Alexander Paër, a son of the celebrated composer, and a maestro himself, has just died at Rome.

I have received a slip from a Belgium paper, Le Journal de Gand, in which there is a gentle and, to my thinking, not ill-deserved tap administered on the knuckles of M. Scudo, the musical critic of La Revue des Deux Mondes. This gentleman publishes an annual volume called L'Année Musicale, in which he has made a violent attack on Belgium and the Belgians, charging them with living wholly on the brains and genius of France, and being in arts, language, literature (he excepts their government and industry), a piratical copy of France and Frenchmen. He says they have a conservatoire with a very capable director, to wit, M. Fétis, where they only rear instrumentalists and vocalists such as Vieuxtemps and Cabel, having their merit no doubt: but they have no national school of music, or if they have, it is as equivocal in merit as the French they speak at Brussels. Unfortunately this reproach is expressed in anything but an elegant specimen of the language it so jealously defends from Belgian barbarism. It presents an inextricable confusion of relatives, which affords the journalist of Ghent an opportunity of thus retorting: "In the presence of this literature of que-que and of qui-qui it is impossible not to be struck with the graceful turn M. Scudo has given to the compliment he pays us on our ignorance of the French language. Could he not be prevailed upon to accept a professorship of French in Belgium?"

A very intelligent friend of mine, who holds an important post at the Court of Berlin, and of whose musical knowledge—amateur as he is—I am decidedly jealous, gives me some account of the operatic doings in that city. Marschner's opera of The Templar and the Jewess has just been revived. This is decidedly the most popular work of the composer, but on its first appearance it had to struggle against the influence of two such redoubtable rivals as Weber and Spohr, and consequently it was never appreciated at its just value. Marschner has now had his revenge, and has compelled the public to acknowledge the dramatic power which characterises many of the pieces in this opera, the gracefulness of its melody and the richness of its instrumentation. Mad. Koester played the part of Rebecca and added fresh lustre to her reputation. Kreutzer's opera of A Night at Granada has been played at Kroll's establishment with great success. Stradella (Flotow's) is still attracting crowded audiences, and is being played both at the Frederick William Theatre and at Kroll's. The duo between the two brigands and the hymn to the Virgin are regularly honoured with an encore whenever they are heard. It is the success of Martha over again. This is encouraging to Mr. Gye, who is to bring out Stradella during the present season. By the way, it is said here that he (Mr. Gye) has engaged Graziani for two seasons, 1861 and 1862, at the rate of 10,000f. a month; you will better come at the truth of this than I. But to return to my German correspondent's budget of news. The Italian opera at Vienna closes on the 28th of the month, and next season the Pardon de Ploërmel will be produced, with Mad. Frassini as Dinorah. The Pardon has been played at Munich with Mlle. Schazbach as the heroine. Gluck's Iphigenia in Aulis is announced here, and Mlle. Stoeger is to sing the principal part. The Oratorio Society of Munich have brought their season to a close. Bach's Christmas Cantata and fragments of Handel's Susannah were given at the last performance. At Trieste, Mad. Amelia Jackson had just made her début in Robert le Diable as Isabella, and obtained a legitimate success.

Let me wind up with a piece of local news which if not musical is curious. A commission has been appointed of literary and administrative sommités (anglicé topping fellows) in order to examine and discuss the knotty question of literary property. The time is oddly chosen for such an inquiry. It does not seem as though the products of the French press under the Imperial régime would ever constitute a very valuable estate to their proprietors even though the title to them were granted in perpetuity.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

Don Giovanni was announced for Saturday evening, but put off in consequence of the illness of Mlle. Titiens, Mad. Borghi-Mamo, Signor Everardi, and Signor Giuglini, who were severally attacked with sore throats. In this strait Mad. Alboni was applied to, and the Barbiere was given, the great artist appearing of course as Rosina, one of her most perfect and exquisite achievements. M. Gassier also being ill, Signor Sebastiano Ronconi sustained the part of the barber for the first time, and, amid much that was exaggerated, displayed no small amount of humour. His singing, but for a tendency to drag, was excellent. Signor Ciampi, as Doctor Bartolo, again created a furore in the air "A un dottore." In the lesson scene, Mad. Alboni, whose "Una voce" was divine, introduced the tyrolienne from Betly, "In questo semplice," which was magnificently given and rapturously encored.

On Tuesday, Lucia di Lammermoor was presented for the first time, with Mlle. Titiens as Lucy, and Herr Steger (from Vienna) as Edgardo—his first appearance in this country. That the heroine of Donizetti's opera is not entirely suited to Mlle. Titiens, may readily be credited. It is as though Mrs. Siddons should essay the character of Juliet. The easily-credulous, timid, love-stricken maiden is hardly suited to the impetuous instincts of the Teutonic Grisi. Nevertheless, there are many passages in the music which give occasion for the display of strong emotions, and of these Mlle. Titiens laid hold with avidity. The scene with Ashton in the second act, the scene of the malediction, and the mad scene, were superbly acted, and in most respects magnificently sung. The sensation Mlle. Titiens created after the last-named was indescribable.

Herr Steger is, we understand, a Hungarian, and has for many years enjoyed a first-rate reputation in some of the theatres of Germany. He is a tenore robusto, with a very capable and strong, if not very agreeable, voice, and style full of energy and vigor. An abuse of the vibrato is his most serious fault. He received every encouragement from the audience, and was twice recalled at the end of the opera. Nevertheless, it is unlikely he will retain a position at Her Majesty's Theatre.

M. Gassier sang the music of Ashton very finely, but would do well to change his Highland for a Lowland garb. One kilt among so many pairs of trews does not greatly aid the scenic illusion. Perhaps the Italian costumier who first dressed the character in Lucia, was impressed with the idea that Lammermoor was a village on the summit of Ben Nevis.

Previous to Lucia, Gnecco's opera buffa, La Prova d'un Opera Seria was given, with Mlle. Lotti, Signors Corsi, Sebastiano Ronconi, and Ciampi in the principal characters. This lively little affair was capitally sung and acted, more especially by the new buffo, Signor Ciampi, who, as the manager Campanone, again proved his title to be the legitimate successor of Lablache. In the song with directions to the orchestra he was most admirable, and elicited roars of laughter. In the popular duet, "O guardate che figura" (with Mlle. Lotti), we have heard the imitative passages given with greater fluency by Mad. Viardot and Signor Tamburini.

On Thursday, Lucrezia Borgia was repeated, with Mlle. Titiens, Mad. Alboni, Signor Mongini, and M. Gassier in the principal characters.

On each of the above occasions, the last scene of the ballet Adelina was given, with Mlle. Claudina Cucchi, who makes visible progress in the favour of the audience.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Martha, the best opera of Herr Flotow, and one of the happiest German counterfeits of the wit and sparkle of the Opéra Comique, was received on Tuesday night with the same success that attended it in 1858 and 1859. No work has been more sumptuously, and at the same time more carefully, put upon the stage of the Royal Italian Opera than this; and though compared with one of Auber's lyric dramas it stands much in the same relative position as Brussels when compared with Paris, under such favourable conditions of costume, scenery, and distribution of the principal characters, it may be allowed to represent the Belgian capital during the period of the September fêtes—in other language, at its gayest and very best. No modern opera is more replete with ad captandum "tune;" and if the tune was as fresh and original as it is fluent and continuous, Martha would be, in a purely melodic sense, a masterpiece. At the same time, the music throughout is animated, busy, and dramatically appropriate. Some critics have suggested that Martha, stripped of the Irish (or—as Mr. William Chappell may probably tell us in a future volume—English) air to which Moore wedded the "Last Rose of Summer," would be much in the same plight as the stem without the flower. But this is begging the question; the Irish melody was at hand, and Herr Flotow—as a far more genial composer did with "Robin Adair" (Boieldieu, in La Dame Blanche)—turned it to excellent purposes. An eminent landscape painter was once heard to say that he liked having his pictures hung near those of Turner, inasmuch as they derived a brightness not intrinsically their own from their approximation to the lustrous canvas of that great master; and so Herr Flotow may have inserted the "Last Rose of Summer" in the midst of his "tone-picture" (to employ the modern Teutonic jargon) with some such arrière pensée. At all events, this exquisite melody gives the predominant colouring to the work, and it would be as impossible to think of Martha without it as of the last scene in Rossini's Otello without Desdemona's "willow-song."

There is not much to say of the performance, the cast of the opera being, with one exception, precisely the same as before. The exception, nevertheless, was an important one. The part of Lady Henrietta (Martha)—sustained in 1858 by Mad. Bosio, and in 1859 by Mlle. Lotti—was on this occasion alloted to Mad. Penco. Mad. Penco is not Mad. Bosio, but she approaches much more nearly that inimitable artist in her musical delineation of the character than her immediate predecessor, or, indeed, than any other we have seen. Her delivery of "Qui sola, vergin rosa" (the "Last Rose of Summer"), but for a slight abuse of that tremulous utterance which so many singers of recent days appear to consider inseparable from the true pathetic style, would have been faultless—more plaintive and unaffected it was impossible to make it; and we were not at all surprised at the loud "encore" it elicited, the compliance with which enabled Mad. Penco to exhibit still deeper feeling and still greater vocal refinement. In her acting Mad. Penco displayed those legitimate qualities that have placed her in the foremost rank of existing lyric comedians. Mad. Nantier Didiée's Nancy, Signor Graziani's Plumkett (not Plunkett), M. Tagliafico's Lord Tristan, and M. Zelger's Sheriff of Richmond were each in its particular sphere quite as good as in former years, and need not be described anew. Nor, but for the surpassing excellence of Signor Mario's singing on the present occasion, would it be requisite to devote more than a passing word to his Lionel. Signor Mario, however, did more than "sing with his accustomed taste" and "act with his accustomed intelligence." His performance was irreproachable in every sense. To describe all its beauties would take more time and space than we can afford; but it is no more than just to point out one or two. Of course his most thoroughly appreciated vocal effort was the air, "M' appari tutt' amor" (Act III.), in which the perplexed and half-demented Lionel, in a fervid apostrophe to the cruel Martha, vows eternal constancy to that beloved ideal—the mistress of his fate. The recitative commencing with a snatch of the melody which haunts us through the opera, was given with intense feeling, especially the passage—

"Sfolgorante la veggio
"Del suo celeste e virginal sorriso"

(which, in the English text, is rendered, "I see her shining, of a celestial shine"); and the graceful air itself, with its passionate burden,—

"Marta, Marta, tu sparisti
"E il mio cor col tuo n'andò"— was a triumph of expressive singing. An enthusiastic "encore" was the result, and the repetition of the air exhibiting even still more earnestness on the part of the accomplished singer, he was greeted with a regular "ovation" at the end. Never was Signor Mario's voice in "better order" than on this occasion.

The band and chorus were everything that could have been desired; and the concerted music — including the scene of the "statute fair," the quartet at the spinning wheel, the "Buona-notte," and the last finale, in which, by the influence of familiar sights and sounds, Lionel recovers his scattered senses—were, one and all, alike effective from a musical and scenic point of view. The whole performance gave the utmost satisfaction to a crowded audience, among whom was Her Majesty the Queen.

Concerts.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—These admirable and thoroughly intellectual entertainments seem to be returning to their première jeunesse. Most assuredly have they not for years engrossed so much attention, or presented such undeniable evidence of prosperity. The appointment of Professor Sterndale Bennett to the office of conductor has proved (as we always anticipated) of eminent service. So thoroughly practised a musician could hardly fail to win the confidence, and thereby enforce the willing discipline, of his orchestra; and it is not too much to say that the band of the Philharmonic Society was never more entirely under the control of its chief, and consequently never more fitted to render the orchestral works of the great composers to perfection than at the present time. The programme of Monday evening's concert (the fifth and last but one of the season) was as follows:—

PART I.

Sinfonia in E flat, No. 5.	Mozart
Song—"The Quail," Mr. Tennant . . .	Beethoven
Concerto in A minor, pianoforte, Herr Ritter .	Hummel
Aria—"Vedrai carino," Mad. Borghi-Mamo .	Mozart
Overture—"Isles of Fingal"	Mendelssohn

PART II.

Sinfonia in A, No. 7	Beethoven
Recit. and Aria—"Ah, come rapida," Mad. Borghi-Mamo	Meyerbeer
Concertino, violoncello, M. Paque . . .	G. Goltermann
Overture—"Prometheus"	Beethoven

Conductor—Professor Sterndale Bennett, Mus.D.

Of the symphonies and overtures—all selected from the repertory of chosen master-pieces, which it is the professed object of the Philharmonic Society to bring forward as often as possible (and which they will be able to do still more effectually next season, when the series of concerts is restored to its original number of eight)—nothing need be said. The more than usually magnificent performance, however, of Mendelssohn's Isles of Fingal—of all poetical concert overtures (in contradistinction to the "character overtures," of which Beethoven's Coriolan and Egmont, together with Mendelssohn's own Ruy Blas, form the most striking examples) the finest—must be acknowledged, in justice both to Professor Bennett and those who act under him. So well-merited a success as that obtained by Herr Ritter (a Frenchman, we believe—M. Benet, who need not be ashamed of his patronimique) in the pianoforte concerto of Hummel has not been witnessed, at the Philharmonic Concerts or elsewhere, for a very long period. This same concerto was played, if we remember correctly, about two years since, by a resident German pianist of eminence (not M. Hallé), but without producing any marked sensation. It was not, therefore, as a novelty that it pleased so much. The merit must be attributed to Herr Ritter's (M. Benet's) performance, which literally transported the audience. The applause at the end of each movement and the recall at the termination of the concerto were beyond measure enthusiastic. Herr Ritter's playing reminds us in many respects of that of Mr. Sterndale (now "Professor"—nay, "Doctor") Bennett, more than twenty years ago, with the proviso that the foreigner has yet to acquire the full rich tone, the perfect phrasing and the provokingly faultless mechanism that, at the time we speak of, left the young Englishman without a single rival except Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy. Whether Herr Ritter is destined to reach this high standard or not we are unprepared to say; but of one thing we are certain, no such legitimate playing as his has been listened to from the fingers of a new aspirant to the suffrages of the English public since M. Hallé (with whom, of course, he must not yet be measured) first appeared in the orchestra of the Philharmonic Concerts. If in Beethoven and Mendelssohn Herr Ritter has the gift to shine as brilliantly as in the less poetical though more methodical Hummel, he may be hailed as a new phenomenon in the pianoforte world, and with the greater heartiness as a foreigner who, without the slighest pretension or quackery, reads good music with the spirit of an enthusiast and the skill of a master. We regret that we were unable to hear the violoncello solo of that excellent artist, M. Paque, whose introduction to these concerts was simply a just tribute paid to real desert. The Morning Post says:—

"The rich and powerful tone of M. Paque gives him a special advantage over the best of our resident violoncellists, whilst in musical sentiment he is surpassed by none. M. Paque's execution of a concertino by Goltermann on this occasion may be cited as a worthy exemplification of his powers. We never heard him play more finely."

Of the vocal music we need say nothing more than that the name of Mad. Borghi-Mamo was a manifest attraction, and that Mr. Tennant, one of the most careful and intelligent of our young English tenors, gave Beethoven's beautiful song with such artistic taste as to win unanimous approval from an audience "critical among the critical."

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—These highly successful entertainments are now rapidly drawing to a close, the concert of the 18th being announced as the last but two of the season. In all our experience of matters musical, we cannot recall an example of such unparalleled success as has attended these performances. Excellent as was the first season, the second has surpassed it both in variety and extent; and a better criterion of the advanced musical taste of the day cannot be found than in the fact, that from the middle of November till the present time these concerts have been given almost without interruption every Monday, and invariably attended by large and appreciative audiences, including all ranks and classes of the public. The concert under notice formed no exception to its predecessors, and judging from a line of private carriages extending nearly the whole length of Regent Street, we may reasonably infer that a considerable number of the audience must have belonged to the "upper ten," while the densely crowded state of the shilling seats showed that the same description of hearers whom Jullien first taught to listen to, and afterwards thoroughly enjoy, "classical" music rendered with all the appliances of a powerful orchestra, were equally capable of relishing the chamber compositions of the great masters now that the directors of the "Monday Popular Concerts" have placed them within their reach. The instrumental portion of the scheme was devoted to Beethoven, and comprised two quartets,—E flat, No. 10 (Op. 74), and D major (Op. 18); the sonata for pianoforte alone, E flat (Op. 29, No. 3); the violin romance in F (Op. 50), and sonata in A for pianoforte and violoncello. Mr. Charles Hallé's performance of the solo sonata was magnificent throughout, and commanded a perfect "ovation." No less admirable was the duet, in which the honours were shared by Mr. Hallé and Signor Piatti, while Herr Straus was warmly applauded for his able rendering of the violin romance. The execution of the quartets, in which the new violinist enjoyed the co-operation of Herr Goffrie, Mr. Doyle, and Signor Piatti, was equally praiseworthy, and met with quite as cordial a reception as the other pieces. Miss Louisa Pyne, Mlle. Jenny Meyer, and Mr. Laurence—a new name—divided the vocal music, the English lady being encored in Spohr's "E mi lasci cosi," of which she repeated the allegro, and Macfarren's song from Charles II. "Canst thou deem my heart is changing," both sung to perfection. Mlle. Meyer's effective rendering of Beethoven's "In questa tomba" was honoured by a recall, while in Gluck's "Che farò" she afforded general satisfaction. This was equally the case with Miss Pyne's rendering of "Quando lascia," from Meyerbeer's Roberto il Diavolo. Mr. Laurence sang the air "Ah non avea più lagrime." Undaunted by the enormous work of his morning concert at Her Majesty's Theatre (of which a notice will be found elsewhere), Mr. Benedict presided at the piano, accompanying the vocalists, as well as Herr Straus' solo, with his accustomed ability. Monday, June 25th (the last concert but one), is to be a "Mozart Night;" and July 2nd, terminating the series, will be devoted to various masters, being for the Directors' benefit, an announcement which we are sure will be sufficient to fill St. James's Hall to repletion.

Mr. Benedict's Concert.—Our space will not allow us to do more than glance at the very rich programme, marked alike by excellence and variety, which Mr. Benedict provided for his numerous and aristocratic patrons on Monday afternoon. The performance took place in Her Majesty's Theatre, every part of which was densely crowded. At half-past one the band played the overture to Masaniello, and this was the prelude to a miscellaneous selection, chiefly devoted to favourite pieces from the most popular operas of the day, contributed by Mlle. Brunetti (the young and promising singer, who but recently made her début as Gilda, in Rigoletto), Mlle. Vaneri, Signors Corsi, Aldighieri, Gassier, and Belart. Besides the vocal music, there was one of Spohr's concertante duets for two violins, played to perfection by Herren Molique and Straus (the youngest and most rising violinist in Germany); and to finish this section of the entertainment, Mr. Benedict's ingenious and sparkling Concertino for pianoforte, with orchestral accompaniment, performed at one of his own concerts, some years ago, in the Royal Italian Opera, by Miss Arabella Goddard, but on the present occasion executed in his most brilliant style by the composer himself. To this miscellaneous selection followed Rossini's magnificent Stabat Mater, which, so far as the principal singers were concerned, could hardly have been better given, but left much to desire in one very important department—viz., the chorus, which, in the "Eia mater" (bass solos, by Signor Vialetti), and still more in the final "Amen" (embracing Rossini's idea of a fugue, "en robe de chambre"—of which the cleverest and most gifted pupil of the learned Padré Mattei ought to have been ashamed), was in all respects unsatisfactory. Nevertheless, such fine declamation as that of Mlle. Titiens in the "Inflammatus," and such absolutely faultless singing as that of Mad. Alboni in the "Fac ut portem Christi mortem," would have atoned for much more lamentable shortcomings. The duet between these two ladies ("Quis est homo") was equally to be admired, while Signor Giuglini in "Cujus animam gementem," and Signor Everardi in "Pro peccatis," exhibited not only a thorough acquaintance with the text but the power of expressing it, each, after his manner, to perfection. On the whole this performance of the Stabat Mater afforded the utmost gratification. It was succeeded by the exquisite "Ave Maria," from Mendelssohn's unfinished Loreley, Mad. Catherine Hayes giving the soprano solos with her accustomed sentiment, the characteristic horn-parts in the orchestra being irreproachable, and the chorus far more satisfactory than in the Stabat of Rossini. An eccentric solo on the violoncello, eccentrically (though skilfully) rendered by the composer, Signor Pezze, and eccentrically accompanied by the orchestra, was the next display. To this succeeded the famous "Tyrolienne" from Donizetti's Betly, superbly sung by Mad. Alboni; Thalberg's most elaborate, individual, and mechanically difficult fantasia for pianoforte alone (on the prayer from Mosé in Egitto—which first introduced the celebrated Viennese pianist to an English public, at the Philharmonic Concerts, some 20 years ago), performed by Miss Arabella Goddard, Thalberg's favourite pupil; an Irish ballad, sung by Mad. Catherine Hayes; a duet for two pianofortes, on themes from Robert le Diable, composed by M. Léopold de Meyer, who, with Mr. Benedict as partner, undertook its performance, and succeeded in astonishing and delighting the audience in an equal measure; Rode's familiar air with variations, sung with extraordinary brilliancy and great applause by Mlle. Artôt; and Meyerbeer's vigorous and characteristic March composed for the 100th anniversary of Schiller's birthday, and now heard for the first time in England. Here, it might have been thought, was enough for any one concert, however ambitious its pretensions. Mr. Benedict, however, was evidently not of this opinion, inasmuch as Meyerbeer's march had only brought us to the "half-way house." The whole third act of Rossini's Otello (in costume, as on ordinary operatic evenings), in which Mad. Borghi-Mamo and Signor Mongini, as Desdemona and Otello, have reaped such well-earned laurels at Her Majesty's Theatre, and Gnecco's Prova d'un Opera Seria (the only opera buffa, by the way, of its composer that has defied the encroachments of time) were still to come. All who stayed to listen to Rossini's admirable music were enchanted; and we have reason to believe that those who, still unsatiated with the interminable banquet of harmony prepared by the Trimalchio of concert-givers, remained for the jeu d'esprit of Gnecco, had equal cause for satisfaction, the principal characters being assigned to Mad. Lotti della Santa, Signor Sebastiano Ronconi (Mr. E. T. Smith's Rigoletto, and brother to Giorgio Ronconi, Mr. Gye's Rigoletto), and Signor Ciampi, the new bass-barytone, whose Dr. Bartolo is already a "town talk." We were, unfortunately, not of the number, it being six o'clock P.M. before the last note of Rossini's eloquent music had breathed the last sigh of Desdemona. When we add that, but for the indisposition of the new dancer, Mad. Claudine Cucchi, the ballet of Adelina was to have crowned the entertainment, our musical readers who were not present will agree with those more fortunately privileged in pronouncing this last concert (pasticcio?) of Mr. Benedict's a "monster-concert," entirely without precedent. At the same time, in all probability, a large majority of the audience would willingly have dispensed with one-third of the programme in favour of some few pieces, vocal and instrumental, from the pen of the accomplished concert-giver—too excellent and inventive a musician to restrict his patrons on such an occasion to a short concertino for the pianoforte. Signor Arditi shared with Mr. Benedict the post of orchestral conductor.

Prince George Galitzin's Concert.—This concert, of the holder and object of which we have already given some account, took place on Wednesday afternoon in St. James's Hall. Though its announcement did not, as we expected it would have done, fill the hall to overflowing, yet the audience was large, and many distinguished persons were present. Prince Galitzin, on presenting himself in the orchestra in the capacity of conductor of the concert, was received with loud and prolonged acclamations. He is a man of a striking aspect; tall, stout, and portly, with a handsome and noble countenance, and an air of great dignity. He conducted the performances with the skill of a practised musician, wielding his baton of command with remarkable grace, and beating the measure with very great clearness and precision. Altogether, this high-born stranger did not disappoint the expectations of those who were led by his illustrious name—which is a household word among musical amateurs—to look at him with curiosity and interest. The concert consisted wholly of Russian music, unknown in this country, but calculated to give a high idea of the state of the art in the far North. Several of the pieces were composed by Prince Galitzin, and showed him to be—not a mere amateur, but a thorough artist, possessed of original genius and great technical acquirements. A chorus, "Santa Maria," which opened the concert, was a piece of ecclesiastical harmony equally remarkable for purity of style and grandeur of effect. There was, too, a charming Romance with an "obbligato" accompaniment for the violoncello, sung by Mad. Sainton-Dolby, and accompanied by M. Réné Douay, which enchanted the audience; and there was, lastly, a waltz for the orchestra, which, in vigour, brilliancy, and masterly treatment, reminded us of the best things of poor Jullien. In short, this illustrious amateur showed himself a master of every style of music. Besides these compositions of Prince Galitzin, there were several superb choral pieces of Bortniansky, a composer whose renown has reached this country, and whose music ought to be better known among us; and there were two specimens of Glinka, a famous dramatic composer of the day; one, a beautiful trio from a Russian opera, sung by Miss Louisa Pyne, Signor Mongini, and Mr. Patey; and the other a mazurka, played with remarkable grace and brilliancy by Miss Arabella Goddard, who was enthusiastically called upon to repeat it, but contented herself by gracefully acknowledging the compliment. Though the concert consisted of modern compositions, they were, for the most part, strongly marked with the Russian national character, a circumstance which enhanced their interest. The performances were received with the greatest enthusiasm; most of them, indeed, were encored, and at the conclusion Prince Galitzin retired from the orchestra amidst thunders of applause from all parts of the hall.

Mad. Sainton-Dolby's Two Concerts.—For many years past there have been so many entertainments in the months of May and June, that space cannot be found in our columns for doing them common justice. Here, for instance, are two of the best concerts of the year, and we are obliged to curtail our account of them, for only a few lines are available. The bénéficiaire sang, in the course of the two performances, "Ah s'estinto," Mercadante; "The Skipper and his Boy," Miss V. Gabriel; "It was fifty years ago," in which Mr. Hatton has so well illustrated Longfellow's beautiful ode on Professor Agassiz; "Janet's choice," Claribel; "Per pietà," (Così fan tutte) Mozart; and "Che faro" (Orfeo), Gluck. The pure expression, artistic phrasing, and thoroughly musical voice of Mad. Sainton are always welcome; and it is now quite superfluous to say that her concerts were attended by crowded audiences. A special word of commendation is due to Miss Marian Moss for her correct singing of an air from Spohr's Azor and Zemira. Among the other notabilities were Mad. C. Hayes, Signor Belletti, Mad. Lemmens Sherrington, with her pet "Shadow song" (Dinorah); Mr. Santley, Mr. Montgomery, who has appeared before now as Signor Luigi, Mad. Rieder, Mlle. Parepa, and Signor Belart. The instrumental music, performed by Miss Arabella Goddard, Mr. Hallé, Messrs. Sainton, Ries, Doyle, Piatti, and Paque, comprised, among many well-known and welcome works, Dussek's sonata in B flat, pianoforte and violin, played to admiration by Miss Goddard and M. Sainton; Mendelssohn's trio in D minor by Mr. Hallé, and MM. Sainton and Paque; the splendid Op. 26 (sonata with funeral march) in A flat of Beethoven, by Mr. Chas. Hallé; and Benedict's fantasia on "Where the bee sucks," by Miss Goddard, who, though loudly encored, declined to accept the compliment. M. Sainton's violin playing was, as usual, the theme of unanimous praise. The concerts took place in St. James's Hall.

The First Dress Rehearsal (as it is the fashion now to call certain musical entertainments heretofore denominated "concerts") of "The Arion," a new musical association, was given on Thursday evening at the Architectural Gallery, Maddox Street. The programme, of unusual excellence, comprised Mr. Macfarren's May Day; selections from Mozart's Clemenza di Tito; Neithardt's motett, for eight-part choir, "Misericordias Domini;" Webbe's glee, "To love I wake;" Mendelssohn's part-song, "Autumn Song;" part-song, "On the Rhine," by W. C. Filby; besides songs, duets, and trios, sung by Mad. Gilbert, Miss Alleyne, Miss Hughes, Mrs. Paget, Miss Fosbroke, Miss Bramly, Miss Boden, Mlle. Charlier, Messrs. Redfearn, H. Regaldi, and Wallworth. Mr. Macfarren's cantata was on the whole most creditably rendered, the chorus being steady and correct throughout, and evidently working with a will. Mad. Gilbert, in the song "Beautiful May," won a decided and well-merited encore. The selection from the Clemenza di Tito pleased universally. The performances entitled to special mention were the aria "Parto," by Mad. Gilbert, with clarinet obbligato by Mr. Williams; duet, "Ah! perdona," by Miss Fisher and Mrs. Paget; and the tenor air, "Ah, se fosse," by Mr. Redfearn. As a relief to the vocal music, Mr. Winniatt Smith (violin), Mr. Alfred Gilbert (piano), and Dr. Bennett Gilbert (harmonium), played Gounod's Meditation sur un Prelude de Bach, and Mr. Williams executed a fantasia on the clarinet, both with capital effect. Mr. Alfred Gilbert conducted.

Herr Ernst Pauer's Orchestral Concert came off at the Hanover Square Rooms on Wednesday evening. Beethoven's concerto for the pianoforte, No. 5, Op. 73, in E flat, was the principal instrumental display, and was executed finely both by pianist and orchestra. Herr Pauer's other performances were Prelude and Fugue by Bach, Studie in Canonischer Form, Op. 56, No. 4, by Schumann; Weber's Momento Cappriccioso; Schulhoff's Aubade; and his own transcription of the Spanish air, "La Calesera." The Cappriccioso of Weber and Aubade of Schulhoff were both extremely effective. The band—selected from the Royal Italian Opera and Philharmonic—played the overtures to Figaro and Prometheus. Herr Pauer's contributions were important. These were, in the vocal department—recitative and air from the operetta Don Riego, for bass voice, and the 23rd Psalm, "The Lord is my Shepherd," written for chorus and solos of female voices, with accompaniment of pianoforte obbligato—both, we believe, given for the first time in public. The Psalm is the composition of a skilled and thoughtful musician, and was extremely well executed by the choir of female voices. The bass recitative and air found a capital interpreter in Mr. Thomas, and was much applauded. Herr Pauer's instrumental contributions included a pianoforte arrangement of the Spanish air just alluded to, and a concerto for the clarinet. The last is admirably written for the instrument, and was executed to perfection by Mr. Lazarus. This performance created a great sensation, the audience recalling Mr. Lazarus at the end with enthusiasm. Herr Kömpel performed a fantasia on the violin, by Spohr, with admirable dexterity. Mad. Rieder introduced a new bravura, Le Carnaval de Rome, in which her rare facility and command of the higher tones were conspicuously displayed; and joined Mr. Thomas in the duet from Figaro "Crudel, perchè." Herr Molique and Mr. Henry Leslie were the conductors.

Herr Wilhelm Kuhe, the well-known professor of the pianoforte, gave his annual morning concert at St. James's Hall, on Thursday. It was a miscellaneous affair, but extremely good of its kind. Herr Kuhe himself performed, with M. Sainton, Dussek's beautiful sonata in B flat, for pianoforte and violin; duo for piano and harmonium with Herr Engel; and two solos of his own composition. Herr Kuhe is an admirable executant, and while he played all the foregoing pieces capitally, he was most particularly effective in Dussek's sonata (which is attaining a wide popularity) and in one of his own solos, Grande Fantaisie de Concert, on airs from Dinorah. M. Sainton played his own fantasia on the Figlia del Reggimento with brilliant success. The rest of the programme was devoted to vocal music rendered by Miss Louisa Pyne, Mad. Rieder, Mad. Sainton-Dolby, Signor Belart, Mr. Tennant, Signor Oliva, and Mr. Santley; wherein Mad. Rieder, inasmuch as she was recalled after singing the Carnaval de Venise, appeared to carry away the vocal honours of the evening. The Carnaval certainly, and the ballad "The Skipper and his Boy," by Mad. Sainton-Dolby, were the most effective performances in the vocal department. The hall was crowded with bonnets, and the male sex seemed in a decided minority. Herr Kuhe should congratulate himself on the patronage of the fair sex. No doubt the popular pianist reckoned upon such an audience, as the selection was of a kind to be addressed especially to the ladies.

Mlle. Caroline Valentin's Matinée.—The morning concert of Mlle. Caroline Valentin, an eminent professor of the pianoforte, took place on Wednesday afternoon under distinguished patronage. The entertainment was held in the Hanover Square Rooms, which were crowded to the walls with a fashionable audience, among whom the fair sex, as usual at morning concerts, considerably predominated. Mlle. Valentin has evidently not been idle since her last appearance in public (about a year since). Her own part in the performance was both trying and ambitious, including no less than five pieces—two in the classical style, one in the so-called "romantic," and two in the modern "brilliant," which taxes the mechanical rather than the intellectual capacity of the artist. To the first category belonged Haydn's charming trio in G, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, in which Mlle. Valentin was associated with MM. Buziau and Paque, and Beethoven's well-known sonata to which the title of Mondscheins ("Moonlight") Sonata has been assigned by certain of its more enthusiastic admirers. The "brilliant-school" was represented by Kullak's showy and difficult caprice entitled Les Arpèges, and the late Fumagalli's clever imitation of Thalberg, in the shape of an improvisation on "A te o cara." M. Stephen Heller's second and best Tarantella vindicated the claims of the "romantic" style to the attention and applause of connoisseurs. In all these compositions Mlle. Valentin not only exhibited that manipulative talent and command of expression which have been praised on former occasions, but a very decided improvement. In the pieces of Haydn and Beethoven she displayed both thought and facility, and in Kullak's Arpèges achieved a marked and well-merited success. All her efforts were honoured with the most encouraging tokens of approval. M. Victor Buziau, who took the violin part in the trio, proved himself—in one of Ernst's most arduous tours de force—a solo player of more than common ability; and M. Paque performed a romance and bolero of his own (on the violoncello) to perfection. The vocal selection was excellent, and judiciously varied. M. Depret gave Hoel's romance in Dinorah with real feeling; Mlle. Kettler two German lieder in a pleasing and unaffected manner; and Mad. Rieder the variations on the "Carnaval de Venice" with wonderful fluency of execution. Besides these, the new German singer, Herr Hermanns, whose magnificent bass voice produced so lively an impression at one of the recent Monday Popular Concerts, delighted the audience so much in a lied, called "Die Heimkehr," that he was unanimously encored, and, in response to the compliment, substituted Evers' spirited "Sturmwind," afterwards giving the "Song of Falstaff" (from the late Otto Nicolai's Merry Wives of Windsor) with equal success. The voice of this gentleman has the depth and sonority of that of Herr Formes, together with much of Herr Formes's energetic force in declamation. Herr Wilhelm Ganz was the accompanist, and fulfilled his task with his accustomed ability. The concert was altogether attractive, and Mlle. Valentin's patrons had every reason to be gratified with the musical entertainment provided for them.

MENDELSSOHN'S hymn, "Ave Maria," from the posthumous opera of Loreley; Spohr's Ode to St. Cecilia; and Mr. Macfarren's May Day, will be the principal features of the great orchestral performance of the Vocal Association, under the direction of Mr. Benedict, on Friday evening, June 29th, at St. James's Hall, that being the last subscription concert of the season.

LONDON: SATURDAY, JUNE 23, 1860.

THE TESTIMONIAL TO MR. CIPRIANI POTTER on his retirement from the Royal Academy of Music, is to be presented to him at the Academy on Saturday next, the 30th inst., when Sir George Clerk will take the chair, and all the subscribers are invited to attend. These number between three and four hundred, and consist of former and present professors and students of the Academy, and many of the most distinguished musicians and amateurs of music in England, who have been eager thus to express their friendship and admiration for the man who has, in his official capacity as the head of our only public musical seminary, done more than any other towards the vast progress of music in this country during the thirty-seven years of the Academy's existence.

THE approaching "Great National Contest" of the Brass Bands at the Crystal Palace, to commence on Tuesday, July 10th, has excited unusual curiosity and interest in provincial circles. One hundred and fifteen brass bands, mostly belonging to the North and Midland Counties, have entered to compete for sundry valuable prizes to be awarded to the best players. The origin of these bands is easily accounted for, and their constitution very simple. In the large manufacturing establishments, the workmen of late years, from the early closing movement and other causes, having more time on their hands than they knew well what to do with, turned their attention to music as the most agreeable recreation, and the surest resource from weariness. They purchased a few cornets and trumpets by subscription, learned how to play, or taught themselves, and formed the nucleus of a brass band. The late improvements, and the introduction of the valves into brass instruments, which renders playing on them comparatively easy, decided their choice, and the difficulties of learning being readily surmounted, gave a new impetus to the associations, and tended greatly to their advancement and increase. Another reason why brass instruments only were selected was, that the players being compelled mostly to exhibit in the open air, the loudest and most sonorous instruments had the preference. Example, no doubt, had something to do with it. The cavalry regiments, always quartered in the large manufacturing towns, with their splendid brass bands, continually excited the emulation of the workmen. Generally speaking, while the clarionet, oboe, flute, or bassoon requires years of assiduous practice to master, a certain proficiency may be attained on the cornet-à-pistons, trombone, horn, ophicleide, and its various congeners, comparatively, in a few weeks. This was a great matter for men engaged all day in hard labour, and who could only devote a few minutes at a time to practice. Moreover, the cheapness of brass instruments compared with wood, their greater durability, and the little care demanded for their preservation, were not without their influence. Not to seek for further causes, sufficient has been shown to explain why mechanics and artizans should have preferred a band of brass instruments entire to one constituted of wood and brass in combination. The men went to work with a good will; engaged competent teachers, and had music specially arranged for them. The facility of playing and facility of purchase thus afforded, together with instruction from without and application from within, soon displayed surprising results. Suddenly, throughout the length and breadth of Yorkshire, amateur bands started up as if by magic. All were composed of men attached to the factories or large "works." Other districts followed the example of the four Ridings, and the whole of the North of England resounded with tuneful brayings from myriads of brazen throats. Such music could not fail to speak loudly to authoritative ears. In a brief while some of these brass bands played so well as to obtain a certain amount of local reputation. Challenges were sent forth from county to county—from riding to riding—from parish to parish—nay, from factory to factory; contests took place; prizes were awarded. These meetings had their fine issues. Emulation and rivalry were established on a pacific footing, and much lusty wind was expended, not in vain, in the honourable struggle for executive superiority.

Mr. Enderby Jackson of Hull, a gentleman who has been for many years one of the most indefatigable and earnest promoters of popular music in the north of England, and who has done as much as any man of his day to introduce good music into village homes, was the first who thought he could employ these musical bodies to valuable purposes. He originated public contests between brass bands, which were given at Bristol, Wolverhampton, Leicester, and numerous small towns, such as Doncaster, &c. When first these prize meetings were held, amateur bands were a rarity. Now, however, there are few large manufactories or workshops in the north of England without having their "musicians" attached to the establishment. The "Grand National Contest" about to come off at the Crystal Palace is the natural result of these minor gatherings, and, with a desire natural to enthusiasts in art, each body is anxious to assert its title to excellence in presence of the best constituted authorities in the kingdom.

Of the one hundred and fifteen bands entered to contend for the various prizes on the 10th proximo, many have obtained such special excellence as to give rise among their several supporters to a vast deal of speculation as to who are likely to become the victors. We do not wish to appear invidious, but a few of these bands have been so strongly recommended to us, that we think we shall only be doing an act of justice in recording their names. These are:—Black Dyke Mills (Yorkshire) Band, Beaumont's Holmfirth, Dewsbury, Darlington Sax-horn, Meltham Mills (Yorkshire), Baldon (Yorkshire), Chesterfield, Morley, Staleybridge Old Temperance, Ossett Temperance, Clerkheaton Victoria, Huddersfield, Saltaire (Bradford—Titus Salt's), Sunderland V. R. Artillery, and Lowmoor Ironworks. These at present are the favourites among the better acquainted and the more speculative; and in all probability to them one or more of the prizes will be awarded. Nevertheless, it has been whispered that there are several non-favourites among the competitors who stand a capital chance of coming in first, and who are all the rage in the coal and mining districts, where their policy is to keep things dark.

The following are the prizes to be distributed:—

1. An Euphonion, by Messrs. Boosey & Sons, electro-plated, value 30 guineas.
2. A Contra-Basso, by Messrs. Distin, electro-plated, value 35 guineas.
3. A Cornet-à-Pistons, by Courtois, electro-plated, value 18 guineas.
4. A set of Boosey's Brass Band Journal, bound, value 12 guineas.

All music hath its intellectual uses, and even brass band performances, so far down in the scale of art, may exert an influence not to be disregarded by those who seek to make man better and wiser. Upon the poor labourer, sensitive to melody only, a simple home-tune, denuded of all but the barest harmony, may have an effect equal to that of one of the mighty symphonies of the giant of the orchestra upon an educated mind. "We gain a knowledge of heaven but by glimpses," and so the artless strain breathed through a few polished tubes, may convey to the untutored ear the first imaginings of that glorious art, the full enjoyment of which is a heaven to the proficient. The social effects of music upon illiterate minds are still more defined and beneficial. When the day's labour is past, the worker of iron or delver in the mine, instead of betaking himself to potations and boon-companions, seeks for recreation in the society of a chosen few, who with hearts at all events attuned to harmony, humbly strive for mastery in the gentlest and most refining of the arts. Can such a man be constituted for evil deeds, too often the consequence of a few hours hanging heavy on minds incapable of resource? Is not such a man rather befitting himself for the true purposes of life—honest fellowship with his kind, and a determination to better his mental condition?

Let the brass bands therefore prosper. Let them continue to exercise their influence far and wide, and, after their manner, proclaim the supremacy of music in accomplishing good. With their sounding interpreters let them speak aloud in high places and in low places—let them become oracles and preachers of social regeneration to the lowly and untaught; and let their motto be

SUONI LA TROMBA.

PRINCE GALITZIN'S Russian Concert was a great success, though, to our disappointment, we found that the Prince had not brought with him to England his celebrated corps of singers; nor had he even adopted our suggestion of telegraphing for them to Tamboff, their ordinary residence. But he found highly efficient substitutes, as far as the execution of solos and concerted pieces was concerned. In Gaspaje, Louisa Pyneova, Saintonova-Dolbiska, and Arabella Goddarda; and in Gospodini, Santley-off and Pateyski. The concert was conducted in excellent style by the Prince—whose ancestors, by the way, have long been in the habit of leading; and the programme (as we have mentioned elsewhere) included several of his highness's own compositions. Of the variety of these, some notion may be formed, when we mention that among those performed on Wednesday were a deeply impressive "Santa Maria" for the choir, an arrangement of a Russian melody for two voices, and a very original waltz for the orchestra. The other Russian composers represented were Bortniansky and Glinka; a chorus from one of the religious services of the former, and several pieces from the operatic work of the latter, being executed. As we believe Prince Galitzin intends to give several more concerts of Russian music—and it is rumoured that he moreover intends to produce one of Glinka's operas in its entirety—our readers will perhaps feel interested in hearing some details respecting the lives and labours of the only two Russian composers, in addition to Prince Galitzin, with whose works the British public have yet made acquaintance.

In Russia, as in all other European countries, the earliest music is the music of the Church, and the most ancient musical document in Russia is a canticle composed in honour of two Russian princes who were canonised in the eleventh century. The manuscript of this canticle was discovered not very long since in the monastery of St. Sergius, near Moscow, and Count Dmitri Tolstoi, who has published a highly interesting work on the subject of early Russian music, argues with reason that it must have been written in Russia, inasmuch as no one out of Russia would have taken any interest in the canonisation of two Russian princes. In the course of time the music of the Russian Church, which had originally been borrowed from Byzantium, lost much of its oriental character; and towards the end of the seventeenth century, the adoption of the European scale, together with the imitation of Italian models, had so transformed it, that the Patriarch of Constantinople felt it necessary to send a choir to Moscow, with the view of restoring the ancient Greek chants, of which the tradition had been lost. But the Constantinople choir did not succeed in their mission, and, indeed, the Russian Church music needed a reform of a very different nature from that contemplated by the Patriarch and his vocalists. Without going back to the antiquated and unsuitable Greek style, it was highly desirable not to continue the imitation of the Italians, which involved a complete sacrifice of words to music; for, in addition to the natural differences between the Russian and Italian languages, it must be remembered that the service of the Roman Church is in verse, whereas that of the Russian is in prose. Bortniansky was the first Russian composer who went seriously to work to harmonise and re-arrange the ancient and disorganised church music of his country. "The times were out of joint;" but it was not Bortniansky, it was Lvoff, the composer of the Russian national hymn, who was "born to set them right," and who in his twelve volumes of church-music, has adapted the ancient chants to the rhythm of the Russian words, so that they are now pronounced correctly, in the order in which they occur in the service, and without repetition. Bortniansky, however, after his return from Italy, where he spent eleven years, wrote for the Russian Church the first music that it possesses; among other things a Mass in three parts, and forty-five Psalms, in four and in eight parts. During his residence in Italy, Bortniansky appears to have composed operas, symphonies, sonatas, but no music of a strictly religious character; this, however, was the style in which he excelled, and to which he exclusively devoted himself after his appointment as Director of the Imperial Choir—an office in which he was preceded by Salieri. Many who do not know the name of Bortniansky, are, nevertheless, familiar with some of his compositions, which have been adopted by the Roman Church, and may be heard in the churches of Paris, and, for all we know to the contrary, in those of Italy.

The name of Michael Glinka is not new to the constant and scrupulous readers of the Musical World. About a year ago we published an article from the pen of a highly esteemed contributor, on seventeen of his (Glinka's, not our contributor's) songs—being either detached compositions, or selections from the operas of Rooslan and Loodmila and Tizne za Tzarya. We also printed, a few months since, an article on the strange fortunes of the said Rooslan and Loodmila, of which the end was, that the scenery, costumes, score, and orchestral parts of the work were burned in the fire that destroyed the Tsirk theatre last year. The charming trio by Glinka, performed at Prince Galitzin's concert, is from Tizne za Tzarya, or Life for the Tzar—an opera founded on the story of the peasant Ivan Soussannin, who, when Michael, the first of the Romanoffs, was being pursued by the Poles (at that time the oppressors, not the oppressed, of Russia), misled the invaders, so that the Czar was able to escape, and refused, though put to the torture, to inform them of the route the Czar had taken.

Doubtless, at one or more of the other concerts which it is Prince Galitzin's intention to give, some of the compositions of the contemporary song-writers of Russia will be performed. Songs in the Russian national style, and in that of the Russian gipsies, would be equally novel and acceptable to an English audience.

AS a specimen of the care with which M. Fétis has set about the task of remodelling his great work, La Biographie Universelle des Musiciens, by incorporating with the new edition everything that struck him as worth appropriating, we may cite (inter alia) the paragraph relating to Beethoven's celibacy, and the causes generally assigned for that self-imposed privation on the part of the illustrious composer. In the first edition the matter is disposed of in a few brief sentences: "Beethoven"—it informs us—"never married; M. de Seyfried even asserts that he was never known to have had any tender attachment. The author of the present Biography, nevertheless, remembers being told by Joseph Woelfl (the pianist and composer—once a pupil of Beethoven's), of a certain lady to whose house Beethoven used frequently to go in his youth, and to whom he was very much attached, though he never confessed it. He appeared stung with jealousy whenever compliments were addressed by any other persons to the object of his attachment. In such cases the pianoforte was the depository of his thoughts, and was made to reflect the storm that raged within him. A single look from the lady, however, accompanied by a few kind words, brought back tranquillity to his heart, and caused sweet melodies to succeed the harsh discords of his impetuous and passionate soul."

In the second edition, this paragraph is enriched with a quantity of new and valuable matter. Dr. Wegeler, the friend of Beethoven's childhood and youth, never recollected him without some attachment, and generally one which exercised a great influence on his thoughts and actions. ("Beethoven war nie ohne Liebe, und meistens von ihr im hohem Grade ergriffen.") Schindler, "Ami di Beethoven," (also his Boswell and biographer), not only admits this assertion to be correct, but furnishes confirmatory details of considerable interest. The objects of Beethoven's regard were always, it seems, persons of high rank, a circumstance accounted for by the nobleness of his disposition, and his frequent intercourse with the upper classes of society. His love, however, was always Platonic; the heart and the imagination were chiefly concerned, the senses playing but a subordinate part in the drama. For several years, Beethoven was attached to Mlle. Julie de Guicciardi, who afterwards married the Count de Yallenberg, and to whom he dedicated his sonata in C sharp minor, (the well-known Mondscheins, or "Moonlight sonata.") Some letters written in the summer of 1806, from a watering-place in Hungary, whither the great composer had repaired in the hopes of finding a remedy for his deafness, and published in Schindler's Biography, tend to shew that in this instance, at least, Beethoven's love was reciprocated. Schindler mentions also an affaire de cœur between Beethoven and the Countess Marie d'Erdâdy, to whom he dedicated the grand trios in E flat and D, Op. 70. Ferdinand Ries, too—Beethoven's favourite pupil, and who lived with him for a long time on the most intimate terms—says, that his master's love-fits were seldom of very long duration, and that the most lasting evidence of constancy he could cite did not outlive seven months! Beethoven's passion for Mlle. de Guicciardi, nevertheless—with deference to Ries and Wegeler—retained its hold on him for years. These additions to the chapter of love in Beethoven's "Life" greatly enhance its value. Not satisfied with these, however, M. Fétis touches on the subject of Beethoven's friendships, about which the first edition of the Biographie Universelle was altogether silent. The illustrious musician seems to have been no less sensible to friendship than to love, but was so extremely sensitive, even on the most trifling points, that his self-esteem was easily wounded, and he would quarrel with his best friends. His brothers, who frequently disturbed his tranquillity, and were the cause of his greatest annoyances, took delight in poisoning his mind with doubts about those for whom he entertained the sincerest affection, in order themselves to sway him the more completely to their purposes. Beethoven used to listen too readily to their insinuations, and instead of demanding a frank explanation, would sulk and repel by his coolness those against whom he fancied he had grounds of complaint. If, however, any one succeeded in persuading him of his error, he at once hastened to confess he had done wrong, implore forgiveness, and make every atonement in his power, with cheerfulness and alacrity. Although exceedingly attached to the friends of his youth, years sometimes elapsed without his even thinking of them.

One of his letters to M. Wegeler, the companion of his infancy, involves a confession that he had not written to that intimate friend even once during the space of seven years. Although almost as intimate with Schenk, the first who explained to him the defects of his musical education, he would appear to have forgotten his mentor altogether, when, one day, walking with Schindler on the Boulevards at Vienna, he met Schenk, of whom he had lost sight for nearly twenty years. Mad with joy at once more meeting so old and true a friend, who for aught he knew might have been already in the grave, Beethoven dragged him into a neighbouring wine-shop (at the sign of the Hunter's Horn), and, calling for wine, with a gushing outburst of feeling, as of youth, the generally taciturn and abstracted artist abandoned himself to uncontrollable gaiety, and narrated, in uninterrupted succession, an almost endless series of stories and anecdotes. After an hour thus spent in mutual unconstrained expansion, Schenk and Beethoven separated, never to meet again. This took place in 1824, in less than three years after which period the great "tone-poet" had ceased to exist.

The chapters on love and friendship are followed by one devoted to Beethoven's family relations. The characteristic anecdotes follow—of which, by the way, M. Fétis has made a most discreet and appropriate selection; and finally, we have a chronological catalogue of Beethoven's works, followed by an examination of the biographies, essays, appreciations, and other writings on the subject. If the rest of the new edition of La Biographie Universelle des Musiciens be on a par with the article "Beethoven," it will be no less a book of inestimable value than of unexampled labour and research.

SOME seven years ago every London play-goer was astonished by the marks of genius displayed by a comedian of small stature, named Robson, in a burlesque on the Merchant of Venice entitled Shylock. There was no lack of comic actors at the time, and the world had been completely surfeited with burlesque. Nevertheless, this same Robson displayed so much tragic earnestness in the midst of his grotesque whimsicalities that the critics were puzzled altogether, and began to ask themselves whether a first-rate tragedian, suspecting that the age for "legitimacy" was gone, was not impudently palming himself off as a low comedian.

The puzzle is now at an end. Most people are at present aware that Mr. Robson is not a tragedian, but a genius of a peculiar sort, who has carved out a path for himself. The merely comic is not his element, save when it consists in a strongly coloured representation of marked character; but in the art of infusing a drop of pathos into a goblet of fun, Mr. Robson is unrivalled. To make people check themselves in the midst of laughter, to wipe a tear from their eyes,—to startle them with a serious unction, when they are idly listening to a parody on some popular song,—this is the mission of Mr. Robson. Of modern actors, he is the real humorist, in the Thackeray sense of the word,—the man with an instinctive knowledge of human nature, of that strange region in which smiles and tears are contending for supremacy. Of modern actors, he is the one man who, undertaking a new part, awakens the curiosity of the whole metropolis.

On Tuesday next, Mr. Robson will revive the burlesque, Shylock, and also perform in the Porter's Knot. These two pieces are the respective types of the two departments to which he devotes his talent. In the burlesque he is a creature of conceits and oddities, through which a deep earnest nature is constantly apparent. In the diminutive drama he is the fond father, and the man of unblemished integrity, rendered comic by the results of a vulgar training, but pathetic in the extreme, when the intrinsic worth of the man rises above the effect of circumstances. Those who visit the Olympic Theatre, on Tuesday next, will witness two of the greatest histrionic creations of which the present day can boast.

MR. BENEDICT AS COMPOSER AND PIANIST.—"The most remarkable feature in the first part* was Mr. Benedict's masterly and beautiful execution of his own admirable concertino for piano, with orchestral accompaniment—one of the very best works del genere which the modern school can boast. The unaffected sympathy and genuine affinity of mind which connect Mr. Benedict unmistakably with his instructor and model, Carl Maria von Weber, are here (as in all Mr. Benedict's most important compositions) very strikingly exhibited. To resemble so great a writer as the author of Der Freischütz, without incurring the reproach of plagiarism, is praise indeed; for nothing less than a kindred genius could accomplish so much. Mr. Benedict's playing was worthy of his music. The delicate and beautiful touch, symmetrical phrasing, chiaro-oscuro, and perfectly neat and finished "execution" (taking this word in its special sense) which have ever characterised Mr. Benedict's performances on the pianoforte, were never more delightfully exemplified than in his rendering of the concertino, which was enthusiastically applauded, as it well deserved, not only at the termination, but whenever 'tutti' afforded a plausible excuse for doing honour to the soloist. Mr. Benedict, who, be it understood, plays the music of others as well (in every sense) as his own, also took part in an ingenious, brilliant, and immensely-difficult duet for two pianos (on themes from Meyerbeer's Robert le Diable), with its gifted author, the famous 'lion-pianist,' Herr Léopold de Meyer, with whom it is not too much, though a great deal, to say that he fairly shared the honours."—Morning Post.

* In allusion to Mr. Benedict's concert, on Monday last.

HERR STRAUS AT THE MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—The first appearance at these concerts of a violinist with such legitimate claims to notice as Herr Straus (from Frankfort) must not be passed over without a line to record that it was eminently and deservedly successful. All genuine amateurs are acquainted with the Tenth Quartet of Beethoven, and know that it is one of the most difficult to play, no less than one of the most profound and poetical, of the seventeen master-pieces which the greatest of instrumental composers has bequeathed to the world of art. In this piece (which had already twice been led with great ability by M. Wieniawski at the Monday Popular Concerts) Herr Straus made his coup d'essai before an audience become critical through the force of admirable examples, and so by no means easy to conciliate. Herr Straus, however, in the first part of the first movement had done enough to satisfy all present that he was no mere flashy pretender, but, on the contrary, an artist of the foremost rank; while all the rest, up to the final variation of the theme of the concluding movement, was to match. Thus the Frankfort violinist was not "plucked," but passed his examination triumphantly. The decision was most just, Herr Straus being not merely all that report had given out in his favour, but something more. Besides the Tenth Quartet, he played the Romance (No. 2), accompanied by Mr. Benedict on the pianoforte, and the Quartet in D major, the finest of the early set of six, numbered Op. 18, and the one which in certain places (instance the minuetto and trio) exercised an undoubted influence upon Mendelssohn.—Times.

CLEMENTI'S SONATA IN C MAJOR, OP. 39.*—(From the Athenæum.)—

"Mr. C. Hallé's Second 'Rehearsal' was excellently well 'recited' the day before yesterday. Nothing could be better than his playing. Of this, as interpreting Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and Chopin, and Mr. Hallé, there is no need to speak; but we were especially grateful for the grace and vivacity thrown into the selections given from the works of Scarlatti (the second piece as fresh as though it had been but yesterday), and for another Clementi sonata, Op. 39, No. 1,—numbered 23 in André's new edition, which may be called another Clementi jewel from a mine, the opening of which is only beginning. The expressive, yet animated, dignity of the opening Allegro di molto, the life and originality of the last finale in ⅜ C major, of which we cannot but fancy Beethoven may have heard when busy with his first set of Bagatelles, establish the work as a master-piece,—thanks to the address and spirit of the player who established it on Thursday."

["The same sonata of Clementi," says the programme of the last Monday Popular Concert, "was performed on the third 'Italian Night,'—June 4th,—by Miss Arabella Goddard."]

THEODORE RITTER AT THE PHILHARMONIC.—"The solo instrumentalists were Herr Ritter, a pianist quite new to this country, and M. Paque, the well-known violoncellist. The former was triumphantly successful, as he well deserved to be. The numerous disappointments we have experienced of late years with respect to 'distinguished foreign pianists,' whose visits to our shores were heralded by magnificent 'puffs preliminary,' each player being set down for the nonce as the greatest of the great, rendered us, we must own, somewhat sceptical about the merits of Herr Ritter. We were thus surprised no less than delighted to find in this new performer a consummate master of his instrument—a pianist whose executancy presents a combination of manual agility with purity and elegance of style which not one player in a thousand attains to. Herr Ritter possesses, too, in its highest perfection, that gift of nature, a beautiful and sympathetic "touch." He handles his piano as though he loved it, and the piano seems to return his affection. The piece selected by Herr Ritter for his début at the Philharmonic was Hummell's fine and far too rarely heard concerto in A minor. Herr Ritter could not have chosen more wisely. Nothing more thoroughly 'pianistic' than this work exists; and perhaps there is none in which so much effect may be made in a natural and orthodox way by a legitimate pianist. We do not mean to say that Hummell's concerto in A minor is not 'difficult' to play, for it demands graces of style and expression which none but a great artist can supply; but the florid passages, truly brilliant though they be, are all what is termed 'grateful'—that is, they lie well under the fingers, and repay with interest whatever labour they may have exacted from the player. Herr Ritter was enthusiastically applauded, and recalled twice after his masterly performance."—Morning Post.

GLUCK'S "IPHIGENIA IN TAURIS," AT ST. JAMES'S HALL.

THE triumphant success achieved by the revival of Gluck's Orfeo at the Théâtre Lyrique in Paris last winter, suggested to Mr. Charles Hallé the production of another master-piece of the illustrious and too-forgotten composer, at the Gentlemen's Concerts in Manchester. Mr. Hallé had many chefs-d'œuvre to select from. He chose Iphigenia in Tauris, one of Gluck's latest dramatic works, and unquestionably one of his grandest. Iphigenia in Tauris was written expressly for the Grand Opera of Paris, and was produced in 1779. The subject forms a sequel to the opera Iphigenia in Aulis, written to an adaptation of Racine's tragedy of that name, and brought out at Vienna a year or two after Gluck had declared his new dramatic style in Orfeo and Alceste. Iphigenia in Tauris was not at first eminently successful; it grew, however, upon the Parisian public, and was held in high estimation for many years.

This is not the place to discuss the question why Gluck's operas have never awakened any sympathy in British audiences. We might suggest, as a reply, that British audiences have seldom had an opportunity of testing their likes or dislikes. It is certainly very questionable whether operas in which long recitatives constitute an integral and important part of the score would ever become popular in this country. To the musical thinker, these sublime dialogues and soliloquies have a meaning and a purpose beyond what they convey to the ear, and suggest thoughts that transcend even the most entrancing melodies. But mixed audiences must be pleased through the senses; and until the operatic public become homogeneous, we fear there is little hope for Gluck's lofty inspirations attaining a wide popularity.

Certainly nothing was left undone by Mr. Charles Hallé on Wednesday night to recommend Iphigenia in Tauris to the hearers. An admirable band and chorus were engaged, and the principal parts of Iphigenia, Pylades, and Orestes, were sustained by Miss Louisa Pyne, Mr. Wilbye Cooper, and Mr. Santley, with Miss Susanna Cole and Miss Theresa Jefferys as Diana and the Priestess.

The performance was a decided success, so much so, that it is announced for repetition on the 4th of July. There were five encores, two being awarded to the chorus, "Chorus of Scythians" by the male choir, and "Hymn to Diana," by the female choir. Miss Pyne sang the long and arduous music of Iphigenia with untiring energy, and exhibited the beauty of her voice and perfect style throughout. Mr. Santley was extremely powerful in the grand declamatory music of Orestes,—more splendid singing indeed we have not heard for years, from native or foreign artist,—and Mr. Wilbye Cooper, as Pylades, was highly intelligent and effective, while Miss Susanna Cole and Miss Theresa Jefferys both acquitted themselves honourably in the small but important parts of Diana and the Priestess.

Mr. Charles Hallé was received with immense cheers, both on his entrance and retirement from the platform, in which the band and chorus joined heartily. His début in this metropolis as a conductor is an unprecedented success.

THE ORPHEONISTS AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

(Communicated.)

THE Orpheonists will arrive during the afternoon of the 24th. The western line of France has several special trains appointed to leave Paris between 9 and 11 p.m. on Saturday night, and five, or if needed six, large steamers will await the trains at Dieppe, arriving at London Bridge station by several special trains in two relays from Newhaven, about one and eight o'clock. The northern line of France have appointed special trains to leave Paris at 11·30 p.m., and three extra steamers will await the arrival of the passengers at Calais and Boulogne, reaching the London Bridge station of the South Eastern Railway in the course of the following afternoon. It has not been found practicable to make use of the offer of the Peninsular and Oriental Company to send specially one of their steamers to Cherbourg, from the circumstance of that port being connected with Paris by only a single line of rails, and the government of France strictly prohibit excursion trains being run on lines thus circumstanced. The two new hotels in the Islington Cattle Market — buildings of enormous capacity — are being fitted up with beds for a large body of the Orpheonists, and it is probable that the North London Railway will afford the means of conveyance daily to Fenchurch Street, whence the distance is short to the London Bridge Station. To ensure the general arrangements being understood by the Orpheonists on their arrival, one hundred commissionaires, selected from the officers of each society, will precede them; these will arrive in London on Thursday night.

That the preparations for the decoration of the Great Orchestra may not be interrupted, it was closed to the public immediately after the great dinner of the Scots Fusilier Guards on Wednesday. Running round the back of the orchestra will be fixed the names of each department of France in which the members of the musical societies are resident. Between the names is a large gilt eagle, surmounted with tricoloured flags, the intermediate spaces being filled in with tricoloured escutcheons or shields. Wreaths of evergreens and flowers, and groups of palm trees and exotic shrubs occupy the lower portion of the back of the orchestra, interspersed with which are busts of celebrated men of France. In front of the organ emblematic devices are being prepared by Mr. E. T. Parris, whose labours in connection with the restoration of the interior of the dome of St. Paul's are well known. A matter of interest will be the exhibition of the banners and emblems of each society. These will be arranged along the rising front of the orchestra; many of them are magnificently embroidered and decorated. In the middle of the great orchestra will be ranged the Band of the Imperial Regiment of Guards. In front a number of harpists will be stationed, who are engaged to accompany the chorus written expressly for the occasion by M. Halevy, who it is anticipated will, with other members of the French Committee of Patronage, visit this country with the Orpheonists. Both the band and the harpists have been placed as near as possible to the front, because although the full choruses can be heard in any part of the vast locale in which the Festival will be held, the extreme delicacy of the wind instruments of the Guides Band will render the possession of reserved seats in the forward blocks desirable.

In addition to accompanying the vocal music in each day's selection, the Band of the Guides will perform selections from their extensive répertoire; and as the arrangements for the audience will be the same as at the Handel Festival, this celebrated band will be heard with the attention which was not possible on the occasion of the fête for the Patriotic Fund in October 1854.

As a conclusion to may be fitting to notice the formation of an influential committee of members of Parliament, selected irrespective of political views, who have kindly undertaken to render any assistance in their power to the Orpheonists, on production of their special passports, at such places of public exhibition or industrial character as are not usually open to visitors. A committee room for this purpose has been established at 4 Old Palace Yard.

The stay of the Orpheonists is limited to one week; they will leave England on the first of July, the three performances being fixed for Monday 25th, Tuesday 26th, and Thursday 28th June.

A MAN OF MARK.

(From the Midland and Northern Counties Herald).

THE week, which commenced with the festivities and sports of Whitsuntide, is to be further enriched, for the lovers of rational recreation in Newcastle, by a visit from Dr. Mark, and his famous band of juvenile musicians. The musical enterprise with which the name of this gentleman is so worthily associated is not a speculation, but a mission; and the doctor himself is not a speculator, but an apostle. It is important for the public to bear this distinction in mind, because by losing sight of it — and classing Dr. Mark with the thousand and one caterers for the amusement of the people who overrun the country, producing disappointment more frequently than satisfaction, and vitiating instead of elevating the popular taste by the character of their entertainments — the public runs the chance not only of losing the opportunity of enjoying a high musical treat, but of advancing the interests of a highly meritorious undertaking. Whitsuntide has for the time being put a period to political debate. The parliamentary mill is at rest; and although topics of vital interest to mankind are turning up with every new minute, in Italy and other quarters of Continental Europe, the discussion of these can at least wait the passage of our brief holiday. Dr. Mark comes with his music at an appropriate season, and as we believe his enterprise capable of producing no small amount of social benefit to the people of this country, and because the history of that enterprise is intrinsically an interesting one, we may do worse than lay a brief outline of it before our readers.

Dr. Mark is a native of Germany, but it is long since he adopted England as his home; and it is also long since he perceived that although the musical education of his adopted country had been sadly neglected, her sons and daughters had musical capabilities equal to the Germans, the Italians, or any other people popularly supposed to have been more highly gifted by Apollo. To a gentleman of musical tastes, and musical culture, this fact could not be long in revealing itself, for the national music — using the term national in its widest significance as comprehending the three kingdoms — furnishes sufficient evidence of the fact that the divine art has been successfully, if not universally, cultivated in these realms. The question which Dr. Mark proposed to himself, and which for twelve years he has been attempting to solve, was whether it was not possible, by a proper system of education, to inspire all classes of the community with a love of music, and bring its refining and elevating influences to bear more directly, and with greater force, upon the domestic life of the people? It is quite certain, as we learn from history, sometimes incidentally, and sometimes by more direct testimony, that centuries ago music was found more frequently among the household gods of all ranks than it is at our own time. Ellis, Gibbons, Morley, Wilbye, Wilks, Bennet, Boyd, Bull, Dowland, Ford, and Ravenscroft, keep the old centuries of English social and religious life vocal; and while musical performances on a scale of magnificence, considering the circumstances of the times, which might make Englishmen of the present age, familiar as they are with Handel commemoration concerts and other Sydenham miracles of a musical kind, open their eyes, were provided for the entertainment and at the expense of the great ones of the kingdom, the inmates of lowly cottages, both rural and urban, had sufficient culture in the musical art to enable them to lighten the labour of the day, and relieve the monotony of their unoccupied evenings with the charms of song. The madrigals of the Elizabethan era attest the skill of the English composers of the period, and must have required no mean performers to do them justice, and the masques which in that and the two succeeding reigns were so frequent in the houses of princes and nobles, entertainments which may be described as a combination of the drama and the opera, had a powerful influence in cultivating a taste for music among all classes. The object of Dr. Mark was, and is, to create a universal demand for music of a high order of excellence, and to cultivate a universal faculty of performing it. Why should it be confined exclusively to the Church, the theatre, the concert-room, or the houses of the wealthy? Might not the members of a working-man's family be trained so as to sing and play with intelligence and taste, and might not the humble abodes of these be rendered more cheerful, more happy, less pervious to the attacks of intemperance, rudeness, bad temper, and the other evil spirits which attack the ignorant and the unoccupied? "Stimulated by a love for music," says Dr. Mark, in an address to the Mayor and Corporation of Manchester, which we have before us, "stimulated by a love for music, which I have cherished since my childhood, and an ardent desire, to bring its heavenly influence within reach of all classes of society by disseminating a taste for music among the rising generation, I adopted music solely as a profession for carrying out my scheme. I began with composing and teaching music. I soon discovered that the method hitherto pursued was greatly defective, which prevented the genius of the pupil being properly developed. I then imposed upon myself the task of constructing an entirely new system upon a more simple and more effective basis." The new system was first tested at Bristol, upon little Bristol boys, in a musical conservatoire which the doctor established there for the purpose. The children attended in the evenings, and received gratuitous instruction, and by-and-bye a juvenile band was formed, and concerts given in Bristol and neighbourhood which surprised and delighted all hearers. It was something entirely new, and as wonderful as it was novel, to see mere children perform on instruments with a skill and effect which would have put many performers to the blush of six times their age, and ten times their training; and the success that attended these concerts, although not quite so great as their merit deserved, was sufficient to encourage Dr. Mark in his labours. In 1854 he recognised the Anglo-French alliance by dressing his corps of juvenile musicians in English and French military costume. Ultimately the Bristol institution was given up as being too limited a field; and as the new enterprise was intended to be national in its dimensions, its originator betook himself to the manufacturing districts, organised a band of boys selected from all quarters of the three kingdoms, and proceeded in his work with an energy and enthusiasm which could have been sustained only in consequence of its basis being laid on an intense love of his art, and which could not be damped by professional jealousy upon the one hand, nor temporary failure on the other. The purpose of Dr. Mark was to establish musical conservatoires in every important town in the United Kingdom for little children, so that the study of music might become a branch of national education in the humblest schools. For years he has prosecuted his work, travelling through England, Scotland, and Ireland, explaining and illustrating his system by lectures and the performances of his juvenile band, and testing the sincerity of his professions by admitting to his entertainments crowds of the poorer children either gratis or at merely nominal prices. The establishment of the Royal College of Music and the Manchester Conservatoire of Music in the great metropolis of cotton are practical efforts, which have been crowned with a large measure of success. The Royal College is intended for pupils from all parts of the country; but none but pupils from Manchester, Salford, and neighbourhood are admitted to the Conservatoire. The pupils in the latter establishment receive instruction in vocal and instrumental music in evening classes, either on payment of a moderate subscription or on condition of their services being given if required by the head of the institution; or in evening classes, through the assistance of voluntary contributions. Orphans whose parents belonged to the musical profession, and poor children who have special musical talents, receive in the Royal College of Music a musical and general education, board, lodging, and clothing free of all expense, until they are fourteen years of age, when they are either apprenticed to a trade or remain in the college to be trained as musical professors. It will thus be seen, from the outline we have given of Dr. Mark's mission, and of the means he has adopted in carrying it out, that it is one which deserves in an eminent degree the support of the public. We hear that up to last year he had spent 50,000*l.* upon it, and so heavy are the expenses attending the management of the Manchester institutions, in consequence of many pupils being educated either partly or wholly free, that, were it not for the support the doctor meets with in his musical tours through the country, we do not see how the institutions could be kept up. This support, however, is not so liberal as it might be, and at his last visit here a few months since was by no means so liberal as it ought to have been. The series of concerts to be given to-day and to-morrow we trust to see well attended. The concerts themselves will, we have no doubt, be of great merit, for Dr. Mark and his "Little Men" never cause disappointment, and the mission in which he is engaged is one that ought to command the sympathy and the assistance of philanthropists of all orders.

COTTINGHAM.—The opening of the grand organ at Cottingham took place last week. Special trains were run from Hull and Beverley, and at the morning service there was a very good attendance. In order to give greater effect to the services, arrangements had been made for the choir of Beverley Minster to attend; and in the morning and evening full choral services were performed. Divine service commenced at eleven o'clock, A.M., being opened by a symphony from Haydn on the new organ, by J. Williamson, Esq. (Mayor of South Shields). The prayers and lessons were read by the Rev. C. Overton, vicar; the litany by the Rev. Mr. Birtwhistle. At the communion service, the Revs. T. M. Macdonald and Mr. Garwood officiated; and the sermon was preached by the Rev. T. M. Macdonald, incumbent of Trinity Church, Nottingham. The rev. gentleman took his text from Revelations, xxi., 3—5. The musical services consisted of two voluntaries by Mr. J. Rogers, of Doncaster, on themes by Sebastian Bach; the Venite; Psalms (Feeton and Corfe); Te Deum and Jubilate (Dr. Whitfield); anthem, "Give the Lord honour," Kent; Sanctus (Jomelli); Kyrie (Dr. Camidge); Gloria (Jackson); the Hundredth Psalm, and concluding extemporaneous voluntary, by Mr. Rogers. The powers of the instrument were fully tested by Mr. Rogers, who expressed himself of opinion that it is one of the finest in England, reflecting great credit on the builders, Messrs. Forster and Andrews. It would be invidious to particularise the quality of any portion, all being in such perfect condition. The mechanism, though tested to the utmost by Mr. Rogers, worked uniformly well. The congregation of Cottingham church have, therefore, abundant reason to be proud of this addition to their beautiful village edifice. Amongst the company present were the Rev. Canon Wray, the Rev. Messrs. Kinnear, Brown, and Monk (Holy Trinity Church, Hull); the Rev. Mr. Cooper, Driffield; the Rev. Mr. Escell, Beverley; the Rev. Mr. Sandars, incumbent of Skidby Church; Benjamin Haworth, Esq., and family; Mrs. Barkworth; Thomas Ringrose, Esq., and family; John Ringrose, Esq., and family; Thomas Voase, Esq., and family, Anlaby House; Mrs. Birtwhistle and family, &c. The collection at the conclusion of the morning service amounted to £75. 8*s.* 9*d.* Evening service commenced at half-past six o'clock, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. C. Overton, vicar. The choral services consisted of Psalms (Beckwith and Purcell); Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis (Dr. Whitfield); anthem, "God is our hope and strength" (Dr. Greene); 33rd Hymn (York); the Hallelujah chorus performed in a style which electrified the congregation, and voluntaries by Mr. Rogers and Mr. Williamson. The Beverley choir were very effective. The total collection amounted to £106. The church was crowded in the evening, and Mr. Rogers played gloriously. Mr. Williamson is a good amateur organist; and being a large subscriber (he and his father give £500 towards the organ) was asked to play the first voluntary.

BELFAST.—(From our correspondent.)—An interesting selection of pieces from various masters was performed on Monday, the 11th inst, at Holywood Church, in a most masterly manner, by one of our resident organists—Mr. F. J. Robinson. It is a remarkable fact that, whereas but five or six years ago there was not one first-class organist in this modern Athens, now we have several: and it proves what rapid strides music is making amongst us, that people will now listen to Bach with attention; and, indeed, seem to perceive that there is a "fitness" in his music, which they can scarcely see in Rossini's prayer from Mosè in Egitto, "played on all the stops," alternately, for Divine Service. The following was the programme of Mr. Robinson:—Sonata (D minor), Bach; adagio (sextet, Op 81), Beethoven; fugue (C major), Bach; Jerusalem (St. Paul), Mendelssohn; toccata and fugue (D minor), Bach; Santa Maria, Marcia Religioso, and allegro animato, Meyerbeer; allegretto, (Hymn of Praise), Mendelssohn; fugue (E minor), Bach. Our new hall—to be called the Ulster Hall—is being built; and from the completeness of the plans prepared by the Company's architect, Mr. Barre, we have reason to believe that for convenience and comfort, especially to the artistes, it will equal, if not surpass, anything in the United Kingdom. In size, it will be within two feet of the Birmingham Town Hall. The directors were unfortunately not in a position to complete the long-impending purchase of the Panopticon Organ until too late; however, they are determined that its loss shall only be a pecuniary one, and that we shall really have a grand instrument, one that will be in keeping with the hall, and a credit to the town.

MR. WALLWORTH is in town for Pupils, and will be at liberty for Concerts, &c. until the opening of the Royal English Opera, Covent Garden, in the Autumn.—30 Edwards Street, Portman Square, W.

WHITBY, YORKSHIRE.—WANTED, an efficient BRASS BAND, of not less than Eight persons, who will be required to perform daily on West Cliff, Whitby, and to be otherwise at the disposal of the Committee for other engagements. Terms per week, with references, to be forwarded to the Honorary Secretary to the Subscription Band, Mr. James Wilkinson, Hanover Terrace, Whitby.

CHURCH ORGANS.—FORSTER and ANDREWS, Organ Builders, Hull, have a number of SECOND-HAND ORGANS for sale, which they have taken in exchange, built by Bevington, the late J. C. Bishop, Lincoln, Parsons, Bryceson, Holdich, &c.—For price and particulars, apply to Forster and Andrews, Organ Builders, Hull.

THE MUTUAL LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY, 39 King Street, Cheapside, E.C.—A.D. 1831.—The TWENTY-SIXTH ANNUAL REPORT, Cash Account, Balance-Sheet, &c., are now ready, and may be had on written or personal application.—CHARLES INGALL, Actuary.

NEW SONGS by J. W. DAVISON, "Rough wind that moanest lond" (sung by Mr. Santley at the Monday Popular Concerts); "Swifter far than Summer's flight," (sung by Miss Palmer at the Monday Popular Concerts); "False friend, wilt thou smile or weep," Beatrice's song in the Cenci (sung by Madame Sainton-Dolby, at the Monday Popular Concerts, St. James's Hall); are published by Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201 Regent Street.

The above Songs form Nos. 1, 2, and 3 of Vocal Illustrations of Shelley.

"Mr. Santley was encored in one of the thoroughly picturesque and poetical settings of Shelley, by Mr. J. W. Davison, mentioned a week or two since. His song, 'Rough wind that moanest loud,' is a thoroughly good song."—Athenæum.

"Madame Sainton-Dolby's greatest efforts were called forth by Mendelssohn's 'Night' song, and Mr. J. W. Davison's 'False friend, wilt thou smile or weep' (from Shelley's 'Cenci'), to both of which she did the amplest justice. The latter work is one of the most poetical and beautiful of the 'Vocal Illustrations of Shelley,' composed by Mr. Davison many years ago, and which, though rarely heard, possess far more sterling merit than nine-tenths of the most admired songs of the day. A more intellectual treatment of the words could not well be imagined. Mr. Davison has completely caught the spirit of the poetry, and heightened its beauty by the potent charms which belong only to the sister art. 'False friend, wilt thou smile or weep,' sung to perfection by Madame Sainton-Dolby, was enthusiastically applauded."

GREAT NATIONAL ENTERPRISE

Organised in 1848, and developed at THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC, BRIDGE STREET, MANCHESTER, established by him expressly as a Great National Institution to facilitate the Encouragement and Promotion of NATIVE MUSICAL TALENT, and the GENERAL ADVANCEMENT OF MUSIC AMONG THE RISING GENERATION, upon his new and effective system, also as a NORMAL SCHOOL, for the training of masters to conduct CONSERVATOIRES OF MUSIC to be established throughout the United Kingdom, for LITTLE CHILDREN, the whole comprising an entirely new scheme of NATIONAL EDUCATION, by blending music with general instruction, so that the study of music shall become a branch of education in the humblest of schools of this country. To illustrate and to rouse an interest in every town and city for these institutions, Dr. Mark travels with a number of his pupils occasionally through the country—giving lectures, and introducing his highly approved and pleasing Musical Entertainment, entitled DR. MARK AND HIS LITTLE MEN, who number upwards of Thirty Instrumentalists, and a most Efficient Chorus, the whole forming a most unique and complete Juvenile Orchestra, composed of LITTLE ENGLISH, IRISH, SCOTCH AND WELCH BOYS, FROM FIVE TO SIXTEEN YEARS OF AGE, who play Operatic Selections, Solos, Marches, Quadrilles, Galops, &c., and sing Songs and Choruses in a most effective manner, and to whom Dr. Mark gives a gratuitous General and Musical Education.

APPOINTMENTS OF MASTERS AND ARRANGEMENTS OF CLASSES IN THE ABOVE INSTITUTION.

Principal of the Royal College of Music; Director, Composer, and Conductor; Lecturer to both Private and Public, Theoretical and Practical Instrumental and Vocal Classes	Dr. MARK.
Master of the General Educational Department; Writing, Reading, Arithmetic, Grammar, Dictation, History, Geography, Practical Geometry, and Book-keeping	Mr. POWELL and Two Assistant Teachers.

Concertina (German and English)	Mr. ELDER.
Vocal Classes	Messrs. POWELL and ELDER.

Dr. MARK has also made provision for the Orphans of the Musical Profession possessing musical talent, who will find the above institution a happy home, and receive a most effective general and musical education, board, and clothing, free of all expense.

Little Boys, from five to nine years of age, apprenticed for three, five, or seven years by paying a moderate entrance fee to cover the expenses of instrument and books.

Twelve appointments ready for Masters.

For Prospectuses, apply direct to the Royal College of Music, Bridge Street, Manchester.

Dr. MARK is also open to Engagements with his little Men.

Dr. MARK begs to invite the Parents and Friends, and all those interested in his Enterprise and in the Education of the Youths of this country, to visit his establishment. Visiting hours:—From Nine to Eleven, a.m., and Two and Four, p.m. Saturdays and Sundays excepted.

DR. MARK'S

GREAT NATIONAL ENTERPRISE

Organised in 1848, and developed at THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC, BRIDGE STREET, MANCHESTER, established by him expressly as a Great National Institution to facilitate the Encouragement and Promotion of NATIVE MUSICAL TALENT, and the GENERAL ADVANCEMENT OF MUSIC AMONG THE RISING GENERATION, upon his new and effective system, also as a NORMAL SCHOOL, for the training of masters to conduct CONSERVATOIRES OF MUSIC to be established throughout the United Kingdom, for LITTLE CHILDREN, the whole comprising an entirely new scheme of NATIONAL EDUCATION, by blending music with general instruction, so that the study of music shall become a branch of education in the humblest of schools of this country. To illustrate and to rouse an interest in every town and city for these institutions, Dr Mark travels with a number of his pupils occasionally through the country—giving lectures, and introducing his highly approved and pleasing Musical Entertainment, entitled DR. MARK AND HIS LITTLE MEN, who number upwards of Thirty Instrumentalists, and a most Efficient Chorus, the whole forming a most unique and complete Juvenile Orchestra, composed of LITTLE ENGLISH, IRISH, SCOTCH AND WELCH BOYS, FROM FIVE TO SIXTEEN YEARS OF AGE, who play Operatic Selections, Solos, Marches, Quadrilles, Galops, &c., and sing Songs and Choruses in a most effective manner, and to whom Dr. Mark gives a gratuitous General and Musical Education.

APPOINTMENTS OF MASTERS AND ARRANGEMENTS OF CLASSES IN THE ABOVE INSTITUTION.

Principal of the Royal College of Music; Director, Composer, and Conductor; Lecturer to both Private and Public, Theoretical and Practical Instrumental and Vocal Classes	Dr. MARK.
Master of the General Educational Department; Writing, Reading, Arithmetic, Grammar, Dictation, History, Geography, Practical Geometry, and Book-keeping	Mr. POWELL and Two Assistant Teachers.

PRACTICAL ASSISTANT TEACHERS.

Organ	Mr. BAKER.
Pianoforte	Herr SIEMERS. Mr. ELDER.
Violin	Mons. ROGUIER. Mr. BEARD.
Violoncello, Double Bass, and Viola	Mons. VIEUXTEMPS. Mr. T. DONOVAN.
Flute, Piccolo, Oboe, and Clarionet	Sig. CORTESI.
Cornet and other Brass Instruments	Mr. H. RUSSELL.
Concertina (German and English)	Mr. ELDER.
Vocal Classes	Messrs. POWELL and ELDER.

Dr. MARK has also made provision for the Orphans of the Musical Profession possessing musical talent, who will find the above institution a happy home, and receive a most effective general and musical education, board, and clothing, free of all expense.

Little Boys, from five to nine years of age, apprenticed for three, five, or seven years by paying a moderate entrance fee to cover the expenses of instrument and books.

Twelve appointments ready for Masters.

For Prospectuses, apply direct to the Royal College of Music, Bridge Street, Manchester.

Dr. MARK is also open to Engagements with his little Men.

Dr. MARK begs to invite the Parents and Friends, and all those interested in his Enterprise and in the Education of the Youths of this country, to visit his establishment. Visiting hours:—From Nine to Eleven, a.m., and Two and Four, p.m. Saturdays and Sundays excepted.

NEW SONGS by J. W. DAVISON, "Rough wind that moanest loud" (sung by Mr. Santley at the Monday Popular Concerts); "Swifter far than Summer's flight," (sung by Miss Palmer at the Monday Popular Concerts); "False friend, wilt thou smile or weep," Beatrice's song in the Cenci (sung by Madame Sainton-Dolby, at the Monday Popular Concerts, St. James's Hall); are published by Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201 Regent Street.

The above Songs form Nos. 1, 2, and 3 of Vocal Illustrations of Shelley.

"Mr. Santley was encored in one of the thoroughly picturesque and poetical settings of Shelley, by Mr. J. W. Davison, mentioned a week or two since. His song, 'Rough wind that moanest loud,' is a thoroughly good song."—Athenæum.

"Madame Sainton-Dolby's greatest efforts were called forth by Mendelssohn's 'Night' song, and Mr. J. W. Davison's 'False friend, wilt thou smile or weep' (from Shelley's 'Cenci'), to both of which she did the amplest justice. The latter work is one of the most poetical and beautiful of the 'Vocal Illustrations of Shelley,' composed by Mr. Davison many years ago, and which, though rarely heard, possess far more sterling merit than nine-tenths of the most admired songs of the day. A more intellectual treatment of the words could not well be imagined. Mr. Davison has completely caught the spirit of the poetry, and heightened its beauty by the potent charms which belong only to the sister art. 'False friend, wilt thou smile or weep,' sung to perfection by Madame Sainton-Dolby, was enthusiastically applauded."

THE DEFINITION AND DESCRIPTION OF THE ORGAN.

WITH SOME ACCOUNT OF ITS MECHANISM.*

THE Organ is a wind instrument, with a key-board, the sounds of which are fixed, but capable of being sustained at the will of the player, especially consecrated to the service of the Church.

This definition makes the organ liable to all that may be expected of it by the laws both of art and religion.

On first looking at its case exteriorly, we are struck more especially with three things: with the immense size of its pipes in front, which we take to be the most powerful in the instrument, though they are, on the contrary, the least so; with the key-boards, which, though we should hardly have thought it perhaps, were we to put down the keys, would at once give utterance to those great pipes; and with a quantity of knobs or handles, which stand out from the case of the organ on two sides of the key-board, and carrying, each of them, the name of some instrument, such as the flute, the viol da gamba, the trumpet, and the like. But nothing of all this acts or speaks alone, for in order to this various parts of the organ must be joined together, and all these various parts do not at once meet the eye.

The organ has no voice, but by means of the wind inhaled by the bellows, and these are placed as near the main body of the instrument as possible, in order that they may send the wind the more directly into the pipes which rest upon it. Herein we may compare the instrument to a man, who would not be able to make himself understood without inhaling the air, which, after it has been equally distributed throughout his lungs, is driven out by them again through the vocal passages. The bellows, with its feeders, is as much the chest to the organ as the lungs are to the human frame. Put in motion by the blower, they fill themselves one after the other,† and are emptied into a common channel placed near their extremity, and this is called the main wind trunk.

From this main channel other wind trunks branch off, as branches from the same common root, and carry the source of its sound into all parts of the instrument, as the branches of the tree carry the sap, or rather, as we have taken the human frame for our analogy, these smaller wind trunks are as the arteries, which, by means of the heaven-sprung system of the circulation, carry on the blood, which is pumped forth by the heart, throughout the whole of the body. The wind thus conveyed by one or many channels, gathers itself together and is compressed in a sort of chest or large hollow table, on which the pipes of the organ are placed, and is called the sound-board. The interior of the sound-board is but little less complicated than the vocal organ of the human body. It is from them that the compressed air has to escape by the pallets, and so to be transformed into distinct and varied sounds in the hundreds of pipes which bristle on the surface of the sound-board. This wind box, this transformer of the compressed air into sound, is, as it were, the centre of all the mechanical parts of the instrument, which are necessary for the production of sound; the place where they all meet together, and to which they all tend, and hence, perhaps, its name of sound-board. Here it is that we find out if the bellows are weak or strong, if the hand of the organist touches the keys with or without effect, if the pallets on being opened cause an harmonious sound, or merely a disagreeable cyphering, and thus the sound-board becomes the centre of all that is good or bad in the organ; it is, to continue our analogy taken from the human frame, as the heart, to which all the system of the circulation of the blood flows as to a centre; and as the throat, from whence proceeds the word, expressive of the inward soul.

But how is this mechanical contrivance, this magic air-transformer, to be itself made to act, for though we should fill all the sound-boards imaginable with wind, this alone would not be sufficient to create a sound, still less an harmonious sound. The instrument just turned out from the hands of the builder, and supplied with wind by the action of the bellows, is still only a dumb instrument. The mysterious power of giving speech to the organ is to be found in the organist, who after a preliminary operation, of which we will speak presently, places his hands upon the clavier or key-board, the true key to his mysterious power, as its Latin root clavis indicates, and it is then only that the instrument ceases to be dumb, and sings in accents of joy or sadness according to the genius of the man, of whom it may be said to be both slave and master.

Three things then concur for making the organ speak; a bellows, which may be called the starting point; the pipes, which are placed upon the sound-board, and may be called the end; and thirdly, the hands of the organist, which may be called the means, for it is to them that all the mechanism of the organ from the clavier to the sound-board is subject, and it is by their means that the passages for the air, which supplies the pipes, are opened or shut as the organist pleases.

Since the most interesting details of all this mechanism meet in the sound-board, as in a centre, we will briefly analyse its form and action. In doing this, we do not intend to give a formal list of its many component parts, but simply to give such a general account of them as may be sufficient for our present purpose. In building, especially, we want to see a great deal, to know but little.

The sound-board then, as we have already said, may be described as a long, square-cornered chest, six or eight inches in depth, the upper-board of which is pierced with as many holes as there are pipes to be placed in order, as an harmonious forest of trees, upon its surface. All the pipes which emit the same quality of tone are planted together in a straight line in the same row, and each row of pipes of the same quality of tone is called a stop. The hole in the foot of each pipe is in communication with the interior of the sound-board, but is separated from the wind by two obstacles, viz., a register and a pallet.

The register is a rule of wood, placed within the sound-board, exactly under the feet of the pipes, and sliding horizontally backwards and forwards, in a groove, as completely air-tight as it is smooth and even. This rule, so-called because it rules or directs the action of the wind, is itself pierced with holes exactly corresponding with those in the upper-board of the sound-board for the feet of the pipes, in such way that, as the rule is moved, the holes in the feet of the pipes and those of the rules are perpendicular or set the one to the other. When they are perpendicular to one another, the ruler, far from being an obstacle to the entrance of the wind into the pipes, is, on the contrary, its conductor, for then the foot of the pipes, by which the wind enters, is in immediate communication with the interior of the sound-board.

We will suppose, then, that the organist wishes to make that quality of sound or that stop which represents the trumpet heard throughout the extent of the key-board. Before putting his hands on the key-board, he places it on one of those knobs, which stand out from the case of the organ, which serve as places for inscribing the names of the registers, and, in this instance, he places it on that one of them which is labelled trumpet, and draws it out. No sooner has he done so than the wind before shut up within the sound-board, so far as this obstacle is concerned, is at once enabled to be in direct communication with the pipes of the quality of tone required, and the preliminary operation is thus far completed. The organist repeats this action for all the registers of which he intends to compose his orchestra. Thus, if he wishes it to be composed of a bourdon and flute, as well as the trumpet, he draws the knobs which answer to those registers; if only two of those registers, he pushes in one of the three, and so of the rest.

But the second obstacle has still to be removed; the pallet must be made to open. The pallet may be described as a little door on a spring, occupying a lower region in the sound-board, a region which may be very properly called that of storms, inasmuch as a certain amount of force is required to overcome the resistance of the wind which rushes headlong from the action of the bellows into the space opened by the gaping of the pallet, and called a groove. The pallet is connected with the key by means of a tracker, which is sometimes of very considerable length, but however far removed the pallet may be from the key-board by the tracker, it is affected by the slightest action on the key, and that with greater rapidity according to the greater perfection of the mechanism.

There are as many pallets as grooves, as many pallets and grooves as keys, and often more pallets and grooves than keys for the bass notes, which being composed of larger pipes, require more wind, and consequently more openings by which to inhale it.

The bellows then being filled, and the registers drawn, as many notes will speak on the sound-board as there are keys put down by the fingers of the organist, for the wind must then of necessity pass from the sound-board to the pipes of which the registers and pallets are open, and is thus transformed, or becomes sonorous in accordance with a law of accoustics, which we shall have to consider later on . . . . . Hence, before touching the key-board, the organist must always draw the registers, for if he did not do so, the keys would no doubt open a passage for the wind, but this wind would only strike against the roof formed by that part of the sound-board which is full of registers, without being able to transform itself into vibrating columns of air in the bodies of the pipes.

But in an instrument so vast as an organ, there is but one sound-board and but one key-board. The organ has but one soul, it is true, but this one soul animates several bodies. There are, in consequence, as many keyboards as there are principal separate parts in an organ, but experience and the requirements of art have for the most part limited them to three or four at most.

Often an organ limited in extent from want of means or space, has but one principal part, but one body: when this is not the case, and it has more than one such part, that part which is the most largely developed and speaks the loudest, is called the great-organ. Immediately below this, as regards its power and volume of sound, is placed the choir-organ; while the swell-organ takes up an intermediate position between these two principal parts, and is destined to give effect to those phrases of music which require a more delicate and special handling, and for which the choir-organ supplies the proper accompaniment. Last of all comes the *echo-organ, emitting veiled and smothered sounds, as its name implies, though it must be confessed it does so more in name than in reality.

These different parts of the organ may be all enclosed within the case, including the choir-organ, though this is very commonly placed in a case apart by itself, and brought in front of the great-organ, so as, in appearance, to form an organ in miniature. It was so placed, almost without exception, in the older organs. All the keyboards, not excepting that of the choir, are placed in steps one above another, the first and lowest that of the choir, next above this that of the great-organ, above this again that of the swell, and at the top of all that of the echo-organ.

We have said nothing as yet of a key-board which is placed on the floor at the feet of the organist, and forms quite a peculiar feature in his art. This is the pedal-organ, the keys of which are long and short like those of the manual, and have under their control a special sound-board of their own, which carries the pipes which emit the gravest sounds of the instrument. Without the pedal the concert of the organ is incomplete; with it the organist is possessed of a powerful foundation bass, but such that he may even raise it to the dignity of a solo instrument, by causing it to take an independent and special part of its own, a part, however, which should be always more or less grave and dignified in its character, enriched with passages of energy and rapidity according to the skill of the organist.

Seated then in front of these different key-boards, between the organ and the altar, the organist may be compared to the helmsman placed between the rudder and the masts of the ship, attentive alike to the signals of the captain and the motions of the waves. In his case it is the mighty flood of the peoples' song that the organist sustains with the majesty of his chords, while his signals come to him from the sanctuary, the ceremonies of which he follows, and by means of a mirror placed obliquely, he may even turn his back on the altar, as in the ancient organs, see all that is done there as it were before his face, and join his intention with that of the priest who offers the divine mysteries.

* Note of Translator.—This last is not found in English organs as at present constructed. In its place is found now either a solo, or what Mr. Hill has called a combination-organ in the Birmingham Town Hall Organ.

Letter to the Editor.

THE THEORY OF HARMONICS.

SIR,—Preparatory to entering upon a consideration of other subjects connected with the Science of Music, permit me to offer the following remarks explanatory of the theory of harmonics,—an important branch of the science, but one, by musicians generally, but imperfectly understood, and has thus led to the most erroneous conclusions.

The harmonics of a sound are, theoretically, those whose vibrations in a given period are some integral number of times those of the given sound; thus, whilst the generating sound gives one vibration, its harmonics are those which give 2, 3, 4, &c. vibrations in the same time. As the number of vibrations of a musical string is inversely as its length, the above corresponds with, and is equivalent to, a division of the string into 2, 3, 4, or a greater number of equal parts, one of which parts gives the harmonic sound. Let then a musical string giving a certain sound, say C, be divided into any number of equal parts, as denoted by the following figures, then one of these parts will give the corresponding harmonic, the figures also representing the ratio of its vibrations as compared with the generating sound, or unity, the ratios of the other sounds, one with another, being similarly exhibited:—

1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12	13	14	15	16
C	C	G	C	E	G	*	C	D	E	*	G	*	*	B	C	&c.

Were the series extended further, it would be seen that every harmonic as it enters the series becomes the generator of another series of harmonics, following each other precisely in the same order and ratio as those of the original series, and these again of others, and so on to infinity, the whole of which are harmonics of the original generating sound; thus the series commencing with G is from C as above:—

	3	6	9	12	15
	G	G	D	G	B	&c.
or from G	1	2	3	4	5

These harmonic sounds are exactly similar in their order and ratios to those of the series commmencing with C. Comparing the magnitudes of the harmonic intervals, we perceive that they gradually become less, according to the following ratios, $\frac{1}{2}$, $\frac{1}{3}$, $\frac{1}{4}$, $\frac{1}{5}$, $\frac{1}{6}$, $\frac{1}{7}$, and so on; but as the smallest consonant interval is $\frac{1}{5}$, therefore $\frac{1}{6}$ and all following are dissonant intervals. Confining our attention for the present to the consonant ratios 1, 3, 5, considering the octave sounds as identical, we perceive that the generating sound produces firstly its 5th, and secondly its major 3d, and as these harmonics become the generators of other series similar to the first, the law is general; obeying this law we are enabled to exhibit the harmonics in a tabular form, thus disposing of the sounds as they enter by 5ths in vertical columns, and as they enter by major 3ds in horizontal columns; we have, formed from the consonant ratios, the following

Synopsis of Harmonic Sounds:—

RATIOS.	1	5	25	125	625	3125
1	B𝄫	D𝄫	F	A	C♯	E♯
3	F𝄫	A𝄫	C	E	G♯	B♯
9	C𝄫	E𝄫	G	B	D♯	F𝄪
27	G𝄫	B𝄫	D	F♯	A♯	C𝄪
81	d𝄫	f	a	c♯	e♯	g𝄪
243	a𝄫	c	e	g♯	b♯	d𝄪

which exhibits them in every relation and combination. The ratio of the vibrations of any sound as compared with the generator may be found by multiplying together the ratios at the heads of the two columns which intersect each other at the required sound. The table may be extended indefinitely in any or every direction; it may also be curtailed so as to commence with any sound as generator, taking care only that such portion is contained by four sides parallel with those of the table, the ratio, of course, commencing with that sound. It may also terminate upon any sound. Taking the first sound in the Table, B𝄫, we perceive that all the sounds contained in the table are harmonics of that sound, also, that they are negative harmonics of d𝄪, the last sound in the table, that is, not one sound in the table is an harmonic of d × but it is an harmonic of every sound therein. B♭ b and d × may therefore be called the positive and negative harmonic bases of the table, that is, they are the nearest sounds which are harmonic bases of all the sounds in the table, other sounds more remote, and consequently not exhibited, being also harmonic bases of the same sounds. As we may curtail the table so as to commence or terminate with any sound, it is evident that the same sound has both its positive and negative harmonics, thus C is the positive harmonic base of all the sounds within the double lines, and is the negative harmonic base of those within the waved lines; the remaining sounds are not in any way harmonics of C. It follows also that as C is an harmonic of all the sounds within the waved lines, all the harmonics of C are also harmonics of these sounds, for as any of these sounds will produce C as a positive harmonic, so also will they produce all the harmonics of C.

It is evident from the construction of the table, that any two adjacent sounds in either the vertical or horizontal columns are consonant, and that they are also positively or negatively harmonics of each other; also that all sounds proceeding diagonally from the bases, or parallel with these diagonals, are harmonics, positively or negatively, of each other, but at the same time no two are consonant; thus C is a negative harmonic base of D♭, and a positive harmonic base of B, yet neither of these sounds are consonant with C or with each other, as denoted by their ratios, so that all major 7ths are positive harmonics, and their inversions the minor 2ds (or minor 9ths) are negative harmonics. The diagonals, or their parallels, proceeding in this direction may therefore be called harmonic diagonals. On the contrary, in the opposite diagonals, namely, those at right angles to the former, any two adjacent sounds are consonant, but are not harmonics in any way, of each other; thus in the diagonal passing through C, the sounds E♭ and A are both excluded from those portions having C for their base, but C is evidently consonant with either of these sounds, as in the chords F, A, C, and A♭, C, E♭, therefore all minor 3ds and their inversions, the major 6ths are not harmonics, these diagonals may be distinguished as the consonant diagonals. The reason of these facts is evident; from the slightest glance at the order of the sounds in the table it is seen that they proceed from the first sound, through all the keys gradually requiring a less number of flats in the scale, to C, and thence through the keys gradually requiring a greater number of sharps, so that from any given sound, no positive harmonic, distinct from the octaves of that sound, can be produced which shall also be a sound contained in any primary chord, the basis of which is the tonic of a key requiring a greater number of flats, or a less number of sharps in the scale than the key of which the given sound is the tonic, for all such sounds, as compared with the given sound, are either negative harmonics, or harmonics of these: for instance, the subdominant and the dominant 7th are not positive harmonics.

Having thus far glanced at the general principles of harmonics, we may now proceed to enquire whether the harmonic bases are identical, or how far they are so, with what are generally termed fundamental basses, a term, by the bye, not very appropriate, and has thus led to much confusion, but which we may retain, being careful to distinguish it from the harmonic base until we ascertain how far one is identical with the other. In pursuance of this object, let us examine the annexed diagram of harmonic sounds.

Positive Ratios.	1	5
1	C	E	3
3	G	B	1
	5	1	Negative Ratios.

C and B are the positive and negative harmonic bases, but forming the harmonic diagonal are not consonant sounds; C, the generating sound, produces G and E consonant with each other, and both consonant with C, the positive harmonic base, known also as the grave harmonic, that is the nearest positive harmonic base formed by the coincident vibrations of the two sounds E and G, and is in this case also the fundamental bass or root of the perfect concord C, E, G. Now as a perfect concord, excluding octaves, does not consist of more than three different sounds, the fundamental bass must be one of these three; this is so self-evident, that it may at once be accepted as an axiom. It is also clear from the diagram that the sounds B, G, E, reckoning from the negative harmonic base B, have exactly the same ratios one with another as the sounds C, E, G, reckoning from the positive base C, and consequently as they form a perfect concord, the fundamental bass is one of the three sounds B, G, E, therefore C, the positive harmonic base, is in this case not the fundamental bass or root of the chord B, G, E. As in the chord C, E, G, we proceed in a direction from the fundamental bass, so in the negative chord, where the order of everything is reversed, we proceed in a direction to the fundamental bass, or E, as the root of the chord E, G, B, the sounds being arranged within the octave above the fundamental bass. E, G, being a minor 3rd, as seen in the diagram, the chord takes the name of the minor chord, hence a minor chord is always negative, and has the 5th of the scale, or dominant, for its harmonic base, a major chord is always positive and has the 1st of the scale, or tonic, for its harmonic base. To illustrate this still further, take the following sounds:—

A♭	C	E

C as before is the positive harmonic base of the sounds E, G, B, but D♭, F, A♭, and an infinity of other sounds to which C is the negative base, are also positive harmonic bases, but more remote than C, of the same sounds, as well as to the major chord C, E, G; hence to assume that D♭, F, A♭, &c. are also fundamental basses to the chords C, E, G and E, G, B is simply absurd. Indeed the harmonic bases, in a general sense, have not that influential character, nor play the important part, which some theorists are inclined to assign to them; in the last diagram the harmonic bases D♭ and B are the only two sounds not consonant with C (evident from the construction of the table), and if these two sounds be removed, those remaining are the "System of Sounds" of which C is the unit sound, and F the primary basis; by comparing these with the "System of Sounds" (Musical World, Jan. 28), it will be seen that the really important sounds are F, C and G, the primary or central bases; these, and not the harmonic bases D♭ and B, being the true fundamental basses of the primary chords, whether major or minor, the general expression for the ratio of the fundamental bass being $\frac{1}{3}$, that is, a 5th below the dominant, or unit sound. If we extend the diagram as follows, we have merely another view of the "Systems of Sounds" as derived from the theory of harmonics, from which all the results previously shown could have been deduced, though not with the same simplicity.

It were needless to give further explanation of these here, a comparison of them with the system of sounds, as explained in my previous letters, rendering such unnecessary; suffice it to say, that herein is exhibited in a very condensed form the true principles of major and minor chords, with their fundamental basses, progressions, &c., and the fallacies derived from harmonic bases, unit bases, &c., under whatever name they may be given, made apparent. I refer to a few late instances of these in the papers of Mr. D. C. Hewitt, in the Musical World, merely for illustration. He, assuming that the intervals in his equivocal chord B, D, F, A♭, are all minor 3ds, gives their harmonic bases under the name of unit sounds (which he evidently mistakes for fundamental basses); these sounds as minor 3ds are represented in the "Synopsis of Harmonic Sounds" by the letters B, D, f, and ab, and if we find the smallest portion of the table containing these sounds, under the restriction that the 4 sides are parallel with those of the table, we find that its positive harmonic base is Cb, which is the nearest base of all the sounds of the given chord, the other bases which he gives, viz. Eb, Gb, G, Bb, and Db, being only harmonic bases of portions of the chord, as is evident from the table. In the same way, if we take the real sounds of the chord, represented in the table by the letters B, D, F, Ab, then the nearest positive harmonic base of all these sounds is Db, so that these harmonic bases, looked upon generally as being fundamental basses, or roots of chords, is an absurdity, and the basses, as such, would be ridiculous, a term in which Mr. Hewitt agrees with me as being very applicable. According to the principles developed in this and some preceding letters, G is the fundamental bass of this chord, to which are added the sounds F, Ab, having F for the fundamental bass; if to these two be added the negative base of F, Ab, or C, we have the sounds G, F, C, the primary bases, and the essential sounds of the Key of C.

In the series of harmonic sounds in the first portion of this letter, it will be perceived that to some harmonics, as 7, 11, 13, &c., there are not given any representative sounds; in explanation of this, then, we have seen that every harmonic, as it enters the series, gives out its harmonics in exactly the same order and ratios; consequently the series commencing with 7, would be, reckoned from C, 7, 14, 21, 28, 35, 42, 49, 56, &c.

Now whatever names we choose to give to the seven sounds of the scale commencing with the sound 7, as above, the sounds 49, 77, 91, &c. would still be unrepresented in the same manner as 7, 11, 13, &c. in the former series, and so on to infinity. So that not only the prime numbers, 7 and upwards, but also every integral power of these primes become the origin of other series of harmonics, into which enter all multiples of these primes, but none of which could appear in the first series, evident from the composition of the ratios; the sounds in the last series, if represented literally, would be in the ratio of 7:1 with the similar sounds of the first series, but as the multiplier 7 does not enter into the composition of consonant ratios, the last series would be always dissonant as compared with the first. In fact, if we take unity as a standard of pitch, every prime number is the origin of a series of harmonics similar but of a different pitch to that having unity as its origin, or of any sound derived from unity through the consonant intervals. In illustration of this, suppose a pianoforte or other musical instrument tuned so that the sound represented by C should give eight vibrations in a certain time, then, if we further suppose another instrument tuned so that the sound represented by the same C should give seven vibrations in the same time, we should have a representation of the two series of sounds, having 1 and 7, or 8 and 7 for their origin; if eight then be the standard pitch, the instrument tuned to C, seven vibrations would be, as a musician would term it, more than a tone flat, and the sounds of the two instruments would not combine in any harmonious relation whatever. So that these prime numbers, or the powers of these primes, are the originators of series of harmonics which do not combine in any way with those reckoned from unity, or with each other, and are practically considered merely as differences in pitch.

Apologizing for the length to which these remarks have extended,

The Operas.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

The first performance for eleven years of Cimarosa's best-known, if not best, opera, Il Matrimonio Segreto, which took place on Saturday, was a decided success; far greater, indeed, than we anticipated from the rather unfavourable reception it met with in 1849, when revived both at Her Majesty's Theatre and the Royal Italian Opera. The little favour a work once so popular obtained then was the more unaccountable, as the cast at both theatres was extremely attractive; that at the elder house comprising the names of Mesdames Parodi, Giuliani, and Alboni, Signors Calzolari, Lablache, and F. Lablache; at the new house, Mesdames Persiani, Grisi, and Angri, Signors Marie, Tamburini, and Tagliafico. The opera, nevertheless, ran but a few nights at either place, and may be said thenceforward to have been entirely shelved, as no attempt has been made to reproduce it since. The principal cause of its revival at Her Majesty's Theatre is doubtless to exhibit Signor Ciampi in one of those parts in which he had earned his continental reputation. The character of Geronimo is beyond the grasp of ordinary artists; and, indeed, no singer since Lablache, excepting Tamburini, had attempted it at all. Signor Ciampi created a highly favourable impression in his new essay, proving himself an artist of rare intelligence and rare endowments. His comedy is a very happy combination of art and instinct; his humour is natural and entirely his own, so that originality may be added to his other qualifications. His make-up of the character is extremely skilful, and throughout the entire performance he never forgets that he is personating an old man. If we miss the oily humour of Lablache, which seemed to ooze out at every pore, or the consummate tact of Tamburini, which threw an intense reality about every thing he did, we must remember that Signor Ciampi is at an age when it is impossible, even by the aid of the highest genius, that art could reach maturity. Signor Ciampi is twenty-one years old, at which age, we have no doubt, both Lablache and Tamburini were serving their apprenticeship to singing and acting. Nevertheless, estimating the new buffo's performance irrespective of all such considerations, we must allow it to have very great merit. The audience, indeed, seemed strongly of our opinion, since they applauded Signor Ciampi to the echo in every scene. With so powerful and splendid an organ we shall look by-and-bye for finer vocal results. Signor Ciampi, in singing, should adhere more to the notes, and speak less. The frequent use of the parlante, however agreeable to Italian ears, is not liked by English audiences, more especially in good music. With this exception we can praise the new Geronimo's singing unreservedly. He possesses the true instinct for time and rhythm, and in that respect invariably satisfies the most scrupulous ear, and is always just in his intonation.

The Count Robinson of Signor Everardi is entitled to unqualified commendation. It is, indeed, the nearest approach in singing and acting to the masterly performance of Tamburini, which, in the olden time, was wont to divide the applause with Lablache's Geronimo. Signor Everardi looks the part, too, to perfection, and dresses it admirably, so that the illusion is complete.

Mad. Alboni's Fidalma was perhaps the best-acted part in the piece. There is certainly not much to do in the character, but what there was to do, or, more properly, what was suggested, was carried out with incomparable comic appreciation. The great artist, indeed, may be said to have created Fidalma. How Mad. Alboni sings the purely legitimate music of Cimarosa can best be conceived by remembering what she achieves in the Barbière and Cenerentola.

Signor Giuglini sings the sweet tender music of Paolino most admirably. The charming air "Pria che spunti in ciel"—one of Rubini's (and Sims Reeves's) most perfect achievements—was given on Saturday with so much grace and sensibility, and finished so exquisitely, as to elicit a warm encore. Signor Giuglini, however, merely reappeared and bowed. In the whole of the last scene, which takes place in the dark, and in which the voices are subdued to a pianissimo, his singing was inimitable, and made us think—we know not why—how wonderfully he would sing the music of Conte Ory in Rossini's opera—still more delicious music than that of Cimarosa.

The parts of Carolina and Elisetta, by Mlles. Lotti and Vaneri, should, we think, have been interchanged. Mlle. Lotti throws too much of the vixen, we fancy, into the character of Paolino's wife, who ought to be represented as the gentler of the two sisters; while Mlle. Vaneri hardly indicates sufficient boldness and vigour for Elisetta, the would-be countess, who browbeats her younger sister. Perhaps this effect is partly produced by the greater resonance of Mlle. Lotti's voice.

The band, conducted by Mr. Benedict, was admirable throughout; and the opera, in spite of its want of choruses, scenic effects, or any special interest in the plot, was a genuine success.

One thing is entitled to particular notice—the propriety of the dresses, for which Mr. E. T. Smith's costumier should be publicly thanked. The old custom was, to dress all the characters, except Geronimo, after the modern fashion—an anachronism as well as absurdity—and to allow the old merchant to attire himself according to the period of Queen Anne, or the first George. Happily, now all is rectified at Her Majesty's Theatre; and the characters without exception appear costumed after the manner of the last century.

The Matrimonio Segreto has not been repeated, nor even re-announced; why, we cannot say. All we know is, that it is worth repetition.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The Huguenots was repeated on Saturday, when Her Majesty and the Prince Consort were present.

On Tuesday Martha was given for the second time, and obtained a second triumph for Mario and Mad. Penco.

The performance of Gluck's Orfeo é Eurydice, on Wednesday evening, which had furnished a topic of conversation to musicians for weeks previously, did not attract a large attendance of the general public. Nevertheless, almost every connoisseur in London was present, and excitement and curiosity were carried to an unusually high pitch. It had been announced that Orfeo é Eurydice would be "illustrated by costume, scenery, and decoration," whence, naturally, it was inferred that Gluck's great lyric work would not be presented in a dramatic form, but as a pictorial concert entertainment. It turned out, however, that the announcement was supererogatory, since Orfeo was given as an opera proper, with all the accessories of stage effect and action. The advertisements, therefore, intimated more than was required. The director was determined that the old German master should not suffer for want of attention. The cast of the principal personages was perhaps as strong as it could be made in the present time. Mad. Csillag sustained the part of Orpheus, Mad. Penco that of Eurydice, Mad. Miolan-Carvalho that of the Happy Shade (L'Ombra Felice) and Mad. Nantier-Didiée L'Amore. Nearly the entire weight of the performance falls upon Orfeo, who is rarely absent from the scene. Mad. Csillag, however, to her other estimable qualities, adds that of great sustaining power, which enables her to go through the longest and most exciting opera unfatigued. In such a part as Orfeo this is absolutely requisite, and without it the best powers, natural and acquired, would be of little avail. Mad. Csillag, as she had already demonstrated in Fidelio, possesses amazing energy, and has the finest tragic instincts. Her intensity and passion in Beethoven's heroine could hardly be surpassed, and these qualifications were again exhibited in Gluck's opera. Her greatest effects were produced in the grand bravura, "La speme in sen ritorna," and in the scene with Eurydice, in which, after his wife is a second time snatched from him by death, just as he had recovered her from Hades — a scene of wondrous beauty, somewhat spun out, notwithstanding — Orpheus sings the well-known air, "Che farò senza Eurydice." On both occasions Mad. Csillag proved herself no less a consummate vocalist than tragadienne, and was overwhelmed with applause. We might cite many other points in her performance, but the above suffices to indicate in what estimation we hold Mad. Csillag, and what were the feelings entertained by the public of her very rare merits.

The other characters, comparatively subordinate, were most ably supported. Mad. Penco's Eurydice was thoroughly artistic. Even her death was remarkable for the natural manner in which it was accomplished. Her vocal displays were restricted to the long (somewhat too long) duet with Orpheus, when Eurydice issues with him from the infernal regions, of which she made the most. Mad. Carvalho gave the single air of The Happy Shade, "Questo prato sempre ameno"—a pastoral of infinite beauty — with great charm of voice; and Mad. Nantier-Didiée, by her singing, dress, and manner, gave due effect to the impersonation of the God Cupid, who, in the end, is the means of rendering the lovers happy, whereby the author of the libretto is at odds with Heathen Mythology.

The scenery, more especially the view of Elysium, is very beautiful. The ballet of the Happy Shades was received with unbounded applause. Of a very different character is that of the Furies in the opening of the second act; which, if not so attractive, is far more vigorous and picturesque. We may take another opportunity of speaking of the music. At present we must content ourselves with recording the entire success of the revival of an undoubted master-piece; and trust that the performances of Iphigenia in Tauris, at St. James's Hall, and Orfeo é Eurydice at the Royal Italian Opera, may be productive of genuine results. The success of Orfeo, as we have said, was decided. The chorus, band, and conductor, all contributed largely to the triumph. The opera is to be repeated this evening.

On Thursday, the first performance of Norma this season, and the last appearance but one of Mad. Grisi in the part she has made so peculiarly her own, with the additional attraction of the second act of Fra Diavolo, drew together one of the most crowded and fashionable audiences ever assembled in this theatre. Every part of the house was filled to overflowing, and scores of "La Diva's" admirers were disappointed in not being able to procure even standing room. The Queen and suite occupied the royal box, and the whole performances elicited a series of "ovations," for, evidently affected by the brilliancy of the audience and their enthusiastic reception of her, Mad. Grisi exerted herself with even more than her wonted fire, and "barring" the natural vocal deficiencies, the entire personation of the erring Druidess was one of the most effective we ever witnessed, even in the palmiest days of the great queen of Italian song. Mad. Corbari, as Adalgisa, her old and best part, was nothing inferior to the most graceful Adalgisa of her earlier days, while Signors Neri-Baraldi and Tagliafico, in place of Signor Gardoni and M. Zelger, were admirable as Pollio and Oroveso. In fact Pollio is decidedly Signor Neri-Baraldi's best performance, and Signor Tagliafico only wants weight to make a most impressive high priest of the Druids. As usual, the chorus, scenery, dresses, and appointments were perfect, and the brass band better in tune than usual. The applause during the performance was most enthusiastic and spontaneous, and both at the termination of the first act and of the opera, Grisi was recalled and applauded with that peculiarly hearty warmth which she seems to obtain more spontaneously than any other artiste before the public.

The second act of Auber's sparkling chef d'œuvre, with the brilliant vocalism of Mad. Miolan-Carvalho, the humours of Signor Ronconi, M. Zelger, and Signor Tagliafico, and the graceful singing of the serenade, "Young Agnes," by Signor Gardoni, brought the evening's entertainment to a most satisfactory conclusion.

The Prophète, long expected, is at last promised, and Signor Tamberlik is announced to make his first appearance this year as Jean of Leyden.

We are, heaven be thanked, as well and lively as fishes in water; for during the last week it has rained frightfully. To day is the anniversary of our marriage. It is now, if I mistake not, five-and-twenty years ago since we had the happy idea of getting married, to say nothing of the years we thought about it beforehand; good things require time.

The "primo uomo" M. Rauzzini has arrived. The work goes on increasing. We shall have also our little comedies to go through, as is justly expected when theatrical affairs are in question; but such things are more trifles. The figs which Wolfgang carried away with him from Salzburg were as miraculous as the loaves and fishes in the Gospel; they have lasted until now.

Yes! yes! we have a mighty deal to do; when we are not working there are still all sorts of arrangements to see to.

P.S. from Wolfgang.—I thank you, dear sister, you know for what. I cannot write to M. de Heffner. If you see him make him read these lines; I beg him to remain content therewith for the present.

I bear no grudge against that rare friend for not having answered me. As soon as he has more time, he will find a time, no doubt, although I doubt, to answer me punctually.

The Same to the Same.

Milan, Dec. 5, 1772.

My bad pen does not prevent our being in good health. Yesterday only did the De Amicis arrive. The poor tenor, Cardoni, has fallen so sick that he cannot come. They have sent for some one to take his place to Turin and to Bologna. He must be not only a good singer, but a good actor, with an imposing appearance, to represent with honour the character of Sylla. These are the two principal causes which have retarded the composition of the opera. Now it will proceed at a sound pace.

P.S. from Wolfgang.—Fourteen pieces more to do, and I shall have finished. It is true that the duo and the trio may count for four pieces. Can't possibly write you at any length, for I know nothing—first reason; second reason, I don't know what I am writing, my head is so full of the opera; I am in danger of sending you an air instead of words. I have learned a new game here which is called Mercante in fiera. We will play it as soon as I come back. I have also learned of a lady a new tongue which is easy to speak, difficult to write, but useful nevertheless. But it is a little—childish, although excellent for Salzburg. My compliments to our pretty Nandl and to our canary, for those two creatures and yourself form the most innocent part of the household. Your chapel master Fischietti will, no doubt, soon begin working at his opera buffa—that is to say in Germany, at his foolish opera.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—This Evening (Saturday, June 30), will be performed, with new and elegant scenery, dresses, machinery, and appointments, which will present features of special interest, Weber's grand romantic Opera of OBERON, with the following powerful cast:—Reiza, Mlle. TITIENS; Fatima, Mad. ALBONI; Puck, Mad. LEMAIRE; Mermaid, Mlle. VANERI; Sir Hugo, Signor MONGINI; Oberon, Signor BELART; Scherasmin, Signor EVERARDI; Babikin, Signor GASSIER. The whole produced under the superintendence of J. R. PLANCHÉ, Esq., author of the libretto (to whom several changes and modifications have been made), and Mr. R. ROXBY. The Recitatives by Mr. BENNETT, pupil of the eminent composer of this great work, who will direct the Orchestra. Pit Tickets, 8s. 6d.; Gallery Stalls, 5s.; Gallery, 3s.; to be obtained at the Box-office of the Theatre (under the Portico), which is open daily from 10 to 6, and on the evenings of performance until the end of the Opera.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—Grand Volunteer Night.—Under the immediate Patronage of Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen and His Royal Highness the Prince Consort.—Grand REPRESENTATION in BEHALF of the FUNDS of the NATIONAL RIFLE ASSOCIATION.—The Council of the National Rifle Association have the honour to announce that Mr. E. T. SMITH having most liberally placed the above Theatre, together with the whole of the Artistes engaged, gratuitously at the service of the Council of the National Rifle Association, a GRAND PERFORMANCE will take place on Monday next, July 2, under the immediate patronage of Her Majesty the Queen and his Royal Highness the Prince Consort, when will be performed the First Act of NORMA: Pollione, Signor MONGINI; Flavio, Signor SOLDI; Oroveso, Signor VIALETTI; Adalgisa, Mlle. VANERI; and Norma, Mlle. TITIENS. Conductor, Mr. BENEDICT. After which a Grand Pas de Deux by Mlle. CLAUDINA CUCCHI and M. DUPARD (being their last appearance this season). To be followed by the Third Act of OTELLO. Otello, Signor MONGINI; Iago, Signor EVERARDI; and Desdemona, Mad. BORGHI-MAMO. After which the Third Act of LES HUGUENOTS. Raoul, Signor GIUGLINI; Il Conte St. Bris, Signor GASSIER; Il Conte di Nevers, Signor EVERARDI; and Valentina, Mlle. TITIENS. Conductor, Signor ARDITI. To conclude with Rossini's Opera of LE BARBIERE DI SIVIGLIA. Conte Almaviva, Signor BELART; Dr. Bartolo, Signor CIAMPI; Figaro, Signor GASSIER; Don Basilio, Signor VIALETTI; Berta, Mlle. DELL'ANESE; and Rosina, Mad. ALBONI, who will sing in the lesson scene Rode's Air, with Variations. Conductor, Signor ARDITI. Pit Tickets, 8s. 6d.; Gallery Stalls, 5s.; Gallery, 3s.; to be obtained at the Office of the National Rifle Association, 11 Pall Mall East; Mitchell's Royal Library, Old Bond Street; Sams's, Regent Street; Hammond's, Cramer and Beale's, Regent Street; and at the Box-office of the Theatre, which is open daily from 10 to 6.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.—LE PROPHETE.—Signor TAMBERLIK.—Meyerbeer's Grand Opera LE PROPHETE is in rehearsal, and will be produced in the course of a few days. Fides, Mlle. CHILLAG; Jean of Leyden, Signor TAMBERLIK (his first appearance this season). Floral Hall, Covent Garden.—An Exhibition of Roses, Fuchsias, Cactus, and Stove and Greenhouse Plants, will take place on Wednesday, July 18.—A List of Prizes, together with full particulars, will be published in the course of a few days.

The Musical World.

LONDON: SATURDAY, JUNE 30, 1860.

IT does not fall to the lot of everybody to traverse the desert, still less to go to Corinth. Even the learned seldom visit that classic city; but, as Horace says, "those who do, return poets." Now, however, all Paris will be able at least to see Babylon in a week or two. Rossini's Semiramide (the book adapted to the French stage by M. Méry) is to be revived at the Opera.

The scenery will be a succession of chefs-d'œuvre, artistic and scientific. The scenic artists, under the direction of M. Flandin, who has visited all the countries of Ancient Assyria, Babylon, and Nineveh, and of Shaperer, who brought home most of the Assyrian collection in the Louvre, have reconstructed ancient Babylon. It is as though the Champollions, the De Sauleys, the Longpériers, who decipher with fluency the cuneiform characters and other hieroglyphics, had succeeded in restoring Babylon by the help of a handfull of stones, just as, through a sequence of analogies, suggested by the configuration of a dry bone, or a fissure in a rock, Cuvier used to reconstruct antediluvian monsters. It would almost seem that the most renowned artists had braved the fatigues and dangers of travelling through distant and unexplored countries, that the most fertile, industrious, and clear-sighted critics had unravelled the history and the arts of Asia, by the aid of Bactrian medals, &c., only to enable the management of the French Opera to offer the Parisian public a spectacle perfectly unique, the first, and probably the last, of its kind.

Everything, we are told, has been consulted, searched, read, analysed. Copies have been made of landscapes, views, monuments, and ruins brought over, first by M. Flandin, and then by Lottin: the superb ruins, the grand and free aspect of nature, which shines forth in solitude, and constitutes a series of magnificent spectacles, with no other witnesses than Heaven and the savage beasts.

The first act is to represent Babylon as that famous city was in the year 1916 B.C. The colossal canvasses of our English Martin are nothing in comparison. Piranesi, in his architectural dreams, alone has anticipated the unparalleled scene. Another scene, no less ambitious, is to revive the hanging gardens of Babylon.

That of the third act will present a crypt of immense depth, in which the painter, it is said, has realised the most vivid idea of unfathomable darkness. Here the sepulchres of the Assyrian Kings are erected. The Tomb of Ninus is also, if report speaks truth, a master-piece of pictorial art and mechanical contrivance. Those who have seen, at the Italian Opera, the ghost of Ninus, dressed in a sheet, issue from an ordinary gateway, just like an ordinary mortal, have naturally smiled at the absurdity. At the French Opera this apparition will be sombre and awful; the ghost of Ninus, illuminated by a strange light, will appear at the summit of a Babylonian flight of steps, and vanish into space, with a boldness worthy of the architects who conceived the notion of constructing Babel.

The costumes are to be unexampled for accuracy and richness. With respect to accuracy, the artists possess authentic models at the Museum, in the statues of Assyrian kings and priests, with faces buried in heavy tresses, beards delicately plaited, falling in squares upon their breasts, enveloped in rich mantles, with hierarchal designs arranged in the shape of fans, with tiaras, radiated crowns and arms,—conveying, in a word, the most precious information concerning the dress, insignia, and weapons of the ancient Asiatics. Thus will old Babylon be resuscitated.

Great embarrassment was felt about the dance-music in Semiramide. The manager was naturally desirous not to interpolate any other music in the immortal master's work. At length, however, thanks to M. Bordeze, they succeeded in finding a cantata with dance-music, composed by Rossini himself for Mlle. Colbrand, his first wife, in 1818, on the occasion of a fête given at Naples, in honour of the restoration of the Bourbons, whose dynasty would appear at this very moment in such imminent peril.

Sig. Carafa (composer of Le Valet de Chambre, Mazaniello, and other operas, and an intimate friend of Rossini's) has added recitatives. It was impossible to procure a complete score of Semiramide. When Rossini wrote it, it was not the custom in Italy to engrave music, and the copyist of the theatre furnished scores to such theatres as required them. These, generally the handiwork of non-musicians, were exceedingly incorrect, and, moreover, almost invariably incomplete. Most of the theatres, possessing scanty orchestras, from motives of economy, gave orders for so many parts as they had instruments to play from. The quartet of string was more attentively copied than the wind, but all the rest was more or less defective. According to Rossini, even at the Théâtre-Italien they never possessed the score as he composed it. To obtain it for the Opera, it was necessary to engage in researches as long as they were beset with difficulty, and to consult the libraries of several theatres in Italy. At last, however, the management succeeded in obtaining a tolerably complete version of the master's work.

On the first representation of Semiramide, Galli, who played Assur, overcome by the emotion he experienced, sang persistently sharp. He was quite aware of his fault, but had not sufficient self-possession to correct it. Consequently, at the fall of the curtain, he endeavoured to evade the composer, who he knew to be on the stage. Rossini, however, catching sight of Galli, ran up to him with open arms, and exclaimed:—"Vieni, porco, let me embrace you! You have sung admirably out of tune all the evening."

About the well-known overture, a Belgian critic relates the following:—

> The first allegro of the overture is a master-piece of vigor, gaiety, and freshness. Rossini has selected the motive of this allegro for—what do you think, reader?—for the funeral march to be played at his own burial. This is highly philosophical. The master sees himself in his coffin, and yet remembers his brilliant youth; he takes one of the most sparkling inspirations of that happy period, veils it in the sombre crape of mourning, and turns it into a funeral dirge, as if he wished to charge youth itself with the task of bewailing his death. The funeral march thus manufactured exhibits a power, grandeur, and desolation of which nothing can convey an idea. It seems as though we heard the weeping and wailing of an immense city—of a modern Babylon; as though the souls of the illustrious composer's operas had come, with tears and groans, to lead him to his last home.

Credat Judæus! that is if Judæus pleases. For our own parts we don't believe the Belgian critic. But to return to Semiramide. The production of this master-piece at the Paris Opera will be an event in the artistic world. The management have bestowed the greatest care on all the details of mise-en-scène, costumes, orchestra, and general execution. Such perfection as a whole will, it is said, have rarely been witnessed. The difficulty seems to us to rest with the singers. If the sisters Marchisio have not been over-praised, they are first-class artists. At rehearsals they have won general and unreserved approval. The sequel remains to be seen.

SOME proofs have been forwarded to us of a forthcoming work, entitled "The Russians at Home; Sketches of Literature and Society in Moscow and St. Petersburgh." For what purpose they were sent to us we cannot say; probably for no purpose at all, but by mistake, and in lieu of certain Musical World proofs which have not reached us this week. But these misdirected sheets are welcome, inasmuch as they contain what an esteemed writer in the Sunday Times would call "informatory" remarks on modern Russian music, a subject which, between the Russian concert of last week and the Russian concert of the week to come, must certainly be considered à l'ordre du jour. We do not apologize for printing in the Musical World what the author of the "Russians at Home—Sketches, &c." doubtless intended should first meet the public eye in the pages of his book (of which, by the way, he can send us a copy when it is ready, accompanied by an advertisement); and we are of opinion that we have already sufficiently repaid him for the little we intend to borrow from his chapter on Russian music, by simply mentioning that his "Sketches, &c." contain such a chapter.

"Russia," says our unknown friend, "may be expected to produce some good operas." (So may Nova Zembla, if any one chooses to entertain such an expectation.) "The people," he adds, "are passionately fond of music, and the Government encourages it" (which we also knew). "The Russians," he continues, "appreciate good singing, and have produced some excellent vocalists" (why does he not mention, by way of instance, Ivanoff, late of Her Majesty's Theatre?); "while their national music, for character and true melody, is on the whole superior to that of any other nation in Europe." (Cries of "Oh!" from the author of "Popular English Music of the Olden Time.")

The writer (whom we will not interrupt again even for the sake of instructing him) goes on to give an account of the number of foreign musicians who at various times have visited Russia, and assures us that the music of the Russian Church has been praised by Paesiello, who lived for some years in St. Petersburgh. Boieldieu, who wrote several operas for the Russian stage (during the reign of Catherine), has also expressed his admiration of the Russian Church music, and especially of Bortniansky's contributions to it. Clementi, the pianist, is another of those eminent musicians who have always been welcomed in Russia. He was accompanied there by his pupil, John Field, who, when he was not playing the piano, was always drinking champagne, and who died of the latter in Moscow.

The modern Russian composers (according to the author of the misdirected proofs) write a great deal more vocal than instrumental music. Their songs are very beautiful, and the best of them have a decided national character. Several Russian airs have been appropriated by German composers, who have had German words written to them; for instance, the "Red Sarafan" (the first of the melodies played so admirably by Wieniawski) and the "Troika," called in German "Die blaue augen." Count Vielgorski's, or Wielhorski's, "Buivala," which, though an original melody, has all the national characteristics, has been made the subject of a fantasia by Vieuxtemps. Every one knows the magnificent national hymn by Lvoff, the Director of the Imperial Choir, who has also written numbers of more familiar strains, and who has even supplied the gipsy companies of Moscow with some of their most popular airs. (Here let us be pardoned for breaking once more the thread of our friend's discourse to tell our readers, that after attending any number of Prince Galitzin's concerts—even if the Prince had his own choir to support him—they would still have a very incomplete notion of the popular music of Russia, as long as they had not heard the Moscow gipsy companies).

Varmaloff, one of the most graceful romance-writers of the day, has also composed or arranged music for the gipsies; and one of their favourite melodies, of which the burden is well-known in England, and which is also introduced in the ballet music of the Spanish dancers (itself full of gipsy characteristics) is signed by Glinka, who, however, can only have harmonised it, for the tune belongs certainly to the gipsies themselves. Various other Russian composers have written for the gipsy troops; and it appears to us that the modern Russian music may be divided into (1) melodies in the style of the old national airs, and (2) melodies founded on, or imitated from, the traditional airs of the gipsies, such as Alabieff's "Nightingale," "He loves me no more," and a dialogue-song, of which the name escapes us, but in which a young man makes all sorts of desperate promises and professions of love to a young girl who laughs at him and rejects him, because, in her character of gipsy, she values nothing so much as her own liberty. Both styles appear quaint to foreign ears; but the former is distinguished by great simplicity and sadness, the latter by wildness and passion, and by a certain oriental character. Naturally in some of the songs of the present day there is a union of the two styles; and, as in all European countries, a certain number of airs are published which are imitated more or less from the Italian. But in spite of the influence of the Italian Opera, and of the numerous Italian composers who have visited the country and written for its stage; in spite too of the number of German musical professors who have settled in St. Petersburgh and Moscow, the Russians have certainly a national school of music, as can be shown, not only from their songs, but from the operas of Glinka and Verstovsky.

Of Glinka we need not speak again at present, but as the name of Verstovsky will be new to the great majority of our readers, we may mention (on the authority of the same informant as before) that he is the director of the Moscow Opera, the composer of a great many songs (several of which are written for the gipsies), and of the music of two serious dramatic works, "Askoldova Mogila" (The Tomb of Askold), and "Gramoboi." Askoldova Mogila is not, and cannot be, esteemed by the Russians in a scientific point of view. The overture is miserably poor; there are no concerted pieces of any importance, nor is there even an attempt in either of the acts at a regularly constructed finale. By a musician, then, Askoldova Mogila would be at once set aside, that is to say, if judged only by the merits of its composer; but at the same time much of the music is interesting to a foreigner, because it is really national instead of being imitated from the Italian. As the composers for the gipsy troops write music in the gipsy style, so Verstovsky, in treating a national subject, has given a national colouring to his melodies, even if he has not in a direct manner laid old Russian airs under contribution, which he sometimes appears to have done. There is a tune in polacca measure for the hero which is quite in the style of those sung by the boatmen on the Volga (it must be remembered that polacca or polonaise is a misnomer, as that particular form of melody, like the mazurka, is in special favor with all the Sclavonian nations), and the prima donna has an "Air with Chorus" which is also strikingly national. A large proportion of the melodies in this opera are in a minor key, as are by far the greater part of the old national airs; and the opera also abounds in airs with choral refrains or responses, which is another characteristic of the Russian popular music, whether sung by the peasants, the gipsies, or the Cossack companies. Askoldova Mogila, then, is essentially a popular work, and we can understand that the habitués of the Italian Opera and of the St. Petersburgh Philharmonic Concerts have no great opinion of it, though we repeat that it is full of interest for a foreigner.

We cannot take leave of Askoldova Mogila without calling attention to a strange account given of it by Baron Haxthausen in his valuable work on Russia. This learned economist has the eccentricity to state that it reminded him of La Sonnambula and Der Freyschütz. We should have thought that if it recalled one of these operas it could not very well have suggested the other, for there are no points of resemblance between the two. Nor can we understand how the music of Verstovsky could remind any one either of Bellini or of Weber. Verstovsky's last opera of Gramoboi would doubtless appear to Baron Haxthausen a veritable Der Freyschütz, for it is founded on a legend (which forms the subject of one of Joukovsky's poems), and involves the sale of a soul to the evil one. The action, as in Askoldova Mogila, takes place at Kieff, and the sins of Ruric the Norman again appear. This piece, which was produced in Moscow in 1857, had no success as an opera, and attracted only as a spectacle.

Some of the very finest Russian music, however (as those of our readers who were present at Prince Galitzin's recent concert will readily believe), is that which is executed by the Russian chorus-singers, of which there are numerous companies, organised under Government direction or by private individuals. All the works of Bortnianski and Lvoff are admirably sung by the Imperial Choir at St. Petersburgh, which numbers one hundred and ten of the finest voices imaginable, the basses and tenors being especially remarkable. The most celebrated choirs at Moscow are those of Philaret the metropolitan, and of Prince Galitzin (not the Prince Galitzin of Tamboff, and of St. James's Hall), who has built one of the most beautiful chapels in the city. At the monastery of the Don, a few versts from Moscow, there is also an admirable choir, but composed only of men (and not of men and boys as elsewhere). In addition to the churches, each regiment has its choir, as well as the principal charitable and educational establishments; indeed, it would be difficult to hear choral music more perfectly executed than at the Foundling Hospital of Moscow.

REFERRING to the present competition between the managers of the two Italian Operas in London, and speaking of the advantages resulting from it to the public, as well as of the zeal manifested by the artists in seconding the efforts of the particular managers with whom they are respectively connected, M. Achille Denis published, in a recent number of the Revue et Gazette des Théâtres, some very sensible observations, with which we entirely agree and which we think it useful to reprint.

"Singers of great talent and of European reputation, stars from our first lyrical theatres, artists who are difficult to manage and very susceptible, condescend to accept in London parts which, we are convinced, nothing in the world would induce them to play in Paris. By what miracle, by what piece of good fortune is it that the English are enabled to applaud Mad. Borghi-Mamo and Mad. Didiée singing, in the Huguenots, the part of the page, Urbain, and MM. Gassier and Faure that of Saint-Bris? The audience of our Opéra will never witness such a thing, which doubtless would surprise, but certainly delight them.

"Such a method of executing master-pieces must enhance the value of the latter, and afford the public a thousand otherwise unknown sources of delight. As far as we are concerned, we are at a loss to understand why the same thing cannot be done in Paris; we do not, above all, understand the reasons which induce a first-class singer to refuse in Paris a second-rate part, which he makes no difficulty of accepting in London. It is a question of money, we shall be told. This appears to us a mistake. Money does not always remove the obstacles raised by amour-propre. We would willingly make a bet that money considerations would not induce Mad. Borghi-Mamo to undertake, in the Huguenots, the part of Urbain, played by Mad. Dussy, nor prevail on M. Faure to supply the place of Coulon, in that of Saint-Bris.

"Competition may, we see, have its advantages, but the fact we have such pleasure in mentioning, must prove most irrefutably an opinion we have always maintained, namely, that there are no small parts in a master-piece; and that an artist does not lower himself by accepting, in a master-piece, a part which is somewhat subordinate to the others. On the day that amour-propre yields to the interests of the great cause of art, we shall have performances similar to those which the upper classes in England have the privilege of witnessing, and which must slightly humiliate Parisian pride. This brings us back to our thesis, which consists in placing the older repertory under the protection of our first-class artists, who, at present, disdain and abandon it, in order to devote themselves exclusively to the creation of original parts; who arrange just as they choose the parts they order for themselves, and who snap the chain of great traditions, which, if they did their duty, they would preserve unbroken."

A good deal of the foregoing homily might just as well apply to the artists of our London theatres, lyric and dramatic. The most difficult task in the world is to persuade a singer or actor of any standing to fill a subordinate part. Fifty years since the case was different.

THE Patrie announced, a few days ago, that preparations are being made for erecting a theatre on one side of the Square of the Arts et Métiers, and that it is proposed to introduce into the building all the improvements required by the public—who pay at the doors for the right of enjoying the performances comfortably—to be perfectly safe, to breathe pure air, to see without effort, and to hear easily and well. Thus, for the first time since edifices of this description have been constructed in Paris, this one, which, according to report, will be called the Théâtre du Prince Impérial, will be built in conformity with all the rules of good sense, and according to the plans best calculated to secure salubrity, ventilation, sonority, a good view of the performances, satisfactory lighting, and room. It is, if we are rightly informed, an English company who will build the theatre, on the plan of two French engineers, approved of by the Emperor. The Presse says:—

"We are assured that the future theatre of the Cirque-Impérial, now in course of construction on the Quai de la Mégisserie and the Place du Châtelet, and which is to be finished in a period of eighteen months, has just been let, by the City of Paris, to M. Hostein, at an annual rent of 210,000 francs. Although his patent as manager has only seven years longer to run, it is said that M. Hostein has consented to take the theatre on the above terms for twenty-one years, and be answerable for the rent during the entire period, whether he is allowed to retain his position as manager or not. As a set-off against his liabilities, he will receive the rents of four shops and suites of apartments, situate at the four angles of the theatre. The neighbouring theatre, intended for a lyrical theatre, has not yet got a tenant. M. Carvalho was inclined to bid for it, when he thought it incumbent on him to send in his resignation as manager."

M. Carvalho has, we think, had enough of theatres.

FESTIVAL OF THE ORPHÈONISTES AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

LONDON had hardly recovered from the excitement caused by the magnificent display of the Volunteer forces before Her Majesty on Saturday when its inhabitants were called upon to welcome 3000 representatives of that nation against which our armed protest had been registered in so emphatic a manner. Never in the world's history had been so plainly expressed the determination of a country to be prepared for any emergency that might arise from the ambition of an armed despot; and yet in every respect as significant of an ardent desire for peace, and a wish to be on good terms with our vivacious neighbours on the other side of the channel, was the enthusiastic reception accorded by some thousands of our countrymen to the French Orphèonistes on Monday last. These great demonstrations, so utterly different in character, are the best possible exponents of the real sentiments of England.

La Société des Orphèonistes was established by Wilhem about fifteen years ago, but the undertaking languished, and season after season passed away without any great result being obtained. A few years back a man holding the post of organist in a small cathedral town became impressed with the notion that the failure arose, not from the system, but from the lack of energy in carrying out the system, and he immediately gave up his appointment to work out his ideas. With a knapsack on his back, and a stick in his hand, did this determined individual travel through the departments of France, instituting a branch society in one town, encouraging a lukewarmness in another, and organising wherever he went. Discouraged by no repulse he continued his exertion, and has been rewarded by an amount of success corresponding to the great sacrifices he made when he first charged himself with the crusade. This man is M. Delaporte, the able Director of the Society.

At present L'Orphèon consists of 800 branch societies, numbering about 40,000 performing members and above 200,000 subscribers and officers.

Early on Monday morning the members of the society began to assemble at Sydenham. Many of them had only just arrived, after having travelled throughout the night, and there appeared to have been a want of order that was not very creditable to those engaged in the direction of this great undertaking. Very curious was it to observe the French tricolor everywhere, and the occupation of the Crystal Palace was a fait accompli. Still more strange was the eagerness with which the visitors examined everything, purchasing more particularly knives, needles, razors, and such articles. Good humour prevailed throughout, an occasional fracas taking place with the waiters about charge, neither party understanding the other.

A few minutes after three the performance commenced with "God save the Queen," in which the greater part of the harmonies were new to English ears. Then came the concert, the programme of which was as follows:—

FIRST PART.

1. God save the Queen . . Arranged by Camille de Vos
2. Overture to "Zampa," by the Band of Les Guides . . . . . Herold
3. Hymn—Veni Creator . . . . . Besozzi
4. Chant du Bivouac . . . . . Kücken
5. Fantasia on "Giralda," by the Band of Les Guides . . . . . Adolphe Adam
6. Depart du Chasseur . . . . . Mendelssohn
7. Scene from Les Huguenots,—the "Septuor du Duel" . . . . . Meyerbeer

SECOND PART.

1. Air with Variations, by the Band of Les Guides . . . . . Mohr
2. Chorus—Les Enfants de Paris . . . A. Adam
3. Chorus—O Isis! . . . . . Mozart
4. Part Song—La Retraite . . . . . Laurent de Rillé
5. Overture to "Oberon," by the Band of Les Guides . . . . . Weber
6. Part Song—Le Jour du Seigneur . . Kreutzer
7. "France! France!" . . . . . A. Thomas

Most agreeably were we surprised with the performance, it being far better than we had imagined it possibly could have been, and it clearly proved that the French have their speciality in unaccompanied music in almost as great a degree as have the German and the English. The pieces which made the greatest sensation were the "Hymn of Besozzi," "Le Chant du Bivouac," "Les Enfants de Paris," "La Retraite," "Le Jour du Seigneur," and "France, France." The first four were encored, but all were sung in most admirable style and with an amount of "go" which was very enlivening. "La Retraite" is the best specimen of unaccompanied singing with a large number of voices we have ever heard, the crescendo and the diminuendo being perfect.

The "Septuor" from Les Huguenots, about the execution of which so much has been said and written, did not go so well as had been anticipated.

The splendid and artistic band of the Guides gave some of their choicest pieces, and agreeably diversified the performance. Almost all the performers in this justly celebrated band are distinguished artistes, and an amount of refinement is consequently obtained that sets rivalry at defiance.

The programme having been duly gone through, a scene took place that almost baffles description. The whole audience rose en masse, cheering the performers. The latter returned the compliment with right good-will, and a succession of demonstrations followed, gaining rather than losing in strength, when the well-known strains of "God save the Queen" were pealed forth from the organ. This caused a cessation of the greeting, but the moment the National Anthem was concluded, "Partant pour la Syrie" was vociferously demanded, and the Guides gave it amidst the loudest applause from the whole audience.

Thus ended this eventful day. Success more unequivocal was never obtained, and we doubt not that from day to day the performances will become better and better as the performers become used to the accoustical proportions of the building.

The French vocalists met at the specified hour on Tuesday morning, and the performance was a decided improvement on that of the preceding day. Several of the pieces which produced a decided effect on Monday were repeated, and received by the audience with even greater favour than before. The director very judiciously withdrew from the programme "La Septuor," from Les Huguenots, and Mozart's priest chorus, "O Isis," and in place thereof substituted "Les Enfants de Paris," and "La Retraite." These were much better adapted for displaying the characteristics of the Orphéonistes than were the above-named operatic pieces, and the audience appeared to be of our opinion, judging from the tumultuous encore which was accorded to each.

The "Guides" again played some of their best selections, and fully sustained their great renown.

The Palace was not so full as might have been expected, the number of visitors being between 11,000 and 12,000.

Thursday plainly showed that the excitement to hear the Frenchmen was on the increase, as nearly the whole of the centre transept was filled with stalls which were occupied by crowds of fashionables. It is not necessary for us to give the programme in detail, as it is as nearly as possible a repetition of the performances of the previous days; but the great body of vocalists evinced greater steadiness, and consequently earned fresh laurels. The whole selection went off with the utmost éclat, and at the termination a scene similar to that which took place on Monday was enacted—the audience and the performers alternately saluting each other with ringing and hearty cheers.

"God save the Queen" and "Partant pour la Syrie," were played, sung, and shouted, and thus ended one of the great events of the season. The Orphéonistes have proved that France has a choral school of her own; for undoubtedly a greater success attended the French part-songs than did the performance of other pieces. This large body, though never having previously met, displayed a regard for discipline that was most creditable to them and to their indefatigable conductor.

There is to be a farewell performance given to-day (Saturday); and we hear of a dinner to be given, at which Sir Joseph Paxton has promised to preside.

RAPHAEL'S "APOLLO AND MARSYAS."—The writer of the subjoined letter, brother-in-law of Bendemann, the well-known historical painter, is professor of painting at the Royal Academy of Dresden. He passed many years in Italy, devoting much time to the study of the great masters, and he is known as a critic on art. He countersigned Director Schnorr's attestation of the authenticity of the "Apollo and Marsyas" in the Dresden Journal of the 30th of last December.—"I most gladly accept the pamphlet on your superb painting by Raphael, which you have had the kindness to send me, and I thank you very much for it. I will preserve it as a memorial of this work, so worthy of its great author, and which, I am convinced, cannot fail to be very soon classed among the number of those which are recognised and attested by all. Accept, sir, the expression of the high consideration with which I subscribe myself, Julius Hübner, Dresden, 1860. To Mr. Morris Moore."

THE ORPHEONISTES.—The increasing enthusiasm of the public has induced the directors of the Crystal Palace to give a farewell performance of the Orphéonistes and the Guides this afternoon at three o'clock; the programme to comprise all the pieces which have been most favourably received during the three concerts. To make the performance really popular, the usual Saturday admission of two shillings and sixpence only will be charged. Many of the rifle corps are expected to be present; also many of the competitors entered for the prize shooting at Wimbledon on Monday; among them, 150 Swiss riflemen in their picturesque dresses, who will arrive this day. Military bands in the grounds, and the display of the great fountains, will constitute an agreeable addition to the vocal performances. The general impression prevailed that the Queen would have been present at one of the concerts; but the secretary received a note, in reply to an application, from Sir Charles Phipps, stating that the engagements of Her Majesty and of His Royal Highness would render it impossible for them to be present at the performances.

Concerts.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—The admirers of Mozart mustered in great force at St. James's Hall on Monday last, when the entire programme was devoted to that great master, and ample was the gratification afforded by the very choice selection, both vocal and instrumental. To begin with the latter, we had the lovely and always acceptable quintet in A major, in which Mr. Lazarus sustained the clarinet part in such a manner as fully to confirm his position as the highest living professor of his instrument. The violins, tenor, and violoncello, in the hands of Herren Becker and Ries, Mr. Doyle, and Signor Piatti, respectively one and all merit the highest praise; indeed, we may safely say that finer playing was never listened to. No less admirably rendered was the sonata in F (with variations) for pianoforte and violin, in which Miss Arabella Goddard and Herr Becker showed themselves inspired with the genius of Mozart, and were applauded to the echo, the lady being also recalled after her absolutely perfect execution of the sonata in B flat major, given for the first time at these concerts. The final quartet in G, No. 1, held the majority of the audience in their places till the last, more than repaying them for their attention. Mad. de Paez made her first appearance at the Monday Popular Concerts with decided success, the applause after "Parto," the air from Titus (with clarionet obbligato superbly played by Mr. Lazarus), and "Voi che sapete" (Figaro), being both hearty and deserved. This lady has a very rich quality of voice, and we hope to hear her again shortly. Herr Hermanns displayed an organ of immense capability, singing two airs from Il Seraglio, in the latter of which he was encored. Mr. Sims Reeves, despite the slight hoarseness still remaining from his severe cold, sang as usual in a way that charmed his hearers beyond measure, and so exquisite was his delivery of that tender gem of melody, "Dalla sua pace," that nothing less than its repetition would satisfy the enthusiastic and delighted audience. The scheme for the Directors' benefit is before us, and comprises an excellent selection from the works of Beethoven, Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Spohr, Schubert, Scarlatti, and Rossini. (By the way, where is the French right that was promised?—the visit of the Orphèonistes would have afforded an excellent opportunity). The executants next Monday (the last concert let it be borne in mind) will be Miss Arabella Goddard, Mr. Charles Hallé, Messrs. Sims Reeves, Sainton, Santley, Goffrie, Doyle, Piatti, &c.

MR. HOWARD GLOVER'S CONCERT.—What may be styled a resumé of the present musical metropolitan season, took place (if we may use such a phrase) at St. James's Hall, on the afternoon of Thursday, when, in spite of the counter attraction of the "last Orphèoniste day" at the Crystal Palace, one of the most numerous and fashionable audiences ever gathered together in St. James's Hall "assisted" at the monster concert of Mr. Howard Glover. All the principal concert artistes of the season, including several of the latest arrivals (unknown to the British public) were pressed into the programme, which contained a veritable musical embarras de richesses. The first part of the concert was devoted to a very interesting selection of Mr. Howard Glover's works, including a novelty, in the shape of a musical setting to Southey's "Old Woman of Berkeley," most admirably sung by Miss Palmer, who rendered ample justice to the ingenious fancies of the composer, whose distinguished musical ability is perhaps even still more advantageously displayed in his cantata Tam O'Shanter, which was, on the present occasion, sung for the first time in London, by Mr. Sims Reeves, for whom it was originally composed. Mr. Reeves' name is always a tower of strength to any composition, and on the present occasion he fairly surpassed himself, for not only did he sing the music with all his wonted power and sweetness, but he displayed a fund of genuine humour, for which even his warmest admirers would not have given him credit. He pronounced the Lowland Scotch dialect admirably, and in fact, so artistic in every respect was his performance of this remarkably clever and, in some cases, very difficult work, that it passed off with the utmost éclat, and with Mr. Reeves for its interpreter (independent of its own intrinsic merits), Tam O'Shanter is now a sure success, even without a pianoforte to represent the orchestra, at any concert. As to the other portion of the programme, it is impossible to mention them even in detail; suffice it to say that Mesdames Parepa, C. Hayes, Artôt, Lemmens-Sherrington, Rieder, Sainton-Dolby, Palmer, Stabbach, Rudersdorff, Goldberg-Strozzi, and Kapp Young, and Messrs. Belletti, Perren, and Thomas, sang a variety of well-known songs, and several new ones by Hatton and E. Aguilar, in French, English, and Italian, the majority of them being well received, though the audience wisely declined to encore anything; and it would be almost invidious to single any out for special eulogy. M. Sainton and Miss Arabella Goddard evoked marks of the heartiest approval by their irreproachable performance of the slow movement and finale, from Beethoven's famous Kreutzer sonata, as did also Herr Leopold de Meyer, in a fantasia of his own composition, and Herr Ritter, in some graphic and interesting solo pieces composed for the occasion by Mr. Howard Glover. Herr Molique also played some of his melodies for the violin with his truly classical purity of tone and expression, and, in addition to the talented bénéficiaire, there was a perfect brigade of musical generals to direct this vast armée d'artistes, gathered together for the delectation of his friends.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The great attendance a month ago at the performance of Elijah, induced the announcement of a repetition, which took place on Friday the 22nd inst., and demands a word or two on account of some new features. The severe illness of Miss Parepa prevented her appearance; and Mad. Rudersdorff sang the principal soprano in a manner that leaves room for little but approbation. She has the requisite dramatic capability; and this can be said of but few of her contemporaries. Her "Hear ye, Israel," was an unimpeachable performance. Mr. Santley's singing of the Prophet decidedly gains upon us. It was always sung well; never with sufficient histrionic effect. It is in the latter qualification that the improvement is visible. Mr. Patey should remember that when he joins in quartett with such artists as Mads. Rudersdorff and Sainton-Dolby, and Mr. Sims Reeves, it is unpardonable to attempt to gain notice by singing too loudly. Among the numerous audience were numbers of the chiefs of the Orphèonistes, who were much delighted with the performance; and, with the characteristic impressionability of their race, were raised to rapturous wonder at Mr. Sims Reeves' marvellous singing of "Then shall the righteous," and were greatly moved at Mad. Sainton's "O rest in the Lord," which is the climax of pathetic expression.

EXETER HALL.—A performance of prize-glees, madrigals, and part-songs, by Mr. W. G. Martin, was given on Thursday the 21st, under the direction of the composer, the gentleman who so honourably officiated in the conductor's desk at the two recent juvenile choral exhibitions at the Crystal Palace. The chorus, we believe, was formed of Mr. Martin's classes, and numbered about one thousand voices. To vary the part-music, Mr. Sims Reeves sang "Adelaida," and a new song by Mr. Balfe, "I love you;" and Miss Arabella Goddard played two popular morceaux —Ascher's fantasia on airs from Dinorah, and Thalberg's "Last Rose of Summer." Mr. Sims Reeves created a perfect furore in Mr. Balfe's new song, which was encored with thunders of applause. We have not for a long while heard a more charming song than "I love you," and never heard more exquisite singing than that of Mr. Reeves. How the great tenor sings "Adelaida," and how Miss Arabella Goddard accompanies him on the pianoforte, we need not say. The fair pianist created the accustomed sensation in both her pieces; the Irish fantasia exciting the audience to absolute enthusiasm, which compelled Miss Goddard to return to the platform and bow, although she declined (as usual) to repeat the performance. The execution of the glees, madrigals, and part-songs was for the most part excellent; of some, indeed, deserving of the highest praise. We may mention the part-song "The Evening Star," ditto "Our Saxon Fathers," both encored; prize-glee, "Meek Twilight," for eight male voices, and part-song, "The Hemlock Tree." These were all admirably sung, and elicited loud applause. In the prize-glee, "The Merry Month of June," for soli and chorus, the voices were occasionally unsteady and not always in tune. The exceptions were, however, rare, and the general performance must be pronounced excellent. The attendance was immense.

THE LONDON GLEE AND MADRIGAL UNION.—The 109th and last of the series of these popular entertainments was given last week, in the Royal Gallery of Illustration, before a crowded and enthusiastic audience. The programme included many of the favourite and most successful pieces introduced this season. The encores were numerous. Mr. T. Oliphant (Literary Illustrator), delivered an appropriate farewell address which was received with acclamations. The following were among the observations made by that talented gentleman:—"Unaided by fashion, unheralded by any flourish of trumpets, with the very elements against us for no inconsiderable portion of the time, we have, through your kind and continued support, been enabled to carry out a series of entertainments for a duration almost unprecedented as regards music of the purely English school. We have wished to gain your attention by an appeal to your hearts, trusting to a natural and truthful expression of healthful poetry, combined with corresponding music, and that appeal, we are proud to find, has not been in vain. The programmes have contained upwards of 120 different compositions, and, with respect to their execution, although I may be supposed to be not an unbiassed critic, I can conscientiously say, that, after an experience of forty years in such matters, I have rarely, if ever, heard glees sung in greater perfection. With regard to my portion of the entertainment I will merely add that if in your estimation it has contributed in any way to its success, I am glad to have had it in my power to be of service to my friend Mr. Land, the director, and his talented associates, Miss Eyles, Miss Wells, Mr. Baxter, Mr. Cummings, and Mr. Lawler."—We anticipate with pleasure the revival of these performances in due course.

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S CHOIR.—The sixth and last Concert was given on Tuesday evening, when to the general company was added a number of the leading members of the Orphèonistes, who were invited to the performance by Mr. Henry Leslie. The programme comprised twenty-one pieces, of which no less than six were encored. These were—Mendelssohn's part-song, "Departure;" Goss's glee, "There is beauty on the mountain;" Pearsall's part-song, "O, who will o'er the downs so free;" Mendelssohn's "Forty-third Psalm;" Edwardes's madrigal, "In going to my lowly bed;" and Stevens's part-song, "The cloud-capt towers." The Orphèonistes, when they entered the hall, were received with tremendous cheers. At the end of the concert, the Choir sang for the Orphèonistes "Rule Britannia," and again repeated Mendelssohn's Psalm. The Frenchmen then drank Mr. Leslie's health, when Mr. Leslie returned thanks; and subsequently that of the ladies of the Choir was given, to which Miss Emily Gresham responded in a neat speech in French.

THE ENGLISH GLEE AND MADRIGAL UNION.—Third Concert. On Wednesday last a new list from the répertoire of this accomplished "glee party" (whose talents individually are of too high an order for solo music to be neglected by them) was given at Messrs. Collards' Concert Room in Grosvenor Street, which is fast becoming a popular venue. The selection comprised well-known and always welcome glees and madrigals by Pearsall, Webbe, Horsley, Callcott, &c. The address to the capital of Ancient Mexico in Southey's Madoc, arranged by Callcott, is an elegant piece of concerted vocal music, and was sung to admiration. Two part-songs by Mr. J. L. Hatton, written for this Union, were also given; one of them, "The Sailor the deck is pacing," being vociferously encored. Mrs. Locke is still indisposed, and the lady sex is represented by Miss Banks alone; how capably and worthily the musical world is well aware.

MISS SUSANNA COLE'S CONCERT took place on Thursday evening, at St. James's Hall, and was a very spirited affair, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Santley, Miss Palmer, and the London Glee and Madrigal Union being among the vocalists, and Mr. Charles Hallé and Herr Becker among the instrumentalists. Miss Cole was more than usually ambitious in selecting the grand scena from Der Freischütz, "Before my eyes beheld him," for one of her essays. The result, however, justified the attempt, for the young lady sang with so much power and brilliancy as to create an uproar of applause, which was only appeased by a repetition of the final movement. Miss Cole's other solo was Professor Bennett's "May-dew," a most exquisite song, and so perfectly sung, and so perfectly accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. Charles Hallé, as to elicit a rapturous encore. The lady also took part in the following pieces:—Curschmann's trio "Ti prego," with Miss Palmer and Mr. Sims Reeves; Niedermeyer's quintet, "Pour les attraits," with Miss Angusta Thomson, Mlle. Behrens, Mr. Tennant, and Mr. Santley; the duet "Quis est homo," from Rossini's Stabat Mater, with Miss Palmer; and the prayer from Mosé in Egitto with all the principals. Mr. Sims Reeves sang Mr. Balfe's new song "I love you," and was tumultuously encored; as he was also in Mr. Hatton's song "Sweet love, good night to thee." Mr. Charles Hallé and Herr Becker performed the Duo Concertante of Osborne and De Beriot, on Guillaume Tell, for pianoforte and violin, with brilliant success; Herr Becker, in addition, a fantasia by Paganini with immense effect; and Mr. Hallé played three solos—"Nocturne," by Chopin; Stephen Heller's "Wanderstuden;" and one of Mendelssohn's "Lieder ohne Worte," to the intense enjoyment of the audience.

THE SOCIETY FOR THE ENCOURAGEMENT OF THE FINE ARTS gave its fifth Conversazione on the evening of the 21st inst., at the Architectural Gallery, Conduit Street. In addition to the large and splendid collection of drawings and plans forming the Architectural exhibition, several new and eminent works of art were contributed for the occasion. There was also, as usual, a concert of vocal and instrumental music, sustained by Mad. Gilbert, Miss Fosbroke, Mrs. Paget, Mrs. F. Reilly, Mlle. Elvira Behrens, Mr. F. Reilly, Mr. Cunningham, Mr. Leonard, and M. Verzy, as singers; and Mr. Alfred Gilbert (piano) and Mr. W. H. Eayres (violin), instrumentalists. The capital performances were Mrs. Paget's "Rocked in the cradle of the deep;" Mad. Gilbert's "Deh, vieni non tardar;" Mr. Leonard's "Largo al factotum" and Wallace's "Bell-ringer"—each specially applauded; Mendelssohn's two-part song by Mad. Gilbert and Mlle. Behrens; and Mr. Hatton's song, "Sweet love, good night to thee," by Mr. Cunningham. Osborne and De Beriot's duet for piano and violin, on airs from Guillaume Tell, was admirably played by Mr. Alfred Gilbert and Mr. Eayres.

MISS MESSENT'S ANNUAL CONCERT, on Tuesday evening, at the Hanover Rooms, was a fair specimen of a mid-season benefit entertainment. The lady did not overlook the classical part of her audience, but presented them with Mendelssohn's trio in D minor, for piano, violin, and violoncello, executed by Mr. Charles Hallé, Herr Deichmann, and Herr Lidel, a veritable bon-bouche, more particularly as it was so finely performed. Mr. Charles Hallé added Chopin's "Nocturne" and "Grand Valse," which he played superlatively. Miss Messent contributed three solos, Mercadante's "Ah! rammento a lui d'accanto," new ballad, "Ask not why," composed expressly for her by Herr Francesco Berger, and the Scotch song, "'Twas within a mile of Edinburgh town." Miss Messent sings simple ballads so prettily, that it seems a pity she should not turn her attention more to them and less to Italian bravuras, which, although she masters with sufficient ease, do not exhibit her talents to so much advantage. Her reading and singing of the Scotch song were most charming. Vocal pieces were supplied by Mad. Catherine Hayes, Mlle. Von Kettler, Messrs. Wilbye Cooper, Santley, and Jules Lefort. Messrs. Francesco Berger, George Lake, and W. G. Cusins, were the conductors.

MRS. ALEXANDER NEWTON'S MATINÉE (Collards' Rooms, 28th inst.) provided a host of singers, and some excellent entertainment. The lady herself sang Spohr's "Bird and Maiden," the cavatina, "Qui la voce," from I Puritani, and, with Miss J. Palmer, Mendelssohn's duet, "O wert thou in the cauld blast." Mrs. Newton's brilliant voice and dramatic style were well displayed in Bellini's cavatina, which was received with loud marks of approbation. Among the remaining vocal contributions most worthy of notice were Kucken's song, "I watch each shadow floating," by Miss Palmer; and Balfe's new song, "I love you"—made so popular by Mr. Sims Reeves's singing—given with great effect by Mad. Laura Baxter. The Brousil family executed some pieces, of which Spohr's Concerto Dramatique, No. 8, Mlle. Bertha Brousil, first violin, though curiously altered from the original, was most admired.

Herr Gustave Hölzel, the well-known basso of the Imperial Opera at Vienna, gave his private concert on Tuesday afternoon, at 88 St. James's Street. Some pleasing pieces of his own composition were sung with admirable expression. His comic lied, "Der lustage Postillon" was unanimously encored, as also was Mad. Rudersdorff's ballad of "Mein Liebster ist im Dorf der Schmidt." Mad. Tiefensée, and Messrs. Mayr, Kuhe, Eibenschutz, Oscar de la Cinna, and Steger (of the Imperial Opera, Vienna), were among the performers. The latter sang some characteristic Hungarian melodies with national feeling. Messrs. Kuhe and De la Cinna rivalled one another in their execution on the piano. The concert was highly successful.

Mad. Louisa Kapp Young, "Hof-Sangerinn" to the Court of Austria, gave her first concert in England, under distinguished patronage, on Monday last at Cambridge House, by permission of Viscountess Palmerston. Mad. Kapp Young possesses a rich and powerful voice, and much musical feeling. She was highly successful on the present occasion in Mozart's "Parto," from "La Clemenza di Tito," Mendelssohn's "Auf Flugeln des Gesangs," and Molique's "Gondolier's Song." The fair vocalist was ably assisted by Herr Molique and his accomplished daughter Mlle. Anna Molique, Signor Piatti, and Mr. Santley.

Provincial.

Dublin.—(From a Correspondent.)—The twenty-third annual summer concert of the University Choral Society took place with considerable éclat on the 14th inst. Part I. Purcell's "Tempest Music;" romance (Adrienne Lecouvreur), Vera; duetto (Marta), Flotow; "The Boat Scene" from Lurline;" quartett, "Soldier's Farewell," Kucken; "The Tiger crouches," chorus, Bishop.—Part II. Polka chorus, Dr. Denning; song, "Land of my dearest," Keller; "The Wreath," part-song, Benedict; Beethoven's "Adelaida;" glee and chorus, "Come, fairest Nymph," Lord Mornington; valse (for the band), "Il Bacio," Arditi; quartett, "O Nanny, wilt thou;" trio and chorus, "Give me the Harp," Stevenson. The above, as a light and popular sort of concert, was considerably admired. It contrasted favourably with the former concerts given by the Society, which were during this season devoted to the great classical works of Mendelssohn, Spohr, Beethoven, &c. The University Amateurs are guided by the maxim "Non semper tendit arcum Apollo." Their society is in a very flourishing condition.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—THE GREATEST NATIONAL BRASS-BAND CONTEST ever held.—On Tuesday, 10th, and Wednesday, 11th July.

Arrangements have been made for a Grand Monster Brass-Band Contest on the above days, in which ONE HUNDRED BANDS from all parts of England are engaged to take part, comprising in all Two Thousand Brass Instrument Performers. Valuable Prizes, in money and cups, will be given by the Company; and, in addition, the principal Musical Instrument Makers in London have signified their intention to present several first-class instruments as special prizes. The contest will commence on the Grounds each day at Ten o'clock, and continue till dusk, and on both days the whole of the Bands will meet at Three o'clock precisely in the Handel Orchestra, and perform Mendelssohn's "Wedding March;" Haydn's Chorus, "The Heavens are telling;" Handel's "Hallelujah," "Rule Britannia," and "God save the Queen." A Monster Gong Drum, seven feet in diameter, manufactured expressly for the occasion, by Mr. Distin, will accompany the combined bands.—Admission, Tuesday, 2s. 6d.; Wednesday, 1s.

NOTICE.—Excursion Trains will run from all the principal Towns on the Great Western, Midland, London and North-Western, Great Northern, South-Western, and other Railways.—For full particulars of which see the Company's advertisements and bills.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—BRASS-BAND CONTEST.—

In accordance with Regulation No. 5, the Leaders of the Brass Bands entered for the Great Contest are instructed to attend at EXETER HALL, on Monday next, July 9, at Seven o'clock in the evening, to draw lots for choice of Platforms, which will be Eight in number, situate in various parts of the Crystal Palace Grounds, during the two days' contest.

At this meeting Orchestra Tickets, including admission to the Palace, and Railway Passes, will be issued.

On account of the unprecedented number of Performers (nearly Two Thousand in number) who will be assembled together, and will be sufficient to entirely fill the Great Handel Orchestra, where each desk and performer will be numbered, no bands can be admitted to the Orchestra or Palace unless strictly conforming to the above regulation.

By Order.

The Right Worshipful the Mayor of Manchester, IVIE MACKIE, Esq.
His Worship the Mayor of Salford, W. HARVEY, Esq.
SIR FREDERICK GORE OUSELEY, Bart., Director of Music at the University of Oxford.

And many of the Nobility, Gentry, Clergy, and Distinguished Families of the Empire.

DR. MARK'S

GREAT NATIONAL ENTERPRISE

Organised in 1848, and developed at THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC, BRIDGE STREET, MANCHESTER, established by him expressly as a Great National Institution to facilitate the Encouragement and Promotion of NATIVE MUSICAL TALENT, and the GENERAL ADVANCEMENT OF MUSIC AMONG THE RISING GENERATION, upon his new and effective system, also as a NORMAL SCHOOL, for the training of masters to conduct CONSERVATOIRES OF MUSIC to be established throughout the United Kingdom, for LITTLE CHILDREN, the whole comprising an entirely new scheme of NATIONAL EDUCATION, by blending music with general instruction, so that the study of music shall become a branch of education in the humblest of schools of this country. To illustrate and to rouse an interest in every town and city for these institutions, Dr. Mark travels with a number of his pupils occasionally through the country—giving lectures, and introducing his highly approved and pleasing Musical Entertainment, entitled DR. MARK AND HIS LITTLE MEN, who number upwards of Thirty Instrumentalists, and a most Efficient Chorus, the whole forming a most unique and complete Juvenile Orchestra, composed of LITTLE ENGLISH, IRISH, SCOTCH AND WELCH BOYS, FROM FIVE TO SIXTEEN YEARS OF AGE, who play Operatic Selections, Solos, Marches, Quadrilles, Galops, &c., and sing Songs and Choruses in a most effective manner, and to whom Dr. Mark gives a gratuitous General and Musical Education.

APPOINTMENTS OF MASTERS AND ARRANGEMENTS OF CLASSES IN THE ABOVE INSTITUTION.

Principal of the Royal College of Music; Director, Composer, and Conductor; Lecturer to both Private and Public, Theoretical and Practical Instrumental and Vocal Classes	Dr. MARK.
Master of the General Educational Department; Writing, Reading, Arithmetic, Grammar, Dictation, History, Geography, Practical Geometry, and Book-keeping	Mr. POWELL and Two Assistant Teachers.

PRACTICAL ASSISTANT TEACHERS.

Organ	Mr. BAKER.
Pianoforte	Herr SIEMERS. Mr. ELDER.
Violin	Mons. ROGUIER. Mr. BEARD.
Violoncello, Double Bass, and Viola...	Mons. VIEUXTEMPS. Mr. T. DONOVAN.
Flute, Piccolo, Oboe, and Clarionet	Sig. CORTESI.
Cornet and other Brass Instruments	Mr. H. RUSSELL.
Concertina (German and English)	Mr. ELDER.
Vocal Classes	Messrs. POWELL and ELDER.

Dr. MARK has also made provision for the Orphans of the Musical Profession possessing musical talent, who will find the above institution a happy home, and receive a most effective general and musical education, board, and clothing, free of all expense.

Little Boys, from five to nine years of age, apprenticed for three, five, or seven years by paying a moderate entrance fee to cover the expenses of instrument and books.

Twelve appointments ready for Masters.

For Prospectuses, apply direct to the Royal College of Music, Bridge Street, Manchester.

Dr. MARK is also open to Engagements with his little Men.

Dr. MARK begs to invite the Parents and Friends, and all those interested in his Enterprise and in the Education of the Youths of this country, to visit his establishment. Visiting hours:—From Nine to Eleven, a.m., and Two and Four, p.m. Saturdays and Sundays excepted.

NEW SONGS by J. W. DAVISON, "Rough wind that moanest loud" (sung by Mr. Santley at the Monday Popular Concerts); "Swifter far than Summer's flight," (sung by Miss Palmer at the Monday Popular Concerts); "False friend, wilt thou smile or weep," Beatrice's song in the Cenci (sung by Madame Sainton-Dolby, at the Monday Popular Concerts, St. James's Hall); are published by Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201 Regent Street.

The above Songs form Nos. 1, 2, and 3 of Vocal Illustrations of Shelley.

"Mr. Santley was encored in one of the thoroughly picturesque and poetical settings of Shelley, by Mr. J. W. Davison, mentioned a week or two since. His song, 'Rough wind that moanest loud,' is a thoroughly good song."—Athenæum.

"Madame Sainton-Dolby's greatest efforts were called forth by Mendelssohn's 'Night' song, and Mr. J. W. Davison's 'False friend, wilt thou smile or weep' (from Shelley's 'Cenci'), to both of which she did the amplest justice. The latter work is one of the most poetical and beautiful of the 'Vocal Illustrations of Shelley,' composed by Mr. Davison many years ago, and which, though rarely heard, possess far more sterling merit than nine-tenths of the most admired songs of the day. A more intellectual treatment of the words could not well be imagined. Mr. Davison has completely caught the spirit of the poetry, and heightened its beauty by the potent charms which belong only to the sister art. 'False friend, wilt thou smile or weep,' sung to perfection by Madame Sainton-Dolby, was enthusiastically applauded."

Review.

"Ramsgate Sands," Comic and Characteristic Quadrille on Popular Melodies, by BURCKHARDT. (Boosey and Sons).

IF excellence were to be measured by variety, the set of quadrilles before us would be perhaps the most admirable ever written. Generally speaking, a quadrille not original, but founded on known airs, is confined in each figure to one melody, with "settings" by the composer. Herr Burckhardt, however, has followed a plan of his own, whereby he takes separate "bits" from several popular tunes, and dovetails them together to make a single figure. Here he exhibits considerable ingenuity, not merely in selecting what is acceptable to the ear, but in avoiding what would be incongruous. We need not specify the different melodies employed, all of which are as familiar as household words, and will be welcomed as old friends, though stunted of their normal dimensions. The accompaniments are as simple as a hammer; so that the fair demoiselles, who usually at friendly parties supply the place of the orchestra, will not be deterred from attacking the quadrille even without the ordinary preparation. Moreover, to recommend the composition to another sense besides the ear, a picturesque illustration of "Ramsgate Sands" is furnished on the frontispiece, wherein are depicted in colours, brighter perhaps than reality, figures of all classes of visitors, varying from full-sided merchant and elegantly clad "lady," to Ethiopian serenader and itinerant mountebank; while the sketch is appropriately filled in by donkeys, children, show-booths, bathing-machines, and other paraphernalia of a watering-place in the season. A piece of music so quaintly addressed to the eye as well as the ear recommends itself, and cannot fail to find admirers.

MUSIC AND THEATRES IN PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent).

Wednesday, July 4.

FROM the absence of all important events in the musical or theatrical sphere, I am reduced to chronicle the smallest beer in the way of hap or forecast. Perhaps the most curious scrap of intelligence in my wallet is that the opening of a German theatre in Paris is very seriously talked about. Considering that notwithstanding the large admixture of the Teutonic race with the population of this city, to the extent of 180,000 it is said, no German company has ever created sufficient interest among their compatriots to secure itself from disastrous loss, there can be little doubt that this is no private adventure. It is in fact presumed to be a move of his Imperial Majesty, and intended to serve as an exponent of the sympathy of France with Germany—an élan which will carry it to the frontiers of the Rhine. A propos of this subject I have an account from Vienna of the number and nature of the performances at the Court theatre from the 17th of July, 1850, to the end of May this year. The total number of operas performed was 217, in which the share of Meyerbeer alone was thirty-five; that of Mozart twenty-five; Wagner twenty-three; Donizetti and Weber each twenty; Lortzing sixteen; Auber and Verdi eleven; Halevy ten; Flotow seven; Beethoven seven; Rossini six, and Gluck two. The Court opera receives a subvention of 240,000 florins, and the Hofburg Theater, where dramas, tragedies, and comedies are played, 80,000 florins.

The conjunction of Scribe and Auber has been so happy in the operatic region, that though both are now stricken in years, it is impossible to refrain from the liveliest anticipations when we hear once more of its recurrence. Two comic operas are said to be forthcoming, the result of this illustrious collaboration. One of them is already in a finished state; it is in three acts and on a Russian subject of modern date. Russia has unfortunately never proved very inspiring to art or literature; mais nous verrons. The title of this work is not yet decided; it bears at present the provisional one of Le Serail en gaité, which would seem to concern the followers of Mahomet rather than the faithful of the Greek Church. There was, by the way, an extraordinary performance (in official language) the other day at the Opéra-Comique, for some benevolent object or other which is unimportant, but which was the occasion of the assemblage of an unusually long list of artists. Among them the least known to the public was Mad. Trebelli, a pupil of M. Wartel, who made her début last year at Madrid with great success. Her voice is a mezzo soprano of light though resonant quality, her intonation is accurate, her face very pleasing, and she gives in every way fair promise. Mad. Ugalde has just accepted an engagement at this house, and will make her appearance in Galathée, of which she is the original creatress. M. Couderc returns about the middle of this month, and will appear in a new opera by M. Eugene Gautier, entitled Crispin Médecin. Boieldieu's opera Le Petit Chaperon Rouge will be revived next week, and Mad. Faure is to play Rose d'Amour. I must not leave the subject of the Opéra-Comique without confessing with due humility that in one of my letters I was guilty of circulating a gross canard. The bird, I trust you will believe, was none of my hatching, but flew to me direct from Italy, whence many a bird of like feather and treacherous accent has winged its way to the news market. Foreign intelligence was wont to be wafted on the pinions of the trusty pigeon cogener of the faithful dove; now the canard, patron of quacks and emblem of fraud and folly, usurps the office and makes gulls of poor editors. But I forgot to correct my false intelligence. Mad. Pannetrat is to marry no German ambassador, nor has she contracted any alliance save with the public of the Salle Favart.

It is a coincidence that Levassor, the celebrated comic singer, and John Parry, equally celebrated, and not a little resembling him in style, though without the qualities of a thorough actor, both return to the world much about the same time after a long period of illness. Levassor was actually killed by, not a grey goose shaft, the dart was winged with a feather from our friend the canard.

I am informed by a correspondent at St. Petersburg that the Italian tragedian, Mad. Ristori, is engaged there for three months. I had heard of this before, but was not certain of the fact, especially as it was coupled with the absurd statement that her terms of remuneration were to be 4000*l*. On her return to Paris, Mad. Ristori will appear at the Odeon in a drama of M. Legouvé, and will play in French. From the same informant I hear also that an important decision, so far as music is concerned, has been taken by the Emperor, who has ordered that from the 1st of September next the orchestras of the Imperial theatres should adopt the diapason fixed by the French Commission. General Lwoff, whose interest in the art is known throughout Europe, has obtained from his Imperial Majesty a grant of 1760*l*. as an indemnity to the artists for the changes required in their instruments in order to carry out this measure. Another piece of foreign musical news is that the King of Holland has just conferred on M. Batta, the violoncello player, the order of the Crown of Oak. By the way, à propos of the diapason-normal just mentioned, your readers may not know that it is now in full use at the Grand Opéra. M. Cavaillé-Coll has had to substitute a new instrument to the organ formerly in use for the stage. It is not yet installed, but it is highly spoken of. Mad. Ferraris, the celebrated danseuse at this establishment, has just left for London, being engaged at Her Majesty's Theatre. Semiramis is being rehearsed, and is on the point of being produced.

The Théâtre-Choiseul, of which diminutive place of entertainment M. Offenbach is lessee, has just been sold by auction. It was knocked down to M. Lenoir, agent for M. Charles Comte, after a smart competition with M. Offenbach's agent, who ran the bidding up to 292,500 fr. The two new theatres in the Place du Châtelet are being rapidly proceeded with. The foundations of the new lyrical theatre have already reached the level of the ground, and the ground has been long cleared for the Impérial Théâtre. After a minute examination of the plans submitted for the reconstruction of the Opéra, the commission has finally adopted that presented by the Government, but with certain modifications.

The new house is still to have a frontage of fifty-six metres and a depth of seventy, but the site will be enlarged by the additional space originally to be devoted to the formation of two lateral streets. The suppression of these will allow sufficient space for two covered court-yards, one reserved exclusively as an entrance for the carriages of the Imperial Court, the other for the carriages of the public. The Rue Lafayette and the Rue de Rouen, carried out on a breadth of from fifteen to twenty mètres, will open out on the new Place, which will be connected by a boulevard thirty mètres wide, with the carrefour Gaillon, while two streets, twenty mètres wide, will open out, one on the eastern face of the Madeleine, the other on the Place de la Bourse, near the Vandeville Théâtre.

It was pleasantly rumoured here that a libretto, by the Italian poet, Melchiore Sacchero, entitled Charlotte Corday, was being set to music by Meyerbeer, and would be produced at the San Carlo, at Naples. There is not the least foundation for the statement, which, in the latter part of it, is manifestly absurd.

While you have had your Orphéoniste festivals at the Crystal Palace, the good city of Friburg have also had a great choral demonstration; eighty-two vocal societies assembled there, and two of them were also from France—one from Paris and another from Colmar. The Grand Duke of Baden, with his Grand Duchess, and the Minister of the Interior, honoured the performances with their presence. At Zuichan they have been celebrating the 50th anniversary of the birth of Robert Schumann. A concert was given on the 8th of June, and the next day the memorial tablet and sculptured medallion of Schumann were solemnly unveiled; both are affixed to the façade of the house in which the composer was born. Goethe too is to have another statue; it is to be erected in Berlin, and the celebrated philologist, Jacob Grimm, is at the head of the commission charged with carrying out the project. The Opéra at Berlin, by the way, has closed, the last representation being La Muette de Portici. It will not re-open for two months. Rather a curious musical event has just occurred in this city, namely, the 3000th concert given by Charles Eichelberg. The orchestra was on a colossal scale, 30 first violins, 20 second ditto, 20 basses, 16 violoncellos, 20 double basses; in all 150 artists.

I see you are bringing out Oberon at one of your Italian theatres. As a pendant to this revival I may tell you that at Breslau they have been playing Der Freischütz for the 250th time. Karl Maria von Weber was leader of the orchestra in this city in 1805, and it was here he wrote his opera of Rubezahl.

TESTIMONIAL TO CIPRIANI POTTER.

SEVERAL professors and students of the Royal Academy of Music, and other persons connected with music, and involved in its best interests, have subscribed to a Testimonial to Mr. Cipriani Potter, on his retirement from our only national musical seminary, in which he has been actively engaged since its foundation, thirty-seven years ago. The presentation of this took place at the Academy, on Saturday, the 30th of June, when a very numerous meeting of the subscribers assembled. Sir George Clerk, one of our leading musical amateurs, and Vice-President of the Academy, acted as chairman on the occasion; and he was supported by the Earl of Wilton, and the committee for conducting the testimonial, Mr. R. Barnett, Dr. Sterndale Bennett, Mr. H. Blagrove, Mr. Dorrell, Mr. Lucas (Hon. Treasurer), Mr. G. A. Macfarren (Hon. Secretary), Mr. Walter Macfarren, and Mr. Brinley Richards. The minutes of two former meetings of the subscribers were read, at the first of which the testimonial was proposed, and at the second the manner was decided upon in which it should be carried out. The Committee submitted the following Report of the proceedings:—

Report of the Committee to the Meeting of Subscribers on the 30th of June, 1860.

"Your Committee have the pleasure to report that several new subscriptions have been added to the list since you extended the time for receiving them, including some from New York, Calcutta, Naples, and Boston, besides some from admirers of Mr. Potter resident in England. One from Naples is from the former Superintendent of the Academy, the Rev. F. Hamilton, expressing not only the most cordial sympathy with this tribute to Mr. Potter, but desiring also the kindest greetings and remembrances to the many friends with whom he was associated during his connection with the institution. The subscription list contains 309 names, and the total sum at present subscribed amounts to £534 13s., of which £530 19s. 6d. has been already received by the Treasurer.

"Your Committee changed the date agreed upon at the last meeting for the Presentation, in accordance to the wish of several provincial subscribers, who were anxious to attend on this occasion, but whose engagements would prevent their being in London before the present time. It was impossible to make an arrangement that would suit the convenience of every subscriber, and it is to be regretted that some of those who have expressed the warmest interest in the proceedings, especially Mr. T. M. Mudie, are unable to be here to-day; but their good wishes are with you all, although they cannot personally express them. Sir John Campbell's absence to-day is occasioned by another cause, which he explains in a letter that will be read to you. Your Committee have to report that Dr. W. Sterndale Bennett, Mr. Charles Lucas, and Mr. G. A. Macfarren, have accepted the office of first trustees of the Exhibition Fund, which you appointed them at your last meeting. The draft of a deed of trust—for the legal provision for successors to the trustees, whom you appointed at your last meeting, to take charge of the fund you appropriated to the Potter Exhibition—has been prepared by Mr. Bishop, and will be submitted to you for approval. Your authorising of this deed will be the virtual establishment of the Potter Exhibition, and thus it will be the erecting a monument to Mr. Potter's memory, which will endure as long as music is studied in England.

"A list of the Subscribers, with an account of the Testimonial, has been written on vellum. In this, according to the feeling generally expressed at your first meeting, the amount of each individual subscription is not stated, it being considered that the compliment to Mr. Potter is shown in the animus which has prompted us, one and all, to subscribe, and not in the sums which, according to our different means and circumstances, each of us has subscribed. As there is no distinction among the subscribers in respect of the feeling that has induced them to join in this testimonial—as they constitute a commonwealth of esteem and regard towards the late Principal of the Academy—the names in this list stand in alphabetical order, with the exception of a very few, which were received too late for insertion in their proper places.

"Your Committee have expended the sum of £100, voted at your last meeting for that purpose, in the purchase of a Silver Tea Service and Salver, of Messrs. Hunt and Roskill; and they have the pleasure to inform you that these gentlemen, in consideration of the occasion, and at the instigation of Mr. Sparrow (one of our subscribers), reduced the price of these articles from £126 to the sum you voted, and included the cost of engraving the inscriptions in this amount.

"The Secretary has received very many letters in reference to the Testimonial, all of which abound in the most cordial expressions of affection and admiration for Mr. Potter; and your Committee suggest to you that as these may probably be interesting to Mr. Potter, the whole of the correspondence, together with the books containing the minutes of the Committee's meetings, be handed to him.

"It is expected that one more meeting of the Committee, for the purpose of discharging the claims upon them for the various expenses connected with the Testimonial, of winding up the accounts, and of handing over the balance to the Trustees of the Exhibition Fund, will enable them to complete the agreeable duties you confided to them; and they will retire from office with feelings of the utmost gratification, if they can believe that they have fulfilled your wishes."

The draft of the deed of trust was read and approved, and signed by the Chairman on behalf of the meeting.

Sir George Clerk addressed Mr. Potter, stating how deeply the Directors of the Academy felt the importance of his services to the institution, how happy its professors had always been in co-operating with him, how gratified as much as benefited had been the students by his instructions, and how sensible was every one who felt interest in the progress of music in England, of the valuable influence his (Mr. Potter's) example and teaching had had upon it. He alluded to the fact that all the chief positions in our principal London orchestras are held by persons who have been educated in the Academy, to prove the beneficial effect this institution has had in furtherance of the art; and he attributed this effect mainly to Mr. Potter's able fulfilment of his office; and he concluded his speech, amidst loud acclamations, by presenting Mr.

Potter with the silver service and the list of subscribers, and declaring that the "Potter Exhibition" was now established.

Mr. Potter was greeted with enthusiastic applause when he rose to return thanks for the compliment that was paid him. He spoke, with very great emotion, of his interest in music, his interest in the Academy, and his interest in all those who had been educated there. Throughout his long and gratifying speech, he was greatly overcome by his feelings; but he showed himself in every word he said, as he has proved himself in his indefatigable artistic career, a true and zealous lover of the art he has done so much to foster.

The Earl of Wilton expressed the thanks of the meeting to Sir George Clerk for his efficient conduct in the chair, who acknowledged these with cordial earnestness, and then proposed three cheers for Cipriani Potter, which were given with pealing heartiness, being joined in as warmly by the many ladies as by the gentlemen who were present.

The meeting was one of great interest, since it brought together from remote parts of the country many old school associates, who had not shaken hands for years; and with these, many musicians quite unconnected with the Academy, and many amateurs of music, who all concurred in the feeling for which they were assembled—their wish to express their personal regard and professional admiration for the man who has had more influence than any other on the progress of music in this country. The time is now passed for statues and tablets; the merits of Wellington are commemorated in a college for the sons of soldiers; those of Miss Nightingale in an hospital for men who have suffered in the service of their country; and those of Cipriani Potter, not less appropriately, in the endowment of a fund to assist musical students in defraying the cost of their education.

MADAME CINTI-DAMOREAU TO HER PUPILS IN THE CONSERVATOIRE.*

IT is to you, my dear pupils, that I have resolved to dedicate this method, the fruit of my studies and my experience, and in which I think I have set forth the best principles and the best examples of the art of singing. Adhere firmly to these principles, and endeavour to reproduce faithfully the examples; this, in a word, is the great thing in a good system of instruction.

If I speak to you of my studies, it is because at the very apogee of my artistic career, I never ceased to study; it is only to assiduous labour, and the firm resolve of effecting every day fresh progress, that we owe the inestimable honour of obtaining and preserving the favour of the public. In order to prove to you all that may be gained by this determined application to study, I at first entertained the idea of prefixing my biography to this book, but I was afraid it would be too long, and I shall restrict myself to describing only that part of my career which is connected with my débuts at the Théâtre-Italien, the Opéra, and the Opéra-Comique. You must bear in mind, therefore, that, while speaking of myself, I shall not cease to think of you.

I was scarcely thirteen when I was introduced to M. C. Henri Plantade, a clever, talented, kind-hearted man, whose memory is still cherished by all those who have loved or cultivated musical art in France during the last thirty years. M. Plantade was assiduous in giving me lessons, with all the care of an excellent musical professor and all the tenderness of a father. My voice, which gave promise of becoming flexible, but which did not then possess much strength, struck him as completely adapted to the Italian style. I studied, therefore, under him, only the old repertory, beginning with Durante's Psalms. My masters allowed me to sing scarcely three or four French airs; among these latter were the airs of Montano et Stéphanie, and Beniowski, true models of a style that is at once simple, expressive, and graceful. I mention this to you, my dear pupils, in order that you may not suppose that you sing well only when you have succeeded in singing with ease what is difficult. It is not enough, recollect, merely to utter notes and execute passages more or less difficult; besides doing this, you must give them colour, you must animate and accentuate them, and for this purpose an artist must be impressed with the words, and with the spirit of the piece or scene he has to sing. His physiognomy, also, must, so to speak, reveal to the hearer the subject and character of what is sung. Is it necessary for me to add that his articulation and pronunciation must be irreproachable? Listen to Ponchard, and you will perceive how much charming effect is gained by not allowing a syllable to be lost by the auditors.

It is far more difficult to sing in French than in Italian. This is very easily explained. We French do not allow ourselves to take breath in the middle of a word, to repeat a syllable, to sing forte when the situation suggests that we should sing piano; lastly, we must not sacrifice the words to the notes, but, on the contrary, we must sacrifice the notes to the words. By working incessantly, by devoting yourselves exclusively to your art, you may succeed in identifying the former with the latter, and speaking in music.

Such is nearly all my method, my dear pupils. I worked always and constantly, listening to others and reasoning on what I heard.

When I had attained my fourteenth year, M. Plantade said to me, "My dear girl, you can now do without me. Mark my words: you possess taste; you will adopt what is good in some and reject what is bad in others." But do not suppose from this advice, that you are to imitate servilely the master or the model you select. You must, as I cannot too often repeat, explain to yourselves the means of success peculiar to the artist to whom you are listening, and clearly comprehend by what art he has acquired grace, by what secret he has been able to charm you. You thus avoid the shoal of parody, and advance rapidly on the road that leads to success.

Before I was fifteen, I made my début at the Italiens, as Lilla, in La Cosa rara, a character left open by the departure of Mad. Fodor. Thanks to my extreme youth, and, above all, to the advice of my dear master, my success was a genuine one. The day on which M. Plantade's unconditional approbation confirmed the applause of the public was the happiest day of my life. After my successful début, I had many annoyances and prejudices to overcome. I was French; this was almost a crime at the Théâtre-Italien!

I was not discouraged. I learned, in a very short time, nearly fifteen or twenty parts; I understudied (sometimes in a day) the parts of all the prime donne; in the ardour of my zeal, and with my incessant application, I was ready for every score. This, my dear pupils, is the proper place to inform you that, should you intend to go on the stage, you must not be contented with studying the part in which you propose to appear; you must comprehend and fully master all the other parts. By this plan, you seize better the purpose of a work, while engaging in a practice more calculated than any other to render your talent supple. My adoption of this system proved, one day, highly advantageous to me.

Mad. Catalani was to appear in an extraordinary performance at the Opéra. The grand rehearsal was already somewhat advanced, when it was remarked that the great vocalist had not arrived. At the moment the ritornello of her cavatina announced her entrance on the stage, Barilli, our stage-manager, taking my hand, boldly presented me to the orchestra, to sing in the place of our celebrated manageress. Though greatly agitated at first, I felt afterwards very happy, for the orchestra applauded me very much, and it was the first time such an honour had been paid me. When Mad. Catalani heard of what I had been bold enough, or, rather, what my devotion to art had prompted me to do, she thanked me by an embrace, for she was always kind.

A short time subsequently (I was then sixteen), Garcia entrusted me with a charming first-rate part in his opera, Il Califo di Bagdad. Yarat, who then heard me (alas! I was too young ever to have heard him), said, I sang insolently in tune (insolemment juste). This is, I think, the only defect on which I have had to congratulate myself in the whole course of my life; contrast this defect, my dear pupils; there can be no charm if you do not sing in tune. This quality is not one, I am aware, that is easily acquired, but, by working assiduously at the intervals of all kinds, slowly, and with the assistance of a master, you may sometimes succeed in singing in tune, even when you have not naturally a feeling for it.

When Rossini arrived in France, I received the valuable advice of Bordogni, whose colleague I afterwards became at the Conservatoire, and whose good taste is proved by the charming exercises of vocalisation he has given us.

A short time afterwards, an extraordinary performance afforded me an opportunity of appearing at the Opéra, in Le Rossignol. As I had never previously had a chance of singing in French before the public who treated me already so kindly, I was in a state of intense anxiety. It was, however, the very success which attended this attempt which made me resolve to remain on the grand stage of the Opéra, for which a new destiny seemed then about to open. But, before I separated from the Théâtre-Italien, which had become endeared to me for many reasons, I determined to subject myself to another ordeal, more serious than that of Le Rossignol could be. The Vicomte de la Rochefoucauld (then Duke de Doudeauville), whose name all artists should remember with gratitude, was, at that time, entrusted with the direction of the Beaux Arts. I asked his permission to play Amazily, in Fernand Cortez, a delicious part, entirely dependent on expression, and, apparently, quite opposed to the nature of the style I had cultivated up to that period. The part does not contain a single roulade; it was impossible to succeed in it except by feeling and simplicity. This second bold attempt proved even more successful than the first. I became a member of the Opéra, therefore, exceedingly proud of having obtained the suffrage of so eminent a composer as Spontini, and of so dramatic a singer as Mad. Branchu, for whom he had composed this admirable part twenty years previously. Here begins the second, and not the least happy, period of my theatrical career.

The Operas.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—The experiments now being made at both Italian houses to resuscitate the neglected works of acknowledged masters, are commendable as likely to lead to good results, if not to great successes. In all probability we shall hear little more this year of Orfeo e Eurydice, performed three times at the Royal Italian Opera, or of Il Matrimonio Segreto, performed twice at Her Majesty's Theatre, both of which were worthily and carefully put upon the stage; but we must not therefore conclude that nothing has been accomplished. It is something at all events for composers of the present day to gain some notion of what sort of music is calculated to please the public for whom they intend writing, and by what means popularity may be most surely achieved. It is something, too, even for the informed, to be reminded how old composers, like Gluck and Cimarosa, wrote in the olden times, and to contrast their compositions with those of writers of the present day. When Oberon was announced at Her Majesty's Theatre, we entertained serious doubts as to its success; nor were these doubts entirely removed when told that the cast would include the names of Titiens, Alboni, Mongini, Belart, Everardi, Gassier, and others; that the spectacle would be dazzling and transcendent; and that the music would be enriched by additions from Euryanthe, and accompanied recitatives by Mr. Jules Benedict, the accomplished musician, and favourite pupil and friend of Weber. We could not help thinking that there must have been some powerful cause for the failure of the opera on its first production. Oberon was first performed on the eleventh of April, 1826, when Weber was in the height of his popularity, and when the public, enraptured with their new favourite, would have been but too eager to take advantage of any opportunity afforded them of exhibiting their enthusiasm. The opera, nevertheless, ran but a few nights, and achieved a moderate success only. No doubt a good deal was owing to the absurdity and unfathomable purpose of the libretto, of which the author, Mr. Planché, one of the most elegant and correct of our dramatic writers, appears now to be thoroughly ashamed, since he acknowledges, in his preface to the Italian version, that "nothing but the genius of Weber could have preserved it from total oblivion." If variety and locomotion constituted a good book, Oberon would be the best ever written. There are kings, knights, caliphs, princes, sheiks, Arabs, eunuchs, emirs, Saracens, Moors, soldiers, nobles, negroes, ladies of the harem, slaves, dancing girls, sultanas, pirates, fairies, spirits of the four elements, mermaids, genii, &c., &c. Fairy-land and romance-land are commingled in one incongruous mass. The age of chivalry is bound up with the heathen mythology, and both made subservient to the wildest flights of the imagination. Puck, Oberon, Titania, and the fairies shake hands with Charlemagne, and make their salaams at the foot of the throne of Caliph Haroun al Raschid, the Commander of the Faithful. The diversity of places is even more extraordinary than the variety of characters. The first scene takes place in Oberon's bower—in Fairy-land, we may presume. The next scene involves the translation, by Puck, of Sir Huon from the banks of the Seine to the banks of the Tigris. From Bagdad to Ascalon is soon achieved by supernatural means; and thence to Tunis is but a short flight by the same process. Finally, a single jump from Tunis to France brings all to an end in the presence of Charlemagne and his host of Paladins. Now, all these people appearing in quick rotation, and all these changes of locality taking place, create much entertainment; but the plot hangs together by a very slender thread, and astonishment is the natural feeling it inspires. The poetry, we may say, par parenthese, is admirable, better in fact than that of almost any operatic libretto with which we are acquainted; the story, however, is as extravagant, inconsistent, contradictory, and unaccountable, as is that of the Zauberflöte, or Matilda di Shabran, and yet Mozart composed music for the one and Rossini for the other.

Upon Mr. Benedict devolved the onerous and, however agreeable, not very grateful task of writing the accompanied recitatives and making such additions as were considered necessary to the success of the opera. This gentleman, perhaps more than any other living musician, was the most thoroughly competent to enter into Weber's notions and supply what was found wanting in the score. We cannot help thinking, however, that the interpolation of pieces from Euryanthe was a grave mistake, and by no means called for, notwithstanding the brilliant manner in which it enabled Mlle. Titiens to wind up the performance. Oberon is, or is not, a chef-d'œuvre. If it is, it was sacrilegious to meddle with it. If it is not, no excerpts from other works could make it so. Moreover, the public were desirous to hear Oberon in its integrity, and wanted nothing else—not even that Mlle. Titiens should be conciliated. With regard to the music, we are inclined to think that Weber composed the greater part of it under circumstances by no means favourable to inspiration; that he was unwell at the time, we may naturally infer, seeing that his death happened not long after. It is possible, too, that he was over anxious about his work, after the extraordinary and unprecedented sensation created by Der Freischütz, and did not give his inspiration fair play. Certainly, whatever may be the abstract merits of Oberon, no one will deny that it is inferior to Der Freischütz, not only as a work of imagination, but of art. That there are beautiful, nay, magnificent things in Oberon, everybody knows; but the music is not equal, and both the ear and the judgment are left unsatisfied at the end.

Of the performance we can speak highly, and shall, we have no doubt, be enabled to speak more highly after a few repetitions. On Tuesday night some of the artists were too nervous to do themselves anything like justice, and we may point especially to Signor Mongini (from whose grand voice and forcible style the greatest things were expected in Sir Huon) as being almost wholly incapacitated by anxiety to do too much. Moreover, he laboured under an ill-fitting helmet, from which he appeared to suffer as much as from the dread of attacking Weber's notes. An ill-fitting casque or headpiece, more particularly if worn on the head, is not, as may be imagined, conducive to the production of tone. Signor Mongini should have rehearsed with his helmet on. Mlle. Titiens, Mad. Alboni, and Signor Belart carried away the chief honors. Mad. Alboni (Fatima) obtained the only encore of the evening (except one) in the romance, "A lonely Arab maid," which she gave with incomparable grace, expression, and finish. Mlle. Titiens never sang more superbly, both in the air, "Haste, gallant knight!" and in the grand scena, "Ocean, thou mighty monster," creating a powerful sensation. Signor Belart sang the music of Oberon to perfection. The song "From boyhood trained in battle-field" in the original score belonged to Sir Huon, but was objected to by Braham, and "O, 'tis a glorious sight to see," substituted in its place. The original song is now restored, but assigned to Oberon in place of Sir Huon, by merely an alteration of the words from the first to the second person singular, whereby, as Mr. Planché observes, "the feeling of the composition is perfectly preserved, and the character of Oberon rendered of more musical importance without loss to that of Huon." To our thinking, this song is much more striking and beautiful than the bellicose scena written expressly for Braham, and which we have always considered to be so much overrated. Signor Belart sang it most admirably. We can hardly fancy Weber composing a regular bravura for the great English tenor. The part of Sherasmin was capitally acted and sung by Signor Everardi; and M. Gassier, by his energy and powerful vocalisation, did as much as the brief space of time he was before the public permitted him to do in the character of the Saracen Prince Babekan. Mlle. Vaneri as Roshana, the jealous and infuriated cara sposa of Almanzor, and Mad. Lemaire as Puck, are entitled to honourable mention.

Since the production of Auber's Il Prodigo, some ten or twelve years since, no spectacle either in ballet or opera at Her Majesty's Theatre can be compared with Oberon. The eye indeed is dazzled by a series of pictorial illusions, changes, and transformations, such as we look for in our Christmas entertainments only. It would take more room than we can well spare, after all we have written, to describe the splendour and novelty of the tableaux, the richness and variety of the dresses, the magnificence of the appointments, and the brilliant assemblage of fairies, water-nymphs, dancing-girls, &c.—these and other things we may discuss by-and-bye.

We cannot close our remarks, however, without stating how admirably the band went under the direction of Mr. Benedict, and how well-deserved was the unanimous and loud encore accorded to the Overture.

Oberon was repeated on Thursday, and will be given for the third time, this evening.

Royal Italian Opera.—On Saturday Orfeo e Eurydice, and the first act of Il Barbiere, were repeated; and on Tuesday the same performances were given, for the third time, by desire of Her Majesty, who attended with the Prince Consort.

Perhaps of all the characters in which Mad. Grisi has obtained celebrity that of Lucrezia Borgia (Norma itself not excepted) is the one upon which the slow but infallible encroachments of time have been able to produce the least sensible effect. We allude, of course, to her vocal execution of the part; for, judged from a histrionic point of view, years have only served to perfect a conception which, noble and vigorous from the first, now assumes the proportions of the loftiest tragedy. A more transcendent exhibition of dramatic power than her performance on Thursday night, when Donizetti's finest serious opera was presented (for the first time this season at the Royal Italian Opera) with the scenic attractiveness of former years, has rarely been witnessed. Not to recapitulate incidents with which our readers must be already too familiar, we may say, in a word, that the prominent situations — the finale to the prologue, where Lucrezia, unmasked before Gennaro, is inspired with her terrible scene of retribution; the finale to the first act, where she forces the unwilling and incredulous Gennaro to swallow the antidote; and that to the second, where, to her utter dismay, she discovers that the one being she loves has been involved by her own wicked act in the fate of those whom she has injured, whom she hates, and by whom she has been insulted and reviled—were as grand, impressive, and forcible as ever; while the intervening details that help to develope and complete the portrayal were brought out with masterly skill, lighted up by flashes of genius that gave significance to many a subtle point which might not otherwise have arrested the sympathies of the spectator. Madame Grisi's singing, at times unequal (as in the cavatina, "Come è bello," the slow movement of which was irreproachable, the quick movement here and there unsatisfactory), was for the most part admirable, quite on a par, indeed, with her acting. The two great duets with Alphonso and Gennaro, and the powerfully dramatic trio ("Guai se ti sfugge un moto") which separates them, afforded instances of vocal excellence that even in her very best days this gifted lady has hardly surpassed. Worthy to stand side by side with such a Lucrezia were the Gennaro of Signor Mario and the Alphonso of Signor Ronconi — the first one of the most romantic and graceful, the last one of the most intellectual and wonderfully elaborated impersonations of the modern stage. Signor Mario's voice was in excellent order; he sang "Di pescatore ignobile" with a feeling no less exquisite for its unaffected simplicity than for its tenderness, and the interpolated air, "Io pur sentii le placide" to perfection. In a very critical moment of the final duet with Lucrezia, however, he seemed wholly at a loss; but the ready address of the orchestra (which Mr. Costa has trained to a state of discipline worthy of a musical Garibaldi) soon restored the equilibrium; and this temporary aberration was atoned for by a portrayal of the death-scene of Gennaro for picturesque beauty and abstract natural truthfulness worthy of the greatest actors. Signor Ronconi's voice was in neither worse nor better order than usual; but his entire delineation of the character of Duke Alphonso was such as no predecessor has equalled and no contemporary even approached. His feigned courtesy to Gennaro, in the dialogue previous to handing him the poisoned cup, was a masterpiece of subdued irony —the cloven foot, hidden from poor Gennaro, being just enough visible to the audience to perfect the dramatic verisimilitude. That with such elements the grand scene of the opera—the scene in which the poison and the antidote are successively administered to Gennaro, and Alphonso just rushes on the stage in time to see his intended victim escape unhurt—should create an extraordinary sensation was not surprising. The applause was deafening at the fall of the curtain, and one of the old triumphs revived. Mad. Nantier Didiée's Maffeo Orsini exhibited all those lively qualities for which it has been praised, and the brindisi, "Il segreto per esse felice," dashed off with her accustomed vigour, was followed by the accustomed "ovation." Signor Tagliafico's Gubetta, as the picture of a gloomy, unprincipled villain, is not less faultless and original than his Sparafucile; the poisoned cup to the one is evidently as genial and familiar as the assassin's knife to the other. No one can represent an unscrupulous bravo so thoroughly well as this versatile gentleman. Meyerbeer's Prophète is announced for Tuesday, with Mad. Csillag as Fides, Mad. Corbari as Bertha, and Signor Tamberlik (his first appearance) as Jean of Leyden.

STABAT-MATER, SEDEBAT-PATER.

(Letter to Mr. Punch.)

"Sir,—I was at Mr. Benedict's Concert, at Her Majesty's Theatre, and an admirable concert it was,—rich to excess with every soil of musical attraction that could justify a man in giving up four hours in the day to having his ears pleased; but that's not the question now.

"The question is, Mr. Punch, whether you think that, because a woman comes late to a place of the kind, she has a right to expect a man who has come early to give up his seat to her? and whether she is justified in standing near him, like a standing reproach, and every now and then looking at him as if he were a brute, because he does not get up and resign his place?

"Because that is the way many women behave. They, having nothing to do, can just as well be punctual as not, and if they were they would get a place; but they come in late, and with a sort of insolent notion that room is to be made for them, let them come when they like.

"Several women behaved in that way at Mr. Benedict's Concert; and as I happened to have an end seat, near the Stalls (did I say I went into the Pit, and never bestowed Seven Shillings better?), I was the butt for a good deal of this sort of thing. Sir, I stood upon principle, and sat upon my seat. I would not move, and regarded the singers with fixed attention, turning adders' ears to mutterings behind and beside me about 'no notion of Gentlemen permitting Ladies to stand.' And in the intervals I smiled very blandly (I have a bland smile, my friends say) upon the insolent and disappointed females. The Stabat-Mater was excellently sung by Alboni and Titiens, and I enjoyed myself much.

"Was I not right, Sir? Has a woman a right to use moral force to turn me out of a place which I paid for and came early to secure? Unless you say she has, I shall pursue the same line of conduct, and "I am, Sir, yours obediently,

"No Cherub."

"P.S.—And it's so mean to attack us men. The women dared not attack other women. They knew better. There was really plenty of room for everybody, for Mr. B. issued no more tickets than the place would hold; but the Crinolines were immoveably obstinate, and contemptuously rejected the slightest suggestion to move ever so little closer. Upon my honour, Mr. Punch, I think women are awfully selfish."

Sig. Tamberlik has arrived from Spain, and will make his first appearance on Tuesday, at the Royal Italian Opera, as Jean of Leyden, in the Prophète.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—Last Night but One of the Subscription.—Third Night of Oberon.—This evening, July 7, will be performed, with new and elegant scenery, dresses, machinery, and appointments, which will present features of special interest, Weber's grand romantic opera of OBERON, with the following powerful cast:—Reiza, Mlle. TITIENS; Fatima, Mad. ALBONI; Puck, Mad. LEMAIRE; Roshana, Mlle. VANERI; Sir Huon, Sig. MONGINI; Oberon, Sig. BELART; Sherasmin, Sig. EVERARDI; Babekan, Sig. GASSIER. The whole produced under the immediate superintendence of J. R. Planché, Esq., author of the libretto (by whom several changes and modifications have been made), and Mr. R. Roxby. The recitatives by Mr. BENEDICT, pupil of the composer of this great work, who will direct the orchestra. Pit tickets, 8s. 6d.; Gallery Stalls, 5s.; Gallery, 3s.; to be obtained at the box-office of the theatre (under the portico), which is open daily from 10 to 6, and on the evenings of performance until the end of the opera.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.—First appearance of Signor TAMBERLIK.—Production of LE PROPHETE. On Tuesday next, July 10, will be produced, with new scenery, costumes, and decorations, Meyerbeer's Grand Opera, LE PROPHETE. Fides, Mlle. CRILLAG; Bertha, Mlle. CORBARI; Count Oberthal, Signor TAGLIAFICO; Zaccaria, M. ZELGER: Giona, Signor NERI-BARALDI; Mathisen, Signor POLONINI; Serjeant, Signor ROSSI; Peasant, Signor LUCCHESI; Burghers, Signor VAIRO and Signor PATRIOSSI; and Jean of Leyden, Signor TAMBERLIK (his first appearance this season). Conductor, Mr. COSTA. The incidental Divertissement and Skating Scene will be supported by Mlle. ZINA, Mlles. ESPER and MULOT, and M. DESPLACES, and comprise the celebrated Quadrille des Patineurs. The scenery by Mr. W. BEVERLEY; the costumes by M. HENNIER, of Paris, Mr. COOMBES, and Mrs. JAMES; the machinery by Mr. SLOMAN; the appointments by Mr. PRESCOTT; the dances arranged by M. DESPLACES; the Mise-en-Scène by Mr. A. HARRIS.

FRENCH PLAYS.—ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.—Every Evening. On Monday, Mlle. FIA will make her first appearance in the new Comedie, LES PATTES DES MOUCHES. Orchestra Stalls, 7s. 6d.; Balcony Stalls, 5s.; Pit, 2s.; Gallery, 1s.; Private Boxes, from £2 2s. Commence at 8 o'clock.

LONDON: SATURDAY, JULY 7, 1860.

THE last three Monday Popular Concerts have taken place. The first was devoted to Beethoven, the second to Mozart, and the third, in the language of the advertisement, to "All the Great Masters"—although, in looking over the programme, we found the names of several "great masters" omitted. This, however, was inevitable, unless the concert was to last till sunrise; which, the judgment of the directors being (as experience has shown) in no way inferior to their enterprise, was not very likely to be intended, even at a performance instituted for their own benefit, into which they would naturally crowd all the good things possible.

The success of the Monday Popular Concerts is altogether without precedent. If anybody had maintained, some two years since, that, before two years more should have elapsed, nearly forty concerts would be held in the large music room of St. James's Hall, for the edification of audiences averaging between a maximum of 2500 persons and a minimum of 1500, with quintets, quartets, and pianoforte sonatas as the staple attractions, he would have been set down as a moon-struck enthusiast, if not as something still more forlorn and pitiable. Nevertheless, this has been brought about, and by those, too, whose previous undertakings had indicated no such staunch belief in the musical taste of the great public. The theory enforced (or endeavoured to be enforced) by a certain speculator (in whom bashfulness is not a predominating quality), that no one in the social scale beneath an earl, a countess, or a bishop, is capable of appreciating a stringed quartet, and that, on the other hand, a stringed quartet can only be heard to perfection at St. James's Hall on a summer morning, has been summarily upset by the Messrs. Chappell, who—under the very nostrils of the above-named theorist—have established the Monday Popular Concerts, the most legitimate and attractive entertainments of the kind ever offered to the public.

One commendable feature in this undertaking is the total absence of "puff." The directors neither administer preparatory feelers in the shape of fulsome laudatory paragraphs, nor angry recriminations when critical exception happens to be taken with regard to any of the artists or works they bring forward. This is good alike for the patrons of the concerts, because it is honest and straightforward, and for the artists, because it does not compromise their self-respect by placing them in an undignified and ridiculous position before the public. At the Monday Popular Concerts the music of which the programme is composed, and the artists who are selected to perform, are allowed to appeal modestly on the strength of their intrinsic merits, and not put forth in flatulent paragraphs, as monstrous and unexampled phenomena. Herr Lubeck, for example, was just as courteously received, and thrice as warmly applauded, at St. James's Hall by gas-light, as at St. James's Hall by day-light; and yet, in one instance, he was presented simply as "Herr Ernst Lubeck," while, in the other, he was ticketed, labelled, and paraded, as "this unrivalled" ——— &c.—stirred up, in short, with the long pole, like a drowsy "lion" prostrate and somnolent through overfeeding, or a "lion" of irritable temperament, made refractory by the imposition of tasks wholly uncongenial to his leonine idiosyncracy.

ALL could appreciate the extent of the gap in public amusement occasioned by the decease of the late lamented Albert Smith. But few comparatively will be aware of the loss that is implied in the announcement that Robert Brough has rested so soon from his arduous toils. Widely celebrated as one of the most brilliant burlesque writers of the day, he had an earnest poetical side, which was seldom presented to the public, and we may fairly surmise that if Robert Brough had lived and prospered for twenty years more he would have been visibly identified with something very different from a writer of trivial papers and dramatic facetiæ. Perhaps he was the best of the class to which he would have been assigned by the public—his own best was revealed to few.

Well do we remember one evening when, in the lecture room of the Marylebone Institution, Robert Brough read a collection of his poems to an audience so scanty, as to dispel all intentions of repeating the experiment. But singular were the beauty and force of the poems themselves—some of them wildly passionate and exquisitely pathetic;—some sportively fantastic;—some impregnated with the spirit which we style "Bulwerian." But all were marked by a thorough mastery of language and of metre, and by a stern earnestness of purpose, while here and there (as for instance, in an imitation of the Raven of Edgar Poe) feats of great technical difficulty were performed. If ever there was a genuine poet it was Robert Brough, as he stood before that scanty audience at the Marylebone Institution. He appeared in a new character, but that character was evidently his own.

Of the novel which he published shortly before his death we are not in a position to speak; but how remarkable are those dramatic works by which his name is most familiarised to the public, if we take into the account all the circumstances of their production. Twelve years or so have elapsed since the "Brothers Brough" (that is, Robert and William) were made known to the London world as two young writers fresh from one of the Northern provinces, who at once leaped to the summit of facetious celebrity, by means of a burlesque Tempest. This Tempest, written by Robert Brough when he was less than 20 years of age I. was a tremendous "hit," and from the time of its production at the Adelphi, the "Brothers Brough" have been in constant requisition to supply the London theatres with those entertainments that recreate the public at holiday seasons. So prolific did they become, and so large was the demand which they supplied, that at one time there seemed considerable danger that they would "write themselves out." In the latest burlesque, however, a new vigor is apparent, and the pieces which Robert Brough wrote for Mr. Robson may be esteemed the best of his dramatic works. In the last of all — Alfred the Great — there were indications of a new spirit. The dialogue was more than usually pointed, and was free from that slang of the fast school to which the author in his earlier life was somewhat too much addicted, and which it has ever been the merit of Messrs. Robson and Emden to discourage to the best of their power.

The "Savage Club" project an amateur performance for the benefit of the widow and children of Robert Brough. Might we suggest—in addition to this expedient—a publication by subscription of the select poems of the deceased, carefully and lovingly edited? A volume containing the pieces we heard at Marylebone, would not only be a vendible commodity, but it would show to the public what Robert Brough really was in his serious moments.

Concerts.

Philharmonic Concerts.—The last concert of the forty-eighth season—one of the most brilliant and successful since the Philharmonic Society was instituted—took place at the Hanover Square Rooms on Monday evening, when the following selection was performed before a crowded assemblage of amateurs and professors of the musical art:—

Part I.

Sinfonia in D, Op. 7	Mozart
Recit. and Aria, "Tu m'abbandoni," Miss Louisa Pyne . . .	Spohr
Concerto, pianoforte, in G minor, Miss Arabella Goddard	Dussek
Overture, "Naiades"	Sterndale Bennett

Part II.

Sinfonia in C minor, No. 5 . .	Beethoven
Aria, "Quando lasciai la Normandia" (Robert le Diable), Miss Louisa Pyne.	Meyerbeer
Overture, "Jubilee"	Weber

Conductor, Professor Sterndale Bennett, Mus. D.

The admirable execution of Mozart's symphony—one of his finest, although one of his earliest, and written for a small band, without even clarionets—offered a fair specimen of the unsurpassed capabilities of the Philharmonic orchestra and the consummate talent of Professor Bennett as a conductor, in which capacity, where classical music has to be dealt with, he is at the present time without a superior. Calmly and unobtrusively, devoid of fuss, or show of any kind, thinking of the music he has to direct, and not at all of himself, Professor Bennett does his work to perfection, adding, moreover, to the qualities we have specified, the taste and experience of an accomplished musician, combined with an intimate knowledge of all that is set before him. His own poetical and masterly overture, the Naiades, always welcome, and always in place, no matter of what materials the rest of the programme may be composed, was, perhaps, never more superbly given—even at Leipsic or Berlin, where it forms a stock piece at the established musical institutions—and certainly never received with greater heartiness. Both the members of the orchestra, who played so well, and the audience, who applauded so warmly, seemed inclined to express, in a significant and unmistakeable manner, their sense of the sterling merits of Professor Bennett, under whose able and zealous superintendence these time-honoured performances have recovered all their ancient, and at one period slightly compromised, repute. The only novelty in the programme was the pianoforte concerto of Dussek—his sixth, in many respects his best, and one of those pieces which first elicited the attention of the ill-fated Prince Ferdinand of Prussia, who afterwards contracted such a close amity with the Bohemian musician that the two stood towards each other rather in the relationship of brothers than of patron and protegé. The attachment of any Prince, however, would have been requited by such a tribute as that which Dussek paid to Prince Ferdinand, in the Harmonic Elegy inscribed to his memory. The increasing vogue which the too-long neglected works of Dussek have been obtaining of recent years, and in which the lady who played the concerto in G minor on Monday night has had some hand, is a sure sign (among others) of the healthy progress our amateurs are making. To give to Cæsar, however, what is Cæsar's due, it was Dr. Wylde who, at one of his new Philharmonic Concerts (in 1858), first resuscitated this splendid concerto in G minor—as, the year following, he resuscitated another, its equal in merit (No. 12, in E flat), from the same hand. On both occasions the pianist was Miss Arabella Goddard, to whom the music of Dussek has always been sympathetic, and who now, as before, did her very best to impart her enthusiasm to her hearers. That her efforts were not unappreciated was shown by the genuine marks of approval bestowed upon each movement of the work. The honours belonged, of course, to the old master; but Miss Goddard was entitled to a modest share of them as a sincere and ardent votary. Miss Lousia Pyne gave the noble scena of Spohr with a refinement and expression beyond praise, and was rewarded at the conclusion with unanimous applause. Of the second part of the programme (which ended appropriately with "God save the Queen," used with fine effect by Weber, as a climax to his Jubilee overture) it is unnecessary to speak in detail. Every lover of good music will be pleased to learn that next season there are to be—in accordance with the practice of years gone by—eight Philharmonic concerts, instead of six. The return to the old constitutional figure will be hailed with universal satisfaction. In most cases it is admitted that adversity reads a lesson; but here we find the directors of the Philharmonic Society imbibing wisdom from success.

Monday Popular Concerts.—The Monday Popular Concerts, "The People's Philharmonic" as they have been not inaptly styled, came to a close on Monday night with a performance "for the benefit of the directors." It is well known that the managers of these entertainments are the Messrs. Chappell, who certainly need not be ashamed of the undertaking with which their names have for two years past been associated—for never was speculation, of which art was the medium, planned and carried out with more undeviating artistic worthiness. The first promise of the scheme has been verified to the letter; the public has been invariably dealt with in good faith; and it is now no more than the elucidation of a plain fact to state that an institution has been established, on the most legitimate principles and the firmest basis, alike honourable to its projectors and advantageous to those who support it. The programme of the final concert (the twenty-seventh of the second season), selected from the works of various masters, proved so attractive that St. James's Hall was hardly spacious enough to accommodate the crowd that besieged the doors. Those who take an interest in the musical progress of the masses (towards which poor Jullien effected so much, and with such untiring zeal) may not be displeased to learn that nearly 1600 paid 1*s.* at the doors. On the other hand, the area stalls and the three-shilling galleries were crammed to suffocation. What sort of music these worthy people came to hear may be seen by the subjoined programme:—

PART I.

Quartet in C major, stringed instruments	Spohr
Song—"The Wanderer"	Schubert
Harpsichord lessons, pianoforte	Scarlatti
Lieder Kreis, voice	Beethoven
Prelude, Sarabande, and Gavotte, violoncello	Bach

PART II.

Quartet, in E flat major, Op. 44, stringed instruments	Mendelssohn
Song—"Zuleika"	Meyerbeer
Suite de Pièces, in E major	Handel
Song—"Il Pensier"	Haydn
Song—"La Gita in Gondola"	Rossini
Duet, for two pianofortes, in D major	Mozart

Conductor—Mr. Lindsay Sloper.

The players in the quartets were M. Sainton, Herr Goffrie, Mr. Doyle, and Signor Piatti, with whose respective merits our readers are well acquainted. Spohr's quartet was given for the first time at these concerts; that of Mendelssohn—one of the masterworks of his prime—has been a constant favourite, and on the present occasion, delivered to perfection by the great French violinist (an Orpheonist if there ever was one) and his associates, pleased more than ever. The pianist in the first part was Mr. Charles Hallé, the most thoroughly accomplished foreign musician who of late years has made this country his residence. To him was awarded a very interesting group of pieces from the exhaustless library of old Domenico Scarlatti, including the masterly fugue in D minor. In the second part it devolved upon Miss Arabella Goddard to preside at the piano, and a more grateful task could hardly have been assigned her than that of representing Handel (Scarlatti's contemporary and formidable rival as a clavecinist), by means of his admirable suite de pièces in E major, the last part of which consists of the variations on a theme traditionally styled the "Harmonious Blacksmith." This performance was enthusiastically applauded, and the pianist called back into the orchestra at the end. To Signor Piatti were allotted the Prelude, Sarabande, and Gigue, that bear the honoured name of John Sebastian Bach—Cantor of Leipsic and "Patriarch of Musicians"—which three pieces the incomparable violoncellist had more than once previously introduced with eminent success at the Monday Popular Concerts. The singers were Mr. Santley, to whom fell Schubert's familiar lied (after singing which he was recalled) and the almost unknown Italian aria of Haydn, and Mr. Sims Reeves, who has "identified himself"—to employ a conventional phrase—with Beethoven's enchanting Lieder-kreis (songs addressed to "the distant loved one"), and Rossini's melodious "Gita in Gondola," and now added a charming romance of Meyerbeer, heard for the first (it is to be hoped not for the last) time. In the Lieder-kreis Mr. Reeves was accompanied by Mr. Charles Hallé; and for the pieces of Bach, Signor Piatti was no less fortunate in obtaining the co-operation of Mr. Lindsay Sloper, a pianist, as all our readers are aware, of the very first rank, and who, during the unavoidable absence of Mr. Benedict, undertook the duties of accompanist. The last notes were struck by the united fingers of Miss Arabella Goddard and Mr. Charles Hallé, to listen to whose faultless performance of Mozart's sonata in D major, for two pianofortes, the great majority of the audience (who had welcomed every piece with more or less enthusiasm) remained to the very end of the concert. A more brilliant climax to the second season could hardly have been anticipated. The Monday Popular Concerts are to be renewed in November.

BUCKINGHAM PALACE.—A grand concert was given on Wednesday evening, June 27, by Her Majesty, to a select but illustrious party. The following was the programme:—Aria, "Avi un dio" (Maria di Rohan), Donizetti, Mad. De Paez; Fantasia, Flute (MS.), Koppitz, Herr Koppitz; Recit. and Aria, "Non più di fiori" (La Clemenza di Tito), Mozart, Mad. Kapp-Young; Air Hongrois, Violin, Ernst, Herr Becker; Air, "Vous pouvez soupirer" (Marco Spada), Auber, Mlle. Artot; Fantaisie Originale, Pianoforte, L. De Meyer, M. Leopold De Meyer; Thema und Variazionen, Proch, Mlle. Charlotte de Tiefensée. At the Pianoforte, Mr. W. G. Cusins. At the end of the performance, Her Majesty, after exchanging a gracious word with each of the other artists, conversed with Herr Leopold de Meyer for nearly a quarter of an hour, and requested him, the celebrated pianist, if not too fatigued, to play another piece, with which august "command" M. Leopold de Meyer complied, to the infinite delight of the whole assembly, among whom were the King of the Belgians and divers "Grand Dukes."

THE MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—At the Second Conversazione for the season, which attracted a very numerous audience of professors and connoisseurs to St. James's Hall, on Wednesday evening, the following pieces of music were performed by professional and non-professional members of the Society:—

Programme,—Madrigal, "Sweet honey sucking bees," Wilbye; Presto in F sharp minor (Mendelssohn Bartholdy), and La Harpe, pianoforte (Pacher), Mlle. Anna Mélique; air, "The Shadow Song," Dinorah (Meyerbeer), Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington; Canone, for female voices, "Bird of the Morning" (Henry Smart); gran studio, "Il Mandolino," harp (Parish Alvars), Mr. John Thomas; aria con variazoni, "La Biondina in Gondoletta" (Ferdinand Paer), Mlle. Parepa; choral part song, "Lullaby" (Henry Smart); Lieder, "Voglein in Lüften" (Lindblad), "Morgen Ständchen von Shakespeare" (F. Schubert), Miss Elvira Behrens; choral part song, "The Lark" (Mendelssohn Bartholdy). Director of the Chorus, Mr. Henry Smart; Accompanist, Mr. Charles Salaman.

The hall, superbly decorated, and crammed with interesting relics, was the admiration of the entire company.

VOCAL ASSOCIATION.—The sixth and last Subscription Concert (Friday evening, June 29th) was one of the best, if not the very best, of the season, there being a full and efficient band in addition to the choral force, and a strong array of vocal talent, including the names of Mad. Catherine Hayes, Miss Susanna Cole, Miss Stabbach, Miss Messent, and Mr. Santley; while Mr. Charles Hallé gave his eminent services as solo instrumentalist. The specialties of the programme were Mr. Macfarren's cantata May-Day, and Spohr's Ode to St. Cecilia, given for the first time by the Association. In the former Miss Stabbach took the solos, in the latter Miss Susanna Cole, both effectively; the choruses being most at home—from practice, we may presume—in Mr. Macfarren's cantata. The "Ave Maria" from Mendelssohn's Loreley—first introduced to the public by Mr. Benedict at one of the concerts of the Vocal Association—constituted another special feature, and was, as usual, sung admirably and encored with acclamations, Mad. Catherine Hayes taking the soprano solo, as on the first occasion of its performance. The vocal solos were the aria "Ah! mon fils" from the Prophète, by Mad. Catherine Hayes; "Qui la voce" from the Puritani, by the same lady; the recitative and romance from Guillaume Tell, "Selva Opaca," by Miss Messent; and scena, "By him betrayed," from Mr. Benedict's opera Diego di Lara, by Mr. Santley—a fine composition finely sung. The choir gave a part-song by Mendelssohn, and the National Anthem at the end as a wind-up to the season. The band executed the overtures to Euryanthe and the Tempest. The last, the composition of Mr. Benedict, a vigorous and highly characteristic prelude to Shakspeare's comedy, was played with great fire, and received with a perfect "ovation." Mr. Charles Hallé performed Mendelssohn's Serenade with orchestral accompaniment in his most splendid manner, and was overwhelmed with applause at the end. In fine the season could not have terminated with more brilliant éclat, and Mr. Benedict may be said to have added another story to the temple he dedicated a few years since to music.

SIGNOR PIATTI'S MATINÉE MUSICALE on Saturday last was given under most distinguished patronage, and attracted a highly fashionable and elegant attendance to St. James's Hall. In addition to the excellent service rendered by the bénéficiaire, undoubtedly the finest master of the violoncello that has ever existed in our or indeed any other time, the accomplished cara sposa of Signor Piatti displayed her instrumental abilities to the highest advantage in Mendelssohn's trio in C minor for piano, violin, and violoncello, besides demonstrating her vocal capacity by joining in a duet from La Gazza Ladra with Mad. Sainton-Dolby;—the latter also charming her hearers with Gluck's "Che faro," which no doubt will become as popular as ever now that Orfeo has resumed its place on the stage. Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington never sang the Dinorah "Shadow Song" more brilliantly than on this occasion, when she was rewarded with applause much more hearty than is generally heard at morning concerts. Perhaps the audience were wakened into sensibility by Mr. Sims Reeves' capital rendering of Lady Clarence Paget's setting of Sir John Suckling's words, "Why so wan and pale," which absolutely commanded an encore—an occurrence most unheard-of at a fashionable matinée, and due to the admirable singing of Mr. Reeves, whose sudden infusion of energy in the last line, where the philosophic lover, despairing of his mistress, suggests that "the Devil take her," seemed both to startle and amuse his hearers. Mr. Reeves also gave two of Beethoven's exquisite little songs, "The Savoyard" and "Stolen Kiss," both of which he has familiarised to the Monday Popular Concert goers by his frequent introduction and admirable execution of these two playful emanations from the giant musician. A brilliant and masterly concerto, and a fantasia on Scotch airs (the former MS. and first time of performance), were contributed by Signor Piatti, who, we need hardly say, played his best. There was also a charming romanza, from the same pen, sung by Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington for the first time, the obbligato violoncello part sustained by the composer; the concluding piece in the programme, coro, "Inno marziale d' Italia," being also announced as by Signor Piatti. The English Glee and Madrigal Union (minus Mr. and Mrs. Lockey prevented by indisposition), Signori Solieri and Belletti, and Mr. Santley, one and all gave great satisfaction; the latter gentleman especially distinguishing himself in Mr. Hatton's setting of Longfellow's "Wreck of the Hesperus," accompanied on the pianoforte by the composer.

At M. DEPRET'S MATINÉE MUSICALE, on Saturday, at Collards' Pianoforte Rooms, a young lady, Miss Annie C, aged ten years, made her first appearance as a singer, and astonished everybody by her vocal powers, and still more by her feeling and expression. She sang "The power of love;" a new comic ballad, "I've something to tell," and two French songs, accompanying herself on the pianoforte in all four, showing extraordinary self-possession no less than extraordinary talent. The performances created unusual excitement, and the auditors, mostly composed of ladies, were fairly beside themselves, hugging and kissing the child after each performance in the very ecstasy of delight. Such rare talent as Miss Annie C undoubtedly possesses should, we think, at present be exclusively cultivated in private. The tender plant should not be removed too soon from the green-house. The concert in other respects had many points of interest. M. Depret, who is a Belgian tenor of no mean ability, sang an "Ave Maria" of his own composition; a new song, or as it is called, Récit de Village, "Une histoire d'Enfant," written expressly for him by Signor Biletta; and took part in some concerted pieces. He has a good voice, with much vigour of style, and created a decided impression. His vocal assistants were Mad. Catherine Hayes, Mad. Rieder, Mad. Rudersdorff, Miss Augusta Thomson, Mad. Louisa Vinning, Mlle. Parepa, Miss Palmer, and Mr. Patey. The instrumentalists were Herr Leopold de Meyer, Signor Giulio Regondi, M. Paque, and M. Poussard. The great "lion-pianist" (as Berlioz called him), or "sea-serpent pianist (as "Wedge" christened him), played his own fantasia on airs from Dinorah, and created a perfect furore, which was only appeased when he returned to the piano, and substituted his delicious improvisation on Meyerbeer's incomparable "Shadow Song" (Dinorah). Another encore was awarded to Mad. Rieder in the "Carnaval de Venise," in many instances a marvellous display of executive facility.

MR. AND MRS. TENNANT'S MATINEE (Friday, June 22nd) was given at Collards' Concert Rooms under the most distinguished patronage. The programme, unambitious in a classical sense, was interesting and well-varied. Mr. Tennant selected for his solos Felicien David's "Air de l'Exstase," from the opera of Herculanum, and Herr Blumenthal's song, "When we are parted;" the latter, an extremely well-written and attractive composition, and admirably sung by Mr. Tennant, who is fast rising into one of the celebrities of the concert-room, was unanimously encored. Mr. Tennant joined Miss Augusta Thomson, Mrs. Tennant, and Signor Ciabatta in the quartet from Martha, "Dormi pur;" Miss Augusta Thomson, Mad. Sainton-Dolby, and Signor Ciabatta in Signor Schira's part-song, "La notte e bella;" and sang, with Mrs. Tennant, Blangini's duet, "Per valli per boschi." Mrs. Tennant confined herself to a single solo, "Voi che sapete," which she sang with irreproachable taste. Among the other noticeable performances were "The Skipper and his Boy," by Mad. Sainton-Dolby, to which very characteristic song the admirable singing of the artist imparted a new charm; Mr. Pratten's execution on the flute of a fantasia of his own composition; and Herr Blumenthal's pianoforte performance of two of his own pieces, "Le Rève Melodie" and "Chanson le Capri," both admirably played. M. Jules Lefort, Signor Ciabatta, and Miss Augusta Thomson also supplied vocal pieces; and Herr Engel (harmonium), Signor Regondi (concertina), and Mr. Boleyne Reeves (harp), contributed their instrumental quota. The conductors were Signors Campana and Bucalossi, and Mr. Cusins.

MADAME LOUISA VINNING gave a Matinée on Thursday, at Collards' New Concert Rooms, but unfortunately was herself prevented from assisting, at the last moment, by a severe domestic calamity. Under these circumstances, Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington and Mad. Badia, whose names were not announced in the programme, and Miss Augusta Thomson, whose name was announced, kindly volunteered their services in a printed placard. Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington sang the "Shadow Song" from Dinorah; Mad. Badia a Neapolitan canzonet and a new song about Garibaldi, which was received with tremendous cheers; and Miss Augusta Thomson Signor Arditi's "Il Bacio" and Herr Francesco Berger's "Ave Maria." The original singers, in addition to Miss Louisa Vinning and Miss Augusta Thomson, were Mlle. Parepa, Mad. Laura Baxter, Mr. Wilbye Cooper, M. Depret, Mr. Pinkess, and Mr. Santley. Mendelssohn's trio in D, for piano, violin, and violoncello, was well executed by Messrs. Harold Thomas and H. Blagrove, and Sig. Pezze. In addition to solos on their respective instruments, by Messrs. H. Blagrove (violin) and S. Pratten (flute), and Mad. Pratten (guitar), Mlle. Caroline Remaury played two pieces on the piano with decided success. This lady, who made her first appeal to a British public, gained the first prize at the Conservatoire of Paris last year. Her performances on Thursday were one of Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne Worte, and a Tarantelle by Stephen Heller, the latter eliciting a unanimous encore. Mlle. Remaury will be heard of again before the end of the season.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—We learn on the best authority that Mr. Charles Hallé is engaged at Her Majesty's Theatre, as the conductor of the English operas about to be brought out at that establishment in the coming winter.—Manchester Examiner and Times.

MR. HENRY PHILLIPS, our well-known English basso, has nearly completed a sacred cantata, entitled A Day of Devotion. It will occupy about one hour in performance, and will be brought out during the autumn.—Ibid.

M. LEOPOLD DE MEYER has departed for the baths of Kissingen. He will return in September, being engaged "at fabulous terms" to form part of a touring company, under the enterprising Mr. Willert Beale.

MLLE. AMALIA FERRARIS has arrived to fulfil her engagement with Mr. E. T. SMITH. The celebrated danseuse will make her début in the grand ballet of Orfa, and will subsequently appear as Fenella in Masaniello.

MAD. VIARDOT is in London. There is a rumour that this renowned singer is engaged by the Earl of Dudley to sing the part of Orfeo in Gluck's Orfeo.

MARIO'S "ECCO RIDENTE."—"A more legitimate and elegant piece of singing than Mario's 'Ecco Ridente' has never been surpassed."—Critic.

TITIENS AND ALBONI.—"In Titiens' Semiramide that intellectuality shines most from its contrasting with the part she impersonates, a part which, in itself, nowise assists her, but, as in a picture, shadow renders the light more striking. In the splendid aria, 'Bel raggio,' the chain of solfeggi and fioriture that she lavished on the audience were executed with such marvellous force and precision that she electrified the house, and with Alboni in the grand duet, 'Giorno d'orrore,' so exquisite and so nobly impressive was the dramatic interpretation that their voices could only be considered as the vehicle to convey to a duller perception the high intellectuality which distinguishes their conception of scenic impersonation."—Critic.

ORGAN.—At Mr. A. H. Lowe's first private organ performance, Brunswick Chapel, Upper Berkeley Street, on Thursday evening, July 5, the following was the Programme:—

PART 1. "In native worth" (Creation), Haydn; "O thou that tellest" (Messiah), Handel; "Kyrie Eleison" (12*th Mass*), Mozart; March (Eli), Costa; "Total Eclipse" (Samson), Handel; "Gloria in excelsis" (12*th Mass*), Mozart.

PART 2. "Agnus Dei" (1*st Mass*), Mozart; War March (Athalie), Mendelssohn; "Be not afraid" (Elijah), Mendelssohn; "The marvellous works" (Creation), Haydn; March (Prophète), Meyerbeer.

The music and the playing afforded equal satisfaction to the hearers.

MOZART'S SONATA IN B FLAT and MISS ARABELLA GODDARD. In the selection from Mozart's works at last Monday's Popular Concert, the twenty-sixth concert and the last but one of the season, the new feature was the charmingly graceful sonata, in B flat, for pianoforte alone, played by Miss Arabella Goddard. It belongs to his later period, when he had gathered all his vast experience, which never, as in some smaller minds, shouldered his originality or his sense of beauty, out of its proper position. The Andante cantabile (second movement), in E flat, is a gem of quiet and refined melody; and the whole work is one of the many reproductions that have added lustre to this series of chamber concerts on a large scale. The playing of Miss Goddard in this and in the sonata in F, for pianoforte and violin, which had been previously performed but once, again exemplified the versatility of her great talents. The pianoforte writing of Mozart is so clear and distinct, so clear from conglomeration and fogginess, that none but the highest mechanical and musicianly ability can pass muster therein. The pianiste did more than this; she exhibited the Mozartean ideal (before an audience in this year of 1860), as it probably never has been since the death of the great composer. The quiet and refinement of Mozart, and the depth and sublimity of Beethoven, seem to live again under her hands, and struggle for her favour.—From "The Salamander."

CRYSTAL PALACE.

(Communicated.)

THE distribution of the prizes won at Wimbledon by the competitors at the National Rifle Association, will take place at the Crystal Palace on Monday next, at three o'clock. The successful candidates will receive their distinctions from the hands of the Right Hon. Sidney Herbert, M.P., Minister of War, supported by the members of the Council of the Association. The Handel Orchestra will be decorated for the occasion with flags and trophies and the names of the competing corps, and a raised dais erected in front, along which the winners will proceed in turn to receive the prizes. Military bands will occupy the space round the great organ, the front rows of the orchestra being occupied by the members of the Rifle Association and their friends. On either side of the military bands, seats will be reserved for the members of the Rifle Corps. The ceremony of presentation will commence at three o'clock. At its conclusion a series of athletic sports and exercises, in which the volunteers take part, will commence in the grounds, and be continued until dusk. No alteration will take place in the usual Monday charge for admission, viz., one shilling.

On Tuesday and Wednesday the greatest meeting of brass instrument performers ever known will be held at the Crystal Palace. Ninety-nine brass bands have entered the lists as candidates for prizes. These are from all parts of the country, but mostly from the great manufacturing districts. The members of these bands—nearly two thousand in number—will, with their friends, be conveyed to London by excursion trains on Monday. All the great railway companies run trains specially for the occasion. The leaders of the bands meet at Exeter Hall the same evening, and draw lots for the order in which they are to play at the following two days' contest. Eight platforms will be erected in various parts of the Crystal Palace grounds, the judges for each platform stationing themselves in tents in the immediate vicinity. At three o'clock on each day the whole of the bands will assemble on the great Handel orchestra, and perform in union "The Heavens are telling" and the "Hallelujah" choruses, Mendelssohn's "Wedding March," "Rule Britannia," and "God save the Queen." After this performance the trials will be continued until dusk, the first day being devoted to the selected bands. The whole of the arrangements are under the direction of Mr. Enderby Jackson, of Hull, whose long experience is a guarantee for their efficiency. The judges will be chosen from the leading military bandmasters.

On Thursday the National Rose Show will be held.

ALBERT SMITH.

He is gone—and the Egyptian Hall,
Like an Egyptian tomb,
Stands desolate, while all
Within—without—is gloom.

He is gone—and every breast
Heaves, as the passer by Gazes with grief oppress'd,
And mournful, moistened eye.

He is gone—that voice is now
Stilled that we loved to hear;
That intellectual brow
Will never re-appear.

He is gone—Mont Blanc is gone,
A shadow of the past,
The avalanche has fall'n,
Our guide, our friend is lost.

He is gone—and Galignani
Has ended with a tear;
China we never more shall see,
Dead is our Engineer.

He is gone—there's melancholy
Where all so late was gay,
Where humour lectured folly,
And bigots shrunk away.

He is gone—that patriot spirit,
That saririst acute,
By whose bold genius merit
Arose and vice lay mute.

He is gone—that pulpit vacant,
Well could our country spare
A thousand teachers absent,
Were his soul beaming there.

He is gone—but memory dwells
Still fondly o'er his tomb,
A thoughtful sigh the bosom swells,
Within—without—is gloom.

ELECTION OF ORGANIST AT THE LEEDS TOWN HALL.—After a severe contest for this honourable post, before Messrs. John Goss, George Cooper (London), and W. T. Best (Liverpool), these eminent judges have recommended Mr. Wm. Spark, of Leeds, as the person best qualified for the situation. There were twenty-two candidates, who were ultimately reduced to seven; and these were known to the judges only by an alphabetical letter, previously drawn by the players. The following three were returned in their order of merit: Mr. Wm. Spark, Leeds (G); Mr. W. Parratt, Huddersfield (E); and Mr. Taylor, Gloucester (C). In conjunction with Mr. Henry Smart, of London, Mr. Spark was the designer of the magnificent organ, the beauties of which he will now be enabled to display. The salary is 200*l.* per annum. On Wednesday last a special meeting of the Leeds Town Council was held, when Mr. Spark was appointed organist without a dissentient.

Letter to the Editor.

BEETHOVEN v. PAER.

SIR,—By the timely reprint of Herr Hiller's letter to the Editor of the Niederrheinsche Musik-Zeitung, and by the expression of your opinion thereupon, you have rendered an important service to the cause of the art over whose interests you so jealously watch, to artists generally, and to the memory of the immortal Beethoven in particular.

While fully agreeing with your forcible observation that "every trait which can contribute to an elucidation of Beethoven's character, and to the history of the origin of his works, is welcome,"—yet I cannot refrain from expressing my conviction, that the fashion of hunting up incidents—no matter of how trivial a character—in the lives of great men, is now-a-days carried to a pitch bordering on absurdity. The peculiar features you emphatically make mention of, are assuredly of the utmost value to the student, in aiding him to form a just conception and appreciation of the creations of a master mind. Still, however, it appears to me altogether a mistaken idea, to lay such immense value upon a few desultory words which such minds often (and often wrongly) have attributed to them. Geniuses have ever been, and probably ever will be, subject to the frailties, to the —Thousand and one shocks

That flesh is heir to,

and are just as apt to make slips of the tongue as any one else. Those opinions, however, which, in their undisturbed moments of repose, they, after mutual reflection, have written down for the guidance and edification of posterity, these I maintain cannot be too highly valued, coming as they do from minds peculiarly endowed. This is pre-eminently true of those which are calculated to give us an insight into those exalted regions, where those mighty spirits which engendered them have lived, moved, and had their being. To this side of the picture, Sir, where we see reflected some (no matter how small an atom) of the inward life of the soul, the attention might be a little more earnestly directed, without the affairs relating to the "mortal coil" suffering any disadvantage, and with certain benefit to ourselves and to posterity.

I have been led into these reflections by the seeming importance which has been attached to certain expressions attributed—on M. Hiller's very reliable authority—to Signor Ferdinand Paer,* and who it appears proclaimed them as Beethoven's own words. What M. Paer's object may have been in originating, and M. Berlioz's in recently retailing them, I know not, but presume the former flattered himself that he was chosen by Beethoven as a model. Nothing could have been further from the Amphion's mind. The two operas directly concerned have nothing whatever in common. That of the great German tone-poet, being a thing of beauty, is a thing of joy for ever, while Signor Paer's, being written for the mode, died with the mode. The dazzling brightness of the one has completely obscured the other, or as M. Fétis,† in speaking of these two identical operas, says, the one has completely fait oublier the other. If, therefore, this was Paer's idea, he has been most miserably deceived. If it was not, perhaps M. Hiller can tell us what conclusions he supposes Paer intended his assertions to suggest. Whatever may have been his motives, his assurance has served at least one good purpose—that of provoking investigation for the truth.

Regardless of the axiom Veritas odium parit, I have taken the trouble to seek for some confirmation of Paer's statements. Having searched where it was most likely to be found, and having found nothing to strengthen, but everything to weaken them, I have come to the conclusion in my own mind, that the whole thing is a mere fabrication, a weak invention of Signor Paer. My faith in his veracity is, at any rate, by no means so strong as M. Ferdinand Hiller's. Before proceeding to lay before your readers the grounds on which my suppositions are based, I will, for safety's sake, cry out with Gretchen :—

"Gott verzeih' mir es, wenn ich ihm Unrecht thue!"

And now to the facts of the case, to get at which I have had to wade through a mass of evidence,—some of it, I must confess, contradictory enough. In the first place, then, Beethoven's biographers (J. A. Schlosser,‡ Marx,§ Schindler‖) take no notice whatever of any such circumstance, a very unlikely proceeding if there were any truth in it. In the second place, Paer's Leonore was never performed at all till the end of 1824, in Dresden,* where he wrote it. At this time, according to Marx,† Beethoven was deeply engaged in the composition of his Fidelio (Leonore). If a Vienna correspondent of the Leipziger Allegemeine Musikalische Zeitung (1809, p. 383) is to be credited, Paer's opera was performed (with little success) for the first time in Vienna, in January 1809! Thirdly and lastly, Beethoven was too deaf, long before Paer composed Leonore, to be (orally) capable of judging either of its good or its bad points. His own words are, in a letter addressed to Wegeler, dated 29 Juni 1800‡:—"Mein Gehör ist seit drei Yahren immer Schächer geworden.....Ich kann sagen, I bringe mein Leben elend zu. Seit zwei Yahren fast meide ich alle Zesellschaften, weil mir nicht nügl ichist, den Leuten zu sagen: ich bin taub.§ Riess‖ relates, too, that two years later (1802), during a walk through the fields with Beethoven, he wished to call his attention to the songs of the feathered tribe, to the murmuring of the rippling brook, &c. and Beethoven listened, and listened in vain! He was living in a world where he heard no songs but those which his own highly-endowed imagination called forth, and where he heard the murmuring of no waters save those which he was destined to shed in tears of sorrow!

* * * * * *

This is the clear state of the case, so far as I have been able to make it out. The conflicting statements to which allusion has been made have reference more or less to the date of both operas. I have only space for one or two examples. Treitschke gives the close of 1804 as the time when Beethoven commenced composing Fidelio (Es war Ende, &c.)¶ Marx, on the contrary, says Beethoven devoted himself almost exclusively to this his only opera, for two whole years (1804 and 1805). The Leipziger report above alluded to, and Schilling,†† both give 1804 as the year in which Paer's opera first came to light, whereas Fétis, who prefaces his list of Paer's compositions with the words—Je crois que la liste suivante des ouvrages de ce compositeur est complète—gives the year 1805. This, however, notwithstanding M. Fétis's assurance of perfection, is at variance with all the other authorities.

It is my good fortune to know one gentleman who could clear up all doubts in the matter, and that is M. Thayer, a literary gentleman of Boston (America), and one well known in musical circles. To my certain knowledge he is now engaged at Vienna, in collecting materials for a biography of Beethoven, to which "labour of love" he has devoted many years, and in which commendable undertaking the whole musical world must I am sure heartily wish him God speed!

It is to be hoped M. Thayer will give us the benefit of his research and experience, for I feel certain the subject will interest him, and that he is not less alive to the import of the great and glorious truism—

Magna est veritas, et prævalebit—

Than, Sir, yours, &c.

STRONG PREJUDICE AND WEAK JUDGMENT.

A certain author having written a poem on the attributes of the Deity, in which to assist his attempt, and make it as worthy of its great name as he could, he introduced sentences from the Scriptures to impart strength to his verses, making only such alterations as were necessary to fit the measure and rhyme with their preceding lines. Being desirous to have the judgment of a friend well up in languages and literature, he lent it to him, begging of him to give his candid opinion on its merits when they met again, observing, that he would not be offended if he cut it up "root and branch," providing he gave his real opinion on its good or bad qualities. The friend meeting him a few days after, to his astonishment praised his poem to an extent his own modesty would not allow him on any account to imagine it worth; and afterwards showing it to another friend, he not only found fault with it, but commenced reading to certain persons present the scripture quotations, in which he gave evident proofs by ridiculing the extracts that he understood them not, knowing little or nothing of "the oracles of God," but professing to be a writer of plays and poems of a secular character.

†† Universal-Lexicon der Tonkunst.

The author knowing the lines the other found fault with to be sublime quotations, could not at first understand how he could possibly speak disrespectfully of them, and suspecting the self-wise critic was more influenced by prejudice than a calm deliberate judgment, he resolved to ascertain by playing on his ignorance. Accordingly, he transcribed a fine poem by a poet and scholar, whose merits no one could call in question, and putting it into his hands, observed, "You cut up my poem on the attributes of the Deity, perhaps this will please you better." The critic, not knowing the work, and supposing it to be the other's production, glanced over it and found fault with some of the lines, asserting they were not in accordance with sound sense; when, on being asked who he supposed to be the author, he replied, "You." On being informed to the contrary, and fairly caught by his own censure, he twisted about, and glancing at the copy a second time, pretended not to have read it with sufficient attention in the first instance to enable him to discern its beauties, but now they began to unfold themselves to his perception, that escaped his discrimination when the poem was first put into his hands.

Application. — When a new candidate for public patronage appears on the list, should he introduce an original train of thoughts and style never before attempted, he has to contend with the ignorance and strong prejudice of the public besides that of the paid critics, who as often betray their own ignorance of its beauties as the public who look up to their supposed superior judgment as a guide to their own.

The first printed criticisms on Hamlet and Macbeth (Oxberry's dramatic and musical anecdotes) concluded their severe censures by advising "Mr. William Shakspeare not to attempt writing plays, but to return to his former occupation of holding the horses' reins at the theatre door, as he will never succeed."

Likewise, when the composer Beethoven's first work for the pianoforte — variations to a march — was reviewed in the first German musical journal of the day, Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, our deep penetrating critic would not allow that he possessed a talent for composing "even variations of any merit; that harshness of modulation with a constant struggle to be original were his besetting sins." The sequel has shown how much these two would-be infallible judges were wrong in their opinions, as both the poet and musician have proved to the world whether they possessed any talent or not in their respective arts. Were critics to allow a new candidate to chance his success with the public, his works would stand or fall by their own intrinsic worth. It is an unfortunate drawback to fresh authors, that if they beat out a new track no preceding one ever trod, they have to wait till a better acquaintance with their peculiarities enables the public to feel the power of their charms, and too often the poor author is censured while living, and pines in obscurity, when after his removal from the scene of his labours out of the reach of praise or abuse, they find out his merits, discovering beauties that when first offered to their notice appeared to be so many absurd attempts.—From Forty-two Fables chiefly for Young Persons, by Haydn Wilson.

THE CUCKOO.

THE notes of this peculiar member of the feathered tribe must be familiar to all whose pleasure it has ever been to know the delights of a fine Spring day spent in roaming through the bright green fields and along the quiet pathways of the verdant country, so fresh and beautiful at that time of the year. The cuckoo has ever been a favourite. Notwithstanding that his dealings with other birds have been often exposed as most dishonourable, poets (disregarding, as is their wont, the failings of private life) have apostrophised the bird in the most flattering manner, as "Sweet Harbinger of Spring," "Beauteous Stranger of the Wood," and what not. He is the most noticeable amongst the birds who announce the arrival of Spring, the advent of bright sunshine and flowers, after the cold and dreary time of Winter; and the herald of such a change could hardly fail to be heard with pleasure. As soon as the daisy and primrose deck the green fields and the brooksides, the woods echo his voice and sing his welcome:

"Delightful visitant! with thee
We hail the time of flowers,
When heaven is filled with music sweet
Of birds." * * *

The almost comical peculiarity of his vocal performances (which—like those of some of our touring concert parties—are the same on every occasion) have in some measure, no doubt, contributed to gain him admirers; in fact, it would be difficult to find any one to whom the sound of the cuckoo is a positive grievance. The toiling husbandman or shepherd in the fields loves to hear him speak from the tree or bush; and, as he creeps unwillingly along,

"The schoolboy wandering in the wood,
To pull the flowers so gay,
Starts — that curious voice to hear,
And imitates the lay."

The cuckoo is a bird of passage; and when he departs for the enjoyment of a second Spring in other climes, while we remain to experience the vicissitudes of our own ever-changing climate, we are fain to admit that his voice is missed in the daily concert of the feathered songsters, and that his reappearance amongst us would be no unwelcome event.

Musical composers have frequently introduced the cuckoo's song into compositions intended to represent pastoral scenery, and often with much effect. We may recall instances in Beethoven's great Pastoral Symphony; Atterbury's old glee, "Come let us all a maying go" (in which the ringing of bells and the singing of our bird are very prettily combined); and Haydn's comical "Toy Symphony." In the latter instance, however, the cuckoo is one of those curious toys which are often seen on the continent, and which are familiar to us as adjuncts to the little wooden clocks made by the Dutch, which never announce the hour except to the accompaniment of what is really a very fair imitation of the notes of the natural bird.

There is some difference of opinion as to what are the real pitch and interval of the notes of the cuckoo: some affirming them to be a major third (as E to C, downwards), others insisting on the minor third (as E flat to C). It has also been asserted that at the commencement of the season he chants his lay in the bright interval known to musicians as the "major third;" sinking, by degrees (from relaxation of the vocal organs), to the sombre and mellow harmony of the "minor third," as the season draws to its close.

Although it is possible that each particular cuckoo—like each particular human bird—may have his own peculiar vocal capabilities, and measure of musical talent (some being gifted with a greater exactitude of ear than others); and that they may range, perchance, in compass from high soprano to contralto, and even counter-tenor cuckoos, yet I must own that I have never heard their double "coo" except as a "major third;" and that at nearly one uniform pitch, viz. F and D flat; as I have proved by applying to it, on several occasions, the test of a tuning-fork of modern scale. On the other hand it must be remarked, that in Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony the cuckoo's notes stand as a major third at the pitch D to B flat, whilst Atterbury, in his glee above-mentioned, appears particular in adhering to the minor third.

As a disproof to the supposition above-named, about the sinking of the voice towards the end of the season, I may remark, in conclusion, that I have found the contrary to be the case. A bird of some ability as a cuckoo, whom I heard at the close of the season, seemed to be at much trouble in disproving such a theory. He, with a determination worthy of a concert-singer, boldly sang his upper F too sharp, and thus formed a tierce so much like an "augmented third," and so much out of tune, that I was fain to presume that he had recently attended some concert or other—or to consider him a strong advocate, on principle, of that system of tuning (or, as some will have it, putting out of tune) known as "Equal Temperament."

ARTHUR SEYMOUR SULLIVAN.—Of the Second Examination in the Conservatorio of Leipsig, the Leipziger Journal (May 26th) writes:—"To-day's examination was devoted partly to composition, partly to ensemble-playing. With regard to the former, we rejoiced in discovering in young Sullivan a talent to whom with earnest study one may promise a good future. His 'Ouverture,' although a little lengthened, was aiming with well-chosen means and full consciousness at a certain end, and mastering the expression. That he frequently consulted Mendelssohn, we will not lay to his charge, as it would be looking for impossibilities if we expected originality in such first attempts." The General Anzeiger (May 27th), adds the subjoined:—"Still more applause was given to the Ouverture composed by Mr. Arthur Seymour Sullivan, from London, to Moore's Rose-festival in 'Lalla Rookh,' which in the spirit of the present time carried us with all the charm of the poem to the fields of Persia, and justifies us to great hopes for the young composer. Mr. Sullivan conducted his own music." Mr. Sullivan is the Mendelssohn scholar sent by the Committee of the Mendelssohn Testimonial Fund to pursue his musical studies at Leipsic.

SIGNAL ACT OF BENEVOLENCE ON THE PART OF MR. COSTA.

The following is from the pen of the grateful recipient of the renowned maestro's charity: —

COSTA.

"Celsâ sedet Æolus arce Sceptra tenens, mollitque animos, et temperat iras."—Æneid.

It is known to the original members that, until the third year after its birth, the Musical Union gave no decided promise of longevity, and the Director's Matinée was therefore an object of vital importance to its very existence. The prosperity that now crowns my labours, in having reared this once fluctuating and precarious offspring to robust health and maturity, does not make me unmindful of the past; and there is no act of professional sympathy which I recollect with more satisfaction and grateful remembrance than the personal attendance of Costa at the Director's Grand Matinée, with his golden tribute at the door in support of the institution, then in its infancy. Now that I am retired from orchestral service, I can mention this trait of Costa's generosity without being accused of servile adulation; and will also add, that by similar acts of kindly feeling towards those under his bâton, he has permanently and deservedly secured their affections.—Musical Sketches. J. ELLA.

If the Director of the Musical Union would be as "mindful" of others among his early benefactors, his "fluctuating and precarious offspring" would fare none the worse.

THE JACOBOURTCH FAMILY had the honour of performing at the Great Jesuit College, Stonyhurst, on Thursday, to upwards of 400 professors and students (Mad. Jacobourtch was the only lady present, and the first professional lady performer who ever appeared there). Owing to the approbation elicited by the performance, M. Jacobourtch has been honoured with a testimonial from the professors.

ANSWER OF THE ORPHÉONISTES OF FRANCE TO THE ADDRESS OF THE FRIENDS OF PEACE.*—Gentlemen and Brothers,—We are profoundly grateful for the cordial welcome we have received in England, and especially for the words of sympathy which our visit has elicited from yourselves. Before we set foot on English soil there was already between us a reciprocity of sentiment and a union of hearts; we understood each other on either side of the Channel; and the harmonious sounds which echoed through the Crystal Palace during our four concerts were little more than the brilliant epilogue of this intimate alliance between the two peoples. The essentially pacific mission of the Orphéon was, therefore, likely to be best appreciated by you, whose generous and persevering efforts must inevitably bear their fruits in the future. The cause which you advocate is too holy not to awaken a universal response; wherefore we esteemed ourselves happy to be the first to re-echo with you on British soil the cry of union and fraternity which is the device of your powerful and admirable institution. The French Orphéon is a work of recent creation; it derives its strength from liberty of association. Under the banners adorned with the emblems of harmony, concord, and peace, all classes of society are represented by some of their most honoured members. England will certainly know how to appreciate the good and noble influences of those fraternal sentiments which we leave behind us in England and take back with us into France—we three thousand singers, selected from that family which already numbers forty thousand performers, and which has associated with itself, in the work it is doing, the most celebrated artistes of our country, and has won the sympathies of the whole nation. Be assured, gentlemen, that we shall always cherish the remembrance of your fraternal reception; the record of this international demonstration will ever live in our hearts. In the midst of our countrymen, in the bosom of our families—in private as in public life—we shall in future be the sincere fellow-workers with the Committee of the Friends of Peace. Union and solidarity between France and England, and such henceforth shall be the rallying cry of the Orphéonistes. In the name of the Orphéons and Choral Societies of France.—Eugene Delaporte, Director of the Festival. London, July 2, 1860.

PORPORA, one of the most illustrious composers of Italy, entertained a great feeling of friendship for a young man, a pupil of his. He asked his youthful acquaintance whether he thought he possessed courage enough to follow constantly the road he, Porpora, traced out for him, however wearisome it might appear. On receiving an affirmative reply, Porpora wrote down, upon a piece of ruled paper, the diatonic and chromatic scales, both ascending and descending, skips of thirds, fourths, fifths, &c., to teach him to master the intervals, and sustain the sound, besides shakes, groups, appogiaturi, and other vocal exercises of various kinds. This one sheet of paper furnished both master and pupil occupation for a year; the following year also was devoted to it. The pupil began to murmur, but the master reminded him of his promise. The fourth year passed, the fifth year followed, and still there was the same eternal sheet of paper. Even during the sixth year it was not given up, though lessons in articulation, pronunciation, and declamation were added. At the end of the year, the pupil, who thought he was only engaged on the elements of his art, was surprised at hearing his master say, "There, my dear boy, you have nothing more to learn; you are the first singer in Italy." Porpora spoke the truth, for the singer was Caffarelli.

HANDEL was frequently subject to violent fits of rage, especially when his amour-propre was hurt. But this nervous excitement was almost instantly appeased. Mad. Cuzzoni one day informed him that she would not sing his air of Otton, "Falsa imagine." "Oh! you refuse to sing it, do you!" exclaimed the composer, "we will see!" With these words he suddenly seized hold of the prima donna round the body, and, opening the window, pretended he was going to throw her out, "I will sing it," cried the affrighted vocalist, "I will sing it!" "That is the best thing you can do," replied Handel, while his face resumed its former serenity, and thus speaking, he carefully put her down. On another occasion, when about to conduct the rehearsal of his admirable Te Deum, composed for the peace of Utrecht, Handel exclaimed with enthusiasm, before commencing, "Gentlemen, whoever makes a fault is a wretch!" The excellence of the performance and the beauty of his own work excited him so much, that he stopped entranced, and forgot to mark time. Some one directed his attention to the fact. Handel, greatly agitated, waited till the conclusion of the Te Deum, and then exclaimed, "Gentlemen, it is I myself who am a wretch!"

* Presented by a Deputation from the Friends of Peace, at the Crystal Palace, on Saturday morning, June 30.

NEW SONGS by J. W. DAVISON, "Rough wind that moanest loud" (sung by Mr. Santley at the Monday Popular Concerts); "Swifter far than Summer's flight," (sung by Miss Palmer at the Monday Popular Concerts); "False friend, wilt thou smile or weep," Beatrice's song in the Cenci (sung by Madame Sainton-Dolby, at the Monday Popular Concerts, St. James's Hall); are published by Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201 Regent Street.

The above Songs form Nos. 1, 2, and 3 of Vocal Illustrations of Shelley.

"Mr. Santley was encored in one of the thoroughly picturesque and poetical settings of Shelley, by Mr. J. W. Davison, mentioned a week or two since. His song, 'Rough wind that moanest loud,' is a thoroughly good song."—Athenæum.

"Madame Sainton-Dolby's greatest efforts were called forth by Mendelssohn's 'Night' song, and Mr. J. W. Davison's 'False friend, wilt thou smile or weep' (from Shelley's 'Cenci'), to both of which she did the amplest justice. The latter work is one of the most poetical and beautiful of the 'Vocal Illustrations of Shelley,' composed by Mr. Davison many years ago, and which, though rarely heard, possess far more sterling merit than nine-tenths of the most admired songs of the day. A more intellectual treatment of the words could not well be imagined. Mr. Davison has completely caught the spirit of the poetry, and heightened its beauty by the potent charms which belong only to the sister art. 'False friend, wilt thou smile or weep,' sung to perfection by Madame Sainton-Dolby, was enthusiastically applauded."

MUSIC AND THEATRES IN PARIS.

July 11, 1860.

NOTHING of any commanding interest has occurred in the operatic world. At the Grand Opéra, Les Huguenots has been revived for M. Urcart, the Belgian tenor of whom I wrote a short time since. He still maintains the favourable impression he created in William Tell, and people seem to think he will be permanently engaged. By the way, the "normal diapason" now established at the Grand Opéra does not work over well, and is especially obnoxious to the bass singers. The "Pif-paf," for instance, is, with the new pitch, in some parts beyond the range of any but the most exceptional voices. The character of the music is also considerably modified by the change, and in some instances, as for example, the air of the "Couvre Feu," loses not a little of its original colour.

The manager of the Opéra-Comique has done a famous stroke of business for his establishment by the engagement of M. Roger, whose return to the scene of his early triumphs will no doubt be hailed with delight by the frequenters of this house. The round of characters he created here with such marked success, await his touch to revive with all their original freshness and charm, and after the Midsummer glories of the Grand Opéra, which some say he had better never have struggled for, he will glide calmly and gently into a sort of "latter spring." Mad. Faure (the wife of Faure now engaged at your Royal Italian Opera) and Mad. Ugalde are also re-engaged, but the presence of these ladies is too familiar, and their talents have been too exhaustively reconnoitred by the audiences of the Opéra-Comique, to cause the announcement to be received with much enthusiasm. Mad. Ugalde has already re-appeared in Galathée, and it is just to say that her reception was in the highest degree flattering. Mad. Faure will not make her re-entrée till next week, in Boieldieu's Petit Chaperon Rouge.

M. A. Dumas' (senior) new comedy, of which I gave you some account, L'Envêrs d'une Conspiration, produced at the Vandeville, has been withdrawn for the present, and three little comedies in one act by way of small change have been substituted. The first is Le Trésor de Blaise, by M. Eugéne Muller, a young author who has already distinguished himself. The subject is pastoral, not however of the conventional style of the Opéra-Comique, but a real and genuine picture of rustic life. The second is entitled Toute Seule, and is by MM. Plouvier and J. Adenis; and the third La Femme doit suivre son mari. They are both pleasant little pieces and well acted.

A grand military spectacle, called Le Bataillon de la Moselle, and distributed into thirteen tableaux (significant subject! ominous number!) has just been produced at the Théâtre-Imperial du Cirque. The vicissitudes of the band of republican heroes who fought in rags and wooden shoes under old Moreau was a good subject to flatter the patriotism and military ardour of the nation, and the time for such a production is artfully chosen when their Imperial chief is casting greedy glances towards the Rhenish frontier. The matter is not however very skilfully treated, and is encumbered with some hacknied plot in which a number of the exiled French nobility at Coblentz take part. The constant alternation from the tumult of battle to tedious conversations in gilded saloons is anything but artistic, and produces a most monotonous effect. Neither has much pains been taken in getting up the spectacle, in which old properties and costumes are worked up with sublime indifference to their adaptation to the subject or period. The enemy conquered at Valny, for instance, appears in the Austrian uniform. Nevertheless, the effect of the ragged soldiery in wooden clogs, "pursbuing of their shindies, upon Moselle shore" is very picturesque and inspiriting. Whether it will make the people in love with a Rhenish expedition is another matter.

At the Gaité there has been produced a new drame, in five acts, after the fashion of the Bohemiens de Paris. It is entitled La Petite Pologne, which is the designation of a locality inhabited by a population of petty hawkers, itinerant vendors, rag pickers, kennel rakers, and all who pursue those nameless avocations in the public street which form the social stratum immediately above absolute mendicity. Instead of making this mode of life, as in the first-named piece, however, the training-school of crime, the authors of the new drama attribute to the inhabitants of La Petite Pologne the candour, simplicity, and virtue of the golden age. The picture may not be drawn with photographic fidelity to nature, but at any rate it is not sickening and repulsive, as are the representations of low life sometimes produced by those who pique themselves on their realism, and as much good is no doubt done by seeing what these poor creatures might be, as what they really are. The story which is unwound in this locality, and amidst this phase of society, is a common-place-enough affair, in which there is a convict killed in the first act, and that convict's son, an amiable youth, extending a protecting arm over an innocent little flower girl, the daughter of one of his father's victims.

Among the small items of intelligence interesting to your musical readers, I may mention the engagement of M. Nilmann, the German tenor, for a short period, at the Grand Opéra. He is engaged expressly to sing in the Tannhauser of Richard Wagner. Mlle. Tedesco will return to the Opéra in September, and make her first appearance in Le Prophète. She is afterwards to play Olympia in Herculanum. I hear also that Meyerbeer is expected to arrive in Paris very shortly.

One or two letters which I have received from Italian correspondents enable me to furnish you with a few scraps of news as to what is going on at the principal theatres in the land of song. At Genoa there have been several performances for the benefit of the Fund in support of the Sicilian Insurrection. The last deserves especial notice as being signalised by the appearance of the celebrated Signor Tamburini. He sang the cavatina from La Sonnambula, the duo in Il Barbière, and the air of Maometto. His reception was enthusiastic; the applause which greeted him being no less addressed to the patriotic Italian citizen than to the celebrated singer. His vocalisation was marvellous, and took all by surprise, for the ear is no longer accustomed to such a deluge of trills and runs as was poured forth from the singer's throat with the most perfect ease. After the first effects of astonishment had subsided, bursts of applause followed one upon the other, and positively overwhelmed the last representative of the old florid school of Italian singing. Tamburini did not, however, exhaust the appreciative power of the audience, who in turn awarded to Signor Agrone and to Signora Parodi, and to all the other artists and dilettanti, who contributed their services on the occasion, their due meed of applause. Signor Bottesini has been engaged at La Scala, in Milan, where he is to produce his opera L'Assedio di Firenza, and Mad. Fiorentini is engaged to play the principal part. The San Carlo, at Naples, is not in a very satisfactory condition. I Foscari, lately produced there with Guicciardi, met with a cool reception from the inferiority of the execution, and a few days after Don Pasquale encountered a complete fiasco.

The sisters Ferni have been giving a concert at Parma, where their admirable talents have been duly appreciated. The programme for the autumnal season at the Opera of Bologna contains the names of the following artists: — Mesds. Borghi-Mamo and Luigia Gavetti-Regiani, and MM. Lodovico Graziani, Antonio Morelli, Mario Ghidi. M. Rota is the ballet master, and the principal danseuse Mlle. Adelina Plunkett. Signor Beneventano, the barytone, is engaged for the approaching season at Trieste. A propos of Italian singers, there is a paragraph in a French theatrical paper announcing the return to Paris of Mr. Lumley from a voyage of discovery in the Italian peninsula. The object of his search has been an artist of that peculiar transcendant class such as, according to the journalist, he has a special patent for unearthing and bringing to light. The amiable ex-manager is, in the complaisant imagination of the writer, represented as periodically taking dips in the Hadriatic of Italian lyrical art, and after a period of breathless suspense and fear lest he should never be seen or heard of again, triumphantly emerging with a pearl of price such as Cleopatra would not disdain to dissolve and drink off as in that draft of early purl recorded in history. This feat he has again accomplished; but the journalist, and perhaps the diver also (for diver's reasons) mysteriously say mum as to the name of the newly-discovered treasure who is to keep up the succession of prodigies of which Jenny Lind and Piccolomini have been such bright links. I have no reason, however, for concealing the fact that the newly fished-up virtuosa is Mlle. Galetti.

Mlle. Kenneth, whom your theatrical readers will better identify as the daughter of "little Kenneth," erst the proprietor of the well-known "little shop" at the corner of Bow Street, where many dramatic wits and theatrical stars were once wont to lounge and exchange the newest coinage of the mint of mirth and fancy, has just returned from a successful engagement in Spain, notably at Madrid, where she sang with Tamberlik, and at Barcelona. Mlle. Kenneth has been trained in the traditions of the old Italian school of grand opera; her vocalisation is excellent, and she possesses the power of dramatic expression.

I hear from Pesth that the Italian Opera has commenced there. Norma, with Mlle. Lagrua as the Druid priestess, has produced quite a sensation. This lady is described as remarkably beautiful, and as possessing a voice of pure and rich quality, with a sympathetic character quite thrilling in its effect. Her presence is noble and graceful, and exactly suited to the heroines of the lyrical drama; and both by her acting and broad grand style of vocalising, exercises an extraordinary power over her audience. How is it neither Paris nor London have hitherto had the benefit of this artist's vaunted ability? How has she escaped Lumley the pearl-fisher? did he dive not deep enough, or too deep?

The Imperial Theatre of St. Petersburg has secured Signor Graziani, the barytone, for two years, commencing next season. The contract was only signed last Thursday. Mad. Rita Bemardi Fabricca, the wife of the Maestro Fabricca, an admirable singer, and moreover a very pretty person, is also engaged at St. Petersburg, for the third time. She is now in London, having left Paris a short time since. Mlle. Lotti della Santa has just passed through Paris on her way back from London to her country house in the environs of Milan. There is some talk of Mad. Miolan-Carvalho taking an engagement at the Royal Lisbon Theatre. Signor Fabricca's visit to London gives some colour to this rumour, as he is charged with organising the operatic troupe for the San Carlos at Lisbon.

I have the melancholy intelligence to record of the death of the pianist and composer, Goria. It is reported that he has not left any money behind him. This is strange, for it is known that large sums were made by his compositions. One publisher confessed to realising 3000 francs a year by one piece alone, and his nocturne and étude in E flat produced a profit of 30,000 francs—that is to say, the publishers! Sic vos non vobis! oh luckless herd of scribblers, whether musical or literary.

MUSIC IN RUSSIA.

THERE was a certain Mongik named Ivan. Without consulting Ivan's inclination, his master placed him in the Conservatory, where the professors, according to custom, first taught him to "sol-fa." When he was considered sufficiently advanced in that branch of art, it was unanimously decided that, as there was a want of clarinet-players, he should study the clarinet, and he was consequently admitted into a special class. The hour fixed for the first lesson having arrived, he took his place among his comrades, all drawn up after the military fashion, like troops without their arms, their heels close together, their toes well turned out, and their thumbs touching the seams of their trousers. Ivan remained perfectly motionless, but his comrades stepped out, one after the other, from the ranks, to practise upon their clarinets, from which there issued a host of notes out of tune. The second lesson went off in exactly the same manner.

"What is the reason," enquired the Professor, "that you do not try like the rest?"

"Because they have not given me a clarinet," replied Ivan.

That same evening the Professor wrote to the proper authority, explaining the posture of affairs, and requesting the funds necessary for the acquisition of the coveted object. The funds were granted, but as in Russia the control exercised over the national expenditure is illusory, the result was that the money, having to pass from hand to hand, was lost on the road, and Ivan waited a very long time in the predicament already described. At last, one day, after the hours devoted to study, he said to his Professor—

"Is it not soon coming?"

"What?"

"The clarinet."

"I have asked for it and am expecting it every day."

"Suppose you renewed your request?"

"That is against the rules."

Ivan had, consequently, no clarinet during the eight years he stopped at the Conservatory. When his period of study had thus expired, and his certificate been obtained, he was immediately admitted, by right, into a theatre, as second-clarinet player. He had his place assigned him in the orchestra, where he found a stool, some music, and a desk, but not the slightest signs of an instrument. Under these circumstances, he went up to his conductor, and said,

"Where is it?"

"Where is what?"

"Why, the clarinet."

"That is no business of mine. They ought to have provided you with one."

Thus, every evening, Ivan seated himself on his stool, before his desk, and turned over the leaves of his part, though he never played a note. At the conclusion of the performance he packed up his things and retired, like those around him, wiping his forehead. At the expiration of six years of punctuality, according to the prescribed rules, he was raised to the rank of first clarinet, and for eight more continued to perform his new duties with all the zeal of assiduity, that is to say, without missing one performance, coming early and leaving late. Some curious amateurs used to remark, however, that this instrumentalist invariably forgot to bring his instrument. At last, the period for his retirement arrived. It was found, by reference to the books, that he had always done his duty punctually, without ever having subjected himself to a fine, and so his pension was fixed at 900 roubles a-year, a sum which he has received up to the present day. It is not necessary to test the truth of the foregoing, but we wish to defend the conduct of a country, which for ages has made enormous sacrifices for artists, without caring about their origin, and thus endeavouring to improve the natural taste for music.

In Russia, every one sings. The singing of the Russian infantry is especially deserving of notice. In each company, a selection is made of the soldiers possessing the greatest natural aptitude. These men are charged with the task of forming the choruses. When the commander of a battalion perceives his troops are exhausted, after a long march, he orders the singers to place themselves at the head of the column and strike up their national airs. Directly they hear them, the troops forget fatigue, hunger, and thirst. In instrumental music the Russians have obtained results equally worthy of notice. One evening, in 1751, Marshal Narischkin, Grand Intendant of Woods and Forests, after having been out hunting since the morning, was seated at the foot of a rock, listening to the uniform sounds the hunters produced from their brass horns. Near him was the first horn-player in the Imperial service, J. A. Maresch, born in Bohemia, in 1719.

"What are you thinking about?" inquired the Marshal, observing his companion's absent air.

"I was thinking," replied Maresch, "that, if I chose, I could vary those intonations."

"Try," said the Marshal.

The next day, Maresch gave orders for thirty-seven horns of different sizes, comprising a range of three octaves. He entrusted these instruments to certain musicians whom he caused to rehearse on them for a long time, far from any habitation, so that he might be sure of the result, previously to letting them perform in public. When he thought his musicians sufficiently advanced, he solicited permission for them to play before the Court. His prayer was granted, and the Ismailow hunting lodge, near Moscow, was placed at his disposal for the experiment. At the appointed time, the audience enjoyed an extraordinary treat. The horns, perfectly tuned, were so arranged as to furnish, like the pipes of an organ, all the notes necessary for executing any piece with accompaniment. One performer played C, the next D, and so on, their precision being such that all the sounds seemed to proceed from one instrument. The performance was both characteristic and vigorous, and the inventor had not to wait long for reward. Since that time, this branch of the art has made great progress. Tubes twelve feet long have been made for the lowest notes, while others of only a few inches have been manufactured for the highest. There are some chapels, which, instead of an organ, possess an orchestra of this description. The effect is very striking. The performers, drawn up in line, await the moment for playing their particular note, their principal merit consisting in exerting the exact degree of power necessary, so as to produce the effect of only one artist's playing. The system has been adopted for certain choruses. All this, we are perfectly aware, is not art, but we must conclude from it that the Russians are well organised in a musical sense. Their conservatories turn out some remarkable musicians every year. These musicians are subject to the same rules and receive the same instruction as our own. Our methods are also theirs. As for their professors, they are recruited from all parts, provided they possess that grand certificate of merit which Europe assigns to its favourites.

As early as the reign of the Empress Elizabeth, regular choirs executed complicated airs with precision. The musicians of the Imperial Chapel, comprising fifteen sopranos, thirteen contraltos, fourteen tenors, and twelve basses, excited the admiration of all who heard them. Russia was, however, deficient in composers, but instead of being jealous of more favoured nations than herself, she spent her gold by handfuls for the purpose of procuring the services of the greatest masters. At the period in question, Galuppi resided at Venice. He was offered a salary of 4000 roubles, magnificent apartments, and an imperial carriage. Thus solicited, he went to St. Petersburg, where, shortly afterwards, he produced Didone abbandonata, which brought him in a thousand ducats. Duke Charles Ulric, of Holstein-Gottorp, had just arrived with his German chamber musicians. Peter the Great regularly attended his concerts, and even took lessons on the violoncello from one of the performers who pleased him, and whom he presented with a snuff-box mounted with brilliants.

The Empress Anne sent at a great expense for François Araja, a highly-esteemed Neapolitan dramatic composer. Araja produced Abijazare Semiramide, and subsequently, for Elizabeth's coronation, La Clemenza di Tito, by Hasse, as well as La Russia afflita e riconsolata, a dialogue set to music by Dominic Dall' Oglio. For a considerable period he brought out every year some work of his own. For the fêtes given in celebration of the peace with Sweden, he produced Bellerefonte, and, in obedience to the desire of the Empress to have something in Russian, he set actively to work, in collaboration with Sumarkoff, who supplied the book, and was soon enabled to bring out Cephalus and Procris, with the principal national singers, Belgradiski, Gawrila, Marzenkowitz, and Giariluska, as its interpreters. After composing his last lyrical drama for the marriage of the Grand Duke, Peter Federowitz, he set out, loaded with roubles and honours, for Bologna. On entering his native town, he was accosted by two strangers, who, not being able to deprive him of his honours, hoped to rob him, at least, of his roubles. One of them, falling round his neck, said, "Ah! good day, Araja." The other employed the same tactics; and when the composer remarked, "I do not recollect you," they both replied, as if vexed, "Confound it, it appears that a residence in Russia cools the memory as well as the heart. We are Maretto and Palfieri." Araja fancying he was in the presence of old friends, offered them his hand with a smile. Hereupon the two confederates, easing him of the casket, which he was carrying carefully in his arms, fostered, as they went along, his mistake. On turning the corner of a very crowded street, Araja was about to reply to those who had been speaking to him a few minutes previously, when he perceived they had taken to flight. He gave information of the robbery, for the casket contained a large sum, but he never succeeded in discovering the two thieves. Fortunately, some time afterwards, he received from Russia a sum equal to that of which he had been robbed.

The new theatre at Moscow held five thousand spectators. Ranpach, a German composer, had taken the place left vacant by Araja. The Grand-Duke, afterwards Czar, Peter Federowitz, who was passionately fond of music, contributed greatly to its advancement. He took his place among his performers as first violin.

One manager had just introduced to the public a new company of singers. He produced the first opera buffo, with immense success. Another company, which followed his, brought French comic operas, also, into favour. A taste for music was penetrating more and more among the masses. The art soon acquired great popularity after the representation of Manfredini's Olympiade. Italian interludes, with Russian and French comedies, alternated with operas. Starger, of Vienna, conducted the concerts, at which the works of Holzabauer, Stagenseil, Banda, Gluck, Gasmann, &c. were performed. The first attempts of Paësiello had created a sensation throughout Italy. Modena had summoned him to write La Madama umorista, Demetrio, and Artaserse. Parma was indebted to him for Le Virtuose ridicole, Il Negligente, and I Baqui di Abano. Venice had applauded Il Ciarlone, L'Amore in Ballo, and La Pescatrice. Rome, then the dispenser of fame, had proclaimed his genius after the representation of Il Marchese di Tulipano, the translation of which, twenty years afterwards, formed the beginning of the reputation acquired by Martin as a singer. Naples had just paid its homage to the Idolo Cinese, played, by special favour, at the Court theatre, inside the palace itself. Le due Contesse and La Disfatta di Dario had given the finishing touch to the composer's brilliant reputation; and the time had come for Russia to secure him. Advantageous offers were made successively from Vienna, London, and St. Petersburg. Paësiello accepted the offers from the last. He had 9,000 rubles, which then represented the sum of about 30,000 francs. Never had an artist obtained such terms. During the eight years of his stay in Russia, he composed La Serva Padrona, Il Matrimonio inespettato, Il Barbière di Siviglia, I Filosofi imaginari, La Finta amante, written expressly for the interview of Catherine with Joseph II., Il Mondo della Luna, La Ninetta, Lucinda ed Artemidoro, Alcide al Bivio, and Achille in Sciro, without counting cantatas for Prince Potemkin, farces for Prince Orloff, and pianoforte pieces for the Grand-Duchess Maria Federowna. At Warsaw he composed his oratorio, Le Passione, on the poem of Metastasio, for King Poniatowski. Presents poured in on him from all sides.

From 1785 to 1801, Sarti was musical director at the Russian Court. One of his first works at St. Petersburg, was a psalm in the language of the country, in which he hit upon the ingenious notion of adding to the principal band a second band of Russian horns. Subsequently, he composed a Te Deum, on the capture of Ocsakow, introducing among the instruments those famous cannons which still exist, and endeavouring to give to the concerted pieces a character of savage grandeur. His Armide e Rinaldo was enthusiastically received. Sarti considered himself secure from every attack. The great caressed him, and inferior persons never approached him but with the greatest respect. In this state of things he engaged a Portuguese lady for the part of Amida. Mad. Todi, for such was her name, met with so encouraging a reception, even on the night of her first appearance, that the Empress made her a present of a diamond necklace, and an intimacy soon sprang up between the two. Mad. Todi, however, took advantage of her influence to injure the composer, to whom she owed her position. She spoke so strongly and so effectually against him, that the Empress dismissed him. Sarti complained to Potemkin, whom he had succeeded in securing as his patron. As a recompense for his reverse, Potemkin gave him a certain village in Ukraine, famous for the number of its inhabitants with fine voices. In this village, Sarti laid the foundation of a school of singing, of which he was appointed director, with the title of lieutenant-major in the Imperial army. Potemkin died in 1791. Sarti then returned to St. Petersburg, and justified his conduct to the Empress, who presented him with fifteen thousand roubles, as a recompense for an accusation which she owned was unmerited. She restored him to his position, with a large salary, and gave him apartments in her own palace. She charged him, moreover, with the task of establishing a Conservatory of Music, at Katarinaslow, on the model of the schools in Italy. When his pupils had made some progress, Catherine II. showed her gratitude for one who had endowed her country with such an institution by raising him to the first rank of nobility, and bestowing on him considerable estates.

Sarti invented an instrument capable of determining the number of vibrations produced by a sound in one second. His remarkable labours in acoustics procured his admission to the Academy of Science at St. Petersburg. According to Fétis, "this machine, founded upon an experiment previously made by Sauveur, consisted of two closed organ pipes, five feet long, one of which had a moveable plug, a monocord, and a second-pendulum. When, according to a graduated scale, the plug of the one pipe was driven in, so as to raise the intonation, a beat, resulting from the dissonance, and allowing the vibrations to be counted, was established between the two pipes. The monocord served to find the required intonation on the pipe and the moveable plug, and by the second-pendulum the time in which the vibrations were produced was known. It was by this process that the author succeed in discovering the number of 436 vibrations in the A of the diapason of the St. Petersburg orchestra.

In 1802, Haydn's Creation was performed at the St. Petersburg theatre. Mozart, Grétry, Beethoven, and Boïeldieu obtained, respectively, their share of roubles and admiration.

We now enter upon the period of our contemporaries. As we all know, the Emperor Nicholas made great sacrifices for musicians. He sent for singers from all points of the compass. On the evening of their first appearance the Emperor used familiarly to offer his hand to the artists behind the scenes. The nobility did not fail to follow their sovereign's example. As the Emperor gave largely, the nobility gave enormously. The most celebrated instrumentalists gain their reputation in Paris and London, but their fortune in Russia. Every one is acquainted with the story of the singer who was under the necessity of accepting a portrait of herself drawn by a boyard. The drawing was not worth a doit, the frame was a somewhat rude wooden one, and the glass was not free from blemishes, which disfigured it. But — at the back, to prevent the dust from getting under the glass, there were pasted two bank notes, each for a hundred thousand francs.

Thus we perceive that if Russia has not yet sent her composers into the lists to contend with those of other nations, she, at least, does what she can to encourage all persons of talent, without any false spirit of nationality. Music is her favourite source of enjoyment. She has her conservatories properly organised, her various theatres, her choruses, of irreproachable correctness, and splendid voices everywhere, just as Italy has; while, to continue the impulse given by past ages, she sows a great deal of gold to reap a moderate harvest.

MADAME CLARA NOVELLO.

(Concluded.)

We all remember the political disturbances that convulsed Europe in 1848; we have all had more or less opportunity of personally observing how every class of society, from the crown to the foot — from kings and emperors and the Pope himself to lazzaroni and chartists — was affected by them. Art was not uninfluenced, nor those who minister to its progress, by these terrible social distractions, and Mad. Novello, like her co-labourer in the cause of beauty, Mad. Sontag, experienced their effects to such an extent as induced her to retrace her steps from the honoured retirement of the privacy in which she had been living to the equally honourable activity of her public career. She re-appeared in Italy, Germany, Spain, and England, renewing everywhere her former success, and refreshing the memory which had never faded of her former merit. Her powers were in every respect improved by the maturity which her few years of absence from her profession had wrought upon her physical and moral nature, and all Europe has acknowledged her voice to surpass every other in power, purity, and brightness.

Mad. Novello is now about to secede, for a second time, from the exercise of her artistic functions, and her retirement from the public will now be positively final, as the circumstances of the noble house of which marriage has made her a member, having withstood the shock of the most recent and greatest troubles in Italy, are no longer dependent on the vicissitudes of political fortune, and could even her affairs be again involved in the troubles of the time, she has bound herself under a heavy penalty never to sing again in public after her coming farewell.

Mad. Novello is best known in the south of Europe as a dramatic singer,— best in the north for her excellence in the concert-room,—best here, her native home, for her interpretation of the works of the great sacred masters; but, were it not for her all-surpassing reputation in this highest branch of her art, the admiration she has won in England alone on the stage and in the concert room would be sufficient to prove her one of the most distinguished vocalists that have ever sung our language. The speciality of English vocal music consists in our ballads, which require certain peculiarities in the singer, and these of a refined, poetical, and truly exalted character that have scarcely, if ever, been displayed by foreigners; our English pride, then, in our English songstress must not be unmindful of her interpretation of such ditties as "John Anderson," "Auld Robin Gray," and "The beating of my own heart," which last she was the first person who sung?

To give due resplendency to the setting of this sun of song, a party comprising the most attractive and most various talent of the day is engaged to accompany her on her farewell tour, and serve as clouds to catch and reflect the golden glory of her brightness. We are fortunately able to enumerate the purposed partners of her last adieu, and we cannot more appropriately nor more interestingly conclude this account of her career than by giving the names of those who are to share the lustre of its close.

The cloud of first importance may be regarded as an electric cloud, in respect of its overpowering force, and of the brilliancy and the rapidity which are equally associated with our ideas of it. We need but to name Herr Leopold de Meyer, the thunder-and-lightning characteristics of whose pianism have been proved and acknowledged throughout both hemispheres, to establish the verity of our metaphor. Albeit his thunder, though it astounds, never shocks us,—his lightning, though it dazzles, never consumes. An esteemed cotemporary,—whose fiat, whether it condemn an emperor, approve a prizefighter, oppose a ministry, or applaud a pianist, is revered as an oracle no less at the antipodes than here,—has recently asserted the following judgment on this artist, "The instrumental selection comprised a grand fantasia for pianoforte alone, composed and performed by Herr Leopold de Meyer, pianist to the Emperor of Austria, and in his particular walk the most extraordinary 'manipulator' now before the public. This gentleman combines a force and vigour of hand which few have equalled with a delicate lightness of touch and liquid softness of tone that have never been surpassed. He brings these opposite qualities into play with marvellous address, blending or alternating them as the humour seizes him, and with such consistency that while the ear is always satisfied the taste is never offended. M. de Meyer's fantasia-playing, moreover—like his music — is quite as original as it is astonishing. He has a vein exclusively his own, and is indebted to no other source than that of his invention, whether for ideas or for the method of handling them. Making no pretence to be an exponent of what is conventionally termed the 'classical' school, he does not provoke criticism by an imperfect conception and execution of acknowledged masterpieces. He moves within the sphere most congenial to his artistic nature, and he does wisely, for in that sphere he stands aloof from competition. It is not intended by this to insinuate that M. de Meyer would fail if he ventured on higher and more intellectual ground; but at the same time, as sincere appreciators of his really exceptional talent, we should counsel him to leave the 'great masters' (and especially the 'old masters') to themselves; for, in order to ride comfortably over their domain, he would have to invent a new and peculiar bridle to restrain his Pegasus within bounds." Herr Leopold de Meyer has not played in the English provinces since 1845, and thus, since his reputation has been constantly on the increase, his novelty will be no less an attraction throughout the tour than his talent.

A rain cloud of a chequered April in respect of its tears interwoven with smiles, may be considered the favourite interpretress of gaiety and pathos, Miss Eyles, who, when Mad. Novello had stamped success upon "The beating of my own heart" as a soprano song, sang it a third lower, as a contralto, and was encored in it at every concert during a far-spread tour which lasted for ten weeks, and so universally proved her infallible power of pleasing the very various tastes that distinguish the different districts through which she passed.

We may regard as fleecy clouds the congregated members of the London Glee and Madrigal Union, each adding a share of beauty to the scene, and all combining in a general effect of harmonious softness; to wit, Miss J. Wells, a rising soprano, rising in esteem as much as in voice and in merit; Mr. Baxter, an alto, who does all that can be done to render his happily rare register of voice effective; Mr. W. Cummings, a tenor, who has been as successful in singing alone as in blending his voice with those of his companions; Mr. Lawler, a bass, whose broad declamatory style and fine sonorous voice have been too often heard to advantage at the concerts of our most important institutions to need any bush to recommend them; and Mr. Land, the organiser of the Union, who may therefore be regarded as the fatherland of the party,—whose sweetness of voice and mildness of manner prove him to be a Land flowing with milk and honey,—whose proverbial punctuality makes every one rejoice when he is a Land of promise,—who, were there a peerage of pianoforte accompanists, might well be created a Land lord, —whose merits make those who engage him well off when they become Land owners,—whose certainty is such that he nullifies the idea of the geological phenomenon of a Land slip,—who bears so urbanely the blame due to others, that he may be not inaptly called a Land-scape of his friends,—whose ever-smiling aspect teaches us to regard him as a personification of the "Happy Land" celebrated in Dr. Rimbault's ballad,—and whom, having all these qualifications, we may be well satisfied to regard as our own native Land.

It is high time, however, to descend from the clouds, and contemplate the stern reality of Mad. Novello's departure. The country folks will not entirely have the advantage of us Londoners in hearing the last of this favorite vocalist; for it appears that the swan song of her professional life will be uttered here in town, or at furthest at Sydenham, which, as has been proved at the Handel festivals, is accessible to tens of thousands at a time who wish to hear her. Let us hope, too, that before her last adieu, the Sacred Harmonic Society may have the benefit of her singing, at least once, in Messiah, in Elijah, and in Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise—the unique beauty of her voice is in no instance heard to such infinite advantage as in the brief solo that sublimely heralds the words and the musical subject of the great chorus in this last-named work, "The night is departing," and it is only if we can preserve in our memory the gleaming brightness with which she sings this phrase, that we shall be able to avoid supposing the watchman's warning is fulfilled in her retirement; "The morning will come, but the night will come also."

THE LATE MR. DRECHSLER.

(From the Edinburgh "Daily Courant," June 30.)

THE announcement of the death of this talented musician calls for more than an ordinary expression of regret, in which we shall have the sympathy of many readers, to whom the event was equally sad and unexpected. During late years, partly from ill health, and partly from a retiring and sensitive disposition, which made him shrink from display, Mr. Drechsler seldom appeared in public, and we daresay many of the younger generation are ignorant of the loss which Edinburgh and the musical world have to deplore. There must, however, be a large circle who retain the liveliest recollections of musical attainments, unfortunately too seldom exhibited, but which, once witnessed, could not be forgotten. We have been favoured with some particulars of Mr. Drechsler's early life, which we gladly incorporate with those that came within our own knowledge.

Louis Drechsler was a native of Dessau, where he received his chief musical education under Frederick Schneider. In the summer of 1841, when eighteen years of age, Drechsler came to Edinburgh with our townsman Mr. Adam Hamilton (his fellow-pupil under Schneider, and afterwards his brother-in-law), and produced an immense sensation by his violoncello playing. In 1843 he went to London, and in 1845 to Paris, where he cultivated the acquaintance of Franchomme, with whom he became a great favourite. In 1846, while in London, Mr. Drechsler received a command to play at Buckingham Palace before Her Majesty, who, after the concert, conversed with him in his native tongue, and highly complimented him on his performance. From this time he made frequent visits to London, France, and Germany, playing and singing with great success at Vienna, Dresden, Berlin, Munich, Paris, and his native town.

In 1848, with a view to perfect himself both as a singer and a teacher of singing, Mr. Drechsler commenced studying under the first masters of France and Italy, and lastly under Sig. Manuel Garcia in London, whose system of instruction he adopted. At the institution of the "Society of Musical Amateurs" in this city he was nominated to the office of conductor, at which he continued to labour with unwearied zeal, until the meetings of the Society were discontinued. We cannot refrain from mentioning, as a fact strongly illustrative of Mr. Drechsler's character, that he declined to receive any remuneration for his services, being ever willing to advance the cause of music, without regard to personal advantage, and conceiving that he would thereby preserve greater independence of position. Music was to him an art to be loved and cultivated for its own sake, not a trade at which to seek subsistence or aggrandisement. As a violoncello player he was unsurpassed, at least as regards purity and sweetness of tone, combined with intense feeling, and an expression almost vocal. He was scarcely less remarkable for his pianoforte playing. His power of extemporising both on the pianoforte and on the organ was such as to afford the greatest delight to the few who were fortunate enough to hear him, while his musical knowledge enabled him to read from score with facility. As a teacher of singing (to which he latterly devoted his time), Mr. Drechsler was able and conscientious, following the true Italian method of forming correct and pure tones before allowing the pupil to attempt songs and mechanical difficulties. He was generous and charitable, in the most unostentatious way. Many young professionals, and even amateurs with musical aspirations, received gratuitous instruction and kind sympathy from him, unknown to any besides. In this city of musical sets, and rival interests, it is not unlikely that some may think our notice too much based on the principle of nil de mortuis nisi bonum; to them we would say, perhaps you only knew the surface, perhaps we knew what was beneath. Although for some time past in failing health, Mr. Drechsler's immediate decease was unexpected. We trust we are not lifting too far the veil of private life, when we add, that his end was calm and peaceful, and that, although sudden, it was not too sudden for him who was taken away.

Letter to the Editor.

THE ORPHEONISTES.

SIR,—The English press has rendered the Orphéonistes of France a signal service. Its co-operation in their pacific mission has been most sympathetic and unreserved. Thanks to its powerful influence, and especially to its early exercise, our purely artistic demonstration acquired a significance calculated to produce the happiest results on the friendly relations of the two peoples, and I am proud to take this opportunity of expressing, in the name of the Orphéonistes of France, our profound gratitude for its kind, its invaluable aid. Our deep sense of the obligations we are under for the sympathy which has greeted and encouraged us has, however, been subjected to a very trying ordeal, in consequence of the treatment which some of us have received at the hands of certain parties. I will confine my narrative to my own case, leaving the public to qualify the conduct of the two individuals of whom, I think, I have a right to complain.

I have, perhaps, no right to complain if the proprietor of the El Dorado Rooms, Leicester Square, compelled me to pay for a repast for 1500 persons, at the rate of 1*s.* 6*d.* a head, although only half that number partook of the very modest cheer provided for them. I made a bargain beforehand, and it turned out a very bad one for me. Upon the same principle, I presume, it would not be fair of me take exception to the yet dearer hospitality sold to the members of the French press by the proprietor of the Arundel Hotel, Arundel Street, Strand, and for whose entertainment I made myself responsible. It is true I agreed for fifteen persons, and only eleven came; that the price embraced board and lodging; and that the majority of the party were unable to take their meals at the hotel. The loss was mine; the gain was the landlord's. I imagine he has far more reason to be satisfied than I am with the result of our arrangement. Understand me, therefore, that I do not complain of having been kept to my bargain. But I do complain that these individuals took—as you shall judge—most unfair advantage of me, and did not treat me with that degree of consideration I had a right to expect in the difficult and delicate position in which I was placed.

Though an obscure individual, it was my great privilege, on the occasion of the Orphéonist Festival, to represent some 200,000 of my countrymen associates in the great work of the Orphéon. Any engagements I made on their behalf were sacred. If I did not fulfil them to the hour some slight indulgence might have been extended to me without any excessive stretch of generosity. It fell out that, owing to my presence being unexpectedly required elsewhere at the time I had appointed for the settlement of claims I had never disputed, suspicion took the place of confidence in the minds of the parties in question, who forthwith made me unpleasantly familiar with the sharpest of sharp practice under English law; and this without any kind of warning. Not only was the debt thus considerably increased by heavy costs, but Mr. Williams, the proprietor of the Arundel Hotel, actually went the length of incarcerating me in a lock-up house on Saturday, although I had offered to discharge his claim at the very moment my personal liberty was placed under restraint. Surely, Sir, a few hours' delay in the payment of Mr. Williams's by no means moderate account did not merit the infliction of such an indignity. Mr. Williams's proceeding is the more ungracious, because he had not even furnished me with the particulars of his bill, and I am ignorant of them to this hour. I have paid him, it is true, but under protest.

Happily, Sir, if on the one hand it has been my misfortune to fall in with one or two cases of this kind, it affords me sincere pleasure, on the other hand, to record that in most of the establishments in London, the Orphéonistes have been treated with true British frankness and fairness. Madame Granara, of the Hotel de l'Europe, has been especially considerate. Her house has been open to us at all hours, and was placed at our disposal from the first with the best grace and the greatest possible courtesy.

The press, generally, has shown us so much kindness, that I feel I may confidently solicit the favour of your publishing this episode of our visit to England; though believe me, Sir, we shall retain only a grateful remembrance of the cordial reception and treatment which — with the above exceptions — we have met with at the hands of your great nation.

I am, Sir, yours very obediently,

EUGENIE DELAPORTE.

Early application to secure places is earnestly recommended, as being the only means of preventing disappointment. The Box-office of the Theatre is open daily from 10 to 6, and on the evenings of performance until the end of the opera.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—Lessee, Mr. E. T. SMITH.—Mr. E. T. SMITH respectfully acquaints the subscribers and the public that his BENEFIT will take place on Thursday, July 19, when will be presented a favourite Opera and Ballet. Gallery, 3s.; Gallery Stalls, 5s.; Pit, 8s. 6d. Applications to be made to Mr. Nugent, Box-office of the Theatre, from 10 till 6 o'clock.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—Called upon at a moment when Her Majesty's Theatre appeared to be perpetually closed, when a new rival had closed the doors of the legitimate Italian Theatre, to come forward and rescue a fane so long honoured by the élite of this country, I accepted the charge, and at once sacrificing every other feeling, every other interest, I became the lessee of Her Majesty's Theatre, which in an incredibly short time I cleaned out, embellished, and opened. Thus compelled to carry out arrangements of the most difficult and intricate kind, already a second in the field, forestalled by a talented and powerful empressario, I at once devoted myself to the task, and now appeal to my kind patrons, friends, and the public at large, how far I have carried out their views—how far I have redeemed my promise, and how far I have done honour or discredit to Her Majesty's Theatre. It is acknowledged that there are spots on the sun, and I do not hesitate to confess that some portion of my corps may be less perfect than I could have desired; to obtain the services of a superior chorus, to secure at a late period the impossible advantages of an orchestra, beyond reproach, was a work I found to be impracticable; I have, however, in these departments done my best; next year I will pledge myself to do better. The talented phalanx of opera singers (I believe I may, without arrogance assert) stands unequalled, unrivalled; while the artists engaged in the ballet department will fairly demonstrate that I have not neglected the time-honoured charms of terpsichorean art. Out of the repertoire announced at the commencement of the season, I have produced the following operas:—La Favorita, Otello, Il Trovatore, Ernani, La Traviata, Norma, Il Barbière di Siviglia, Gli Ugonotti, Lucia di Lammermoor, Don Giovanni, Rigoletto, and Marta. From the several new operas promised, these have already been presented:—Almina, Semiramide, and Oberon; Le Nozze di Figaro being in course of rehearsal, and Cimarosa's celebrated buffo opera, Il Matrimonio Segreto, though not previously announced, has been most successfully performed. To remind the patrons and subscribers of Her Majesty's Theatre of such artistes as Mlle. TITIENS, Mlle. PICCOLOMINI, Mad. LEMAIRE, Mlle. VANERI, Signor GIUGLINI, Signor BELART, Signor VIALETTI, and Signor MONGINI, would be a work of supererogation; but in addition to these well-known favourites, Mad. ALBONI, Mlle. LOTTI DELLA SANTA, Mlle. MARIA BRUNETTI, Mad. BORGHI-MAMO, Mlle. MICHAL, and Mad. MARIE CABEL, together with Signor EVERARDI, Signor GASSIER, Signor FELLAR, Herr STEGER, and the celebrated buffo singer, Signor CIAMPI, besides many other artistes unnecessary here to mention, have appeared for the first time this season. In the ballet department, Mlles. SALVIONI, MORLACCHI, POCCHINI, CLAVERLI, MONCELET, and Mlle. CLAUDINA CUCCHI have brilliantly sustained the prestige that has invariably belonged to Her Majesty's Theatre, appended to which names those of Mlle. AMALIA FERRARIS, and M. CHAPPUY (who appear this evening), crown the completeness of this section of entertainment. It may not, perhaps, be considered out of place, having thus far given an account of my past conduct, to state succinctly my future programme of the coming season, and I have great pleasure in notifying thus early to my patrons, subscribers, and the public generally, that I have just completed engagements with Mlles. TITIENS and PAREPA, together with Mr. SIMS REEVES and Mr. SANTLEY, who will appear in several English operas, in addition to MACFARREN'S Robin Hood, and W. V. WALLACE'S Amber Witch, which I succeeded in securing, and which will be produced early in the ensuing season, —October next. If any available talent has ever sought an engagement in this country and has been rejected by me, if any composer of merit has found his works declined, if any novelty has been overlooked, then, indeed, I am unworthy of your patronage; but if my constant and unremitting exertions have tended to carry out your views, if I have done all a manager or a lessee could do, if my present and my past afford a fair guarantee for my future conduct, then, indeed, I shall feel proudly conscious that in thus parting with you for a season, it will only be to renew those ties which you can so honestly again, I hope, bestow, and I can so gratefully receive.

E. T. SMITH, Lessee.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN. Grand Concert.—On Wednesday next, July 18, a GRAND CONCERT will take place in the Theatre. The first part will consist of a Miscellaneous Selection, in which the following artists will take part—Mad. GRISI, Mlle. CORBARI, Mad. MIOLAN-CARVALHO, Signor TAMBERLIK, Signor GARDONI, M. ZELGER, Signor NERI-BARALDI, Signor POLONINI, Signor TAGLIAFICO, M. FAURE, Signor GRAZIANI, Signor RONCONI. After which will be performed (for the fourth and last time but one), Glück's opera, Orfeo e Euridice, Orfeo, Mlle. CSILLAG; Un Ombra, Mad. MIOLAN-CARVALHO; L'Amore, Mad. DIDIÉE; Euridice, Mad. PENCO. Conductor, Mr. COSTA. The subscribers to the Opera for the Tuesdays of the season, as well as those for the first alternate weeks, will be presented with the entrée to the above performance. Box subscribers will receive boxes, and stall subscribers will receive stalls. The Musical World.

LONDON: SATURDAY, JULY 14, 1860.

DEATH has been busy with our public men in this year of grace, 1860. Not to glance at the high priests of science and philosophy, nor to quit the sphere of those who come under the category of artists-proper, and artists-exhibitant,—Jullien, Albert Smith, Robert Brough, have successively past away within a short interval. In the strictly musical line three distinguished performers—strange to say, all players on the violoncello—have been taken from us within as brief a space. The death of William Lovell Phillips was speedily followed by that of George Hausmann; and, upon the death of Hausmann, still more speedily came that of Louis Drechsler, who, first known in this country as a violoncellist, had long settled in Edinburgh as a teacher of singing. Of Herr Drechsler, a sensible and well-written notice, from the pages of the Edinburgh Daily Courant, will be found, slightly abridged, in another column of this day's impression. A more amiable foreigner has perhaps never resided habitually among us, and with most of the praise bestowed upon his talent by our contemporary we can conscientiously agree. We have seen no such tribute, however, to the merits of the late Herr Hausmann in any of the Edinburgh or Glasgow papers; but may safely presume that something of the kind has appeared in one or all of them. He too had periodically established himself in the Scottish capital; and though perhaps not the most musical of cities, "Auld Reekie" has never been insensible to the preference awarded it by men of eminence in whatever branch of human acquirement. Herr Hausmann, it is true, died at Hanover, and the fact of his demise may not be generally known; in which case the Scottish amateurs must be acquitted of any intentional neglect towards one who lived amidst them, respected alike as an artist and a man.

Herr Hausmann came to England more than twenty years ago, and since then has never left it for any lengthened period. He won a very honourable position by his talents, and was rated highly both as a solo and orchestral performer. Add to this, by his kindly disposition, upright character, and gentlemanly manners, he gained the unanimous esteem of his brother-artists, among whom he counted several attached and affectionate friends. The death of many a man of greater note might leave fewer to regret it earnestly than that of George Hausmann, at the unripe age of 43.

AFTER such a season as this, who would not like to pass a quiet month at Baden-Baden? A quiet month! That is not so easy in the midst of fêtes projected and set in motion by the indefatigable M. Benazet—M. Edouard Benazet, a worthy son of his father — fêtes patronized, bodily and spiritually, by the Grand Duke, and divers of the court of Russia, with other notable personages hereditary and mediatised. No! a quiet month is out of the question at Baden-Baden, unless in the winter, when its superfluous population has dispersed, and the number of its inhabitants is reduced to something like half-a-dozen thousand.

After such a season as this, however, who would not like to spend a month at Baden-Baden, the prettiest, the sunniest, the hilliest of Spas? The present season, thanks to the exertion of M. Benazet—architect, embellisher, and sole director of that splendid palace, the Maison de Conversation—is more than usually brilliant. Baden-Baden was never fuller, never gayer. A parterre of laughing villas, and sparkling fountains, and many-coloured gardens, whether by day, when the sky is as gold, or by night, when the sky is as silver—when the sunbeams dance or the moonbeams play, upon the tops of the trees that cast their grateful shadows over the swardy environs — Baden is equally a little paradise. The women are butterflies, glad in fine weather; at night their eyes are glow-worms in mid air; at noon they stroll to the Trinkhalle, luxuriously listless—

> "gorgeous insects, floating motionless, > Unconscious of the day."

People from all climes and in all costumes—of all habits and of all tastes—of all idiosyncracies and of all followings —assemble at Baden-Baden in the summer months. From this large swarm of pleasure-flies it is not easy to discover the preponderance of any one race — though, perhaps, the English and French are just now in the majority, while there are also of Yankees "greater manyer" than customary.

Music is always a special feature in the fêtes of Baden-Baden. In this most popular and humanizing of recreations M. Benazet has afforded his patrons many a delightful treat. A few years ago he got up a famous concert for the celebrated horn-player, Vivier, when that most inimitable of humourists was aided by the magnificent and munificent Jenny Lind, and the audience was composed of one-third crowned heads, one-third scions of royalty, and one-third opulent visitors; and Vivier left Baden-Baden crowned with laurels and laden with five hundred guineas worth of specie. This year, if we are to credit rumour, the attractions will be more than usually novel and brilliant. The superb and incomparable Alboni, it is said, will appear, and —Lumleo volente—the grand and magnificent Titiens, the bruit of whose Valentine and Donna Anna has sounded in every hill and valley, in every city, town, and village of the continent.

To reach Baden-Baden from London involves the easiest and pleasantest, and dœdalest of tours. Once at Ostend, and all the disagreeable part of the route is accomplished. You then visit Old Bruges and its towers, Malines and its laces, Louvain and its Hotel de Ville, Ghent and its churches, Liege and its quays. You shoot through the hills to Verviers by the many-tunnelled railway, passing Claude Fontaine, Pepinster, and many a charming spot. You sleep at Aix-la-Chapelle, with Carolus Magnus, not stopping to drink water at the Cathedral. You spend a night at Cologne, and pay homage to the supreme Dome by the light of the moon. You pass immediately to Bonn, dine at the "Golden Star," with a real bottle of Geisenheimer; walk to the Minster-platz; glance at the frowning effigy of Beethoven, a giant in stone, and pass through the vines to Godesberg, where, if the weather be hot, you may repose under the hoary ruins of the Castle. A little boat now takes you over the Rhine to Konigswinter, and, having climbed the Drachenfels, you row across to Nennenwerth, where Liszt did not come to dinner. Here you get at once into the dampschif, pass the Roman Andernach, Coblentz, and Ehrenbreitstein, the "fort of forts" Stolzenfelz, and the Loreley-beg, that inspired poor Mendelssohn with ideas for the stage; sweep by Mainz, with a sneer for its garrison; disdain the clean and straight streets of Mannheim, not even tarrying to pay homage to the statue of Goethe at Frankfort-Maine—until you find yourself at last safely sheltered under the crumbling walls of the magnificent Chateau of the Counts-Palatine. Here you confide yourself to Morpheus's embraces; and the next morning, after a good breakfast and a bottle of Hockheimer, you proceed on your course, and in a brief interval find yourself at Baden-Baden, the goal of your desires. At the best hotel you call for a bottle of Johannisberg, which will be brought to you in the guise of some first-rate Rudesheimer—note that Johannisberg is purely a myth—which well-flavoured beverage you quaff while ruminating retrospectively on the scenes and objects you have encountered on your journey.

THE introduction to this country—by Prince George Galitzin, at his interesting concerts in St. James's Hall—of some of the operatic music of Glinka, has materially elevated Russia as a musical nation in the eyes of amateurs and professors who previously knew nothing whatever about it. The following extract from a private letter—dated, "St. Petersburg"—will show, moreover, that the death of Glinka (1857) has not left Russia destitute of composers for the theatre:—

"The Cirque, at present the theatre of Her Imperial Highness the Grand Duchess Marié, is nearly completed. The internal fittings are in a style of unusual magnificence. Rich gilding, comfortable boxes, broad flights of stairs, and vast corridors, connecting the different stories with each other, render this theatre one of the most magnificent edifices of the kind in Europe. According to report, it is intended principally for the performance of Russian operas, of which, it is said, there are several new ones ready. An opera called The Prisoner of the Caucasus is in preparation. The subject is taken from Pouschkin's poem, while the music is the first effort of M. Kui, an officer in the Guards. It is rumoured, also, that another opera, under the title of Natacha, by the Russian composer, Villebois, has been put in rehearsal. Those connoisseurs who have heard fragments from this work, at various private parties in St. Petersburg, have spoken of them in terms of high praise."

These are good tidings, inasmuch as the character of the Russian national melody is such as to present a world of fresh resources to composers worthy of the name; while Russian history and Russian legend offer inexhaustible materials to the ingenious and experienced dramatist.

The Operas.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—On Tuesday evening, the last night of the subscription, there was a performance, in length and variety recalling those memorable "long Thursdays" in which Mr. Lumley, dating from as early a period as 1844, used once a week to crowd together all his attractions, operatic and choregraphic. The entertainments began with Lucrezia Borgia—Lucrezia, Mlle. Titiens; Maffeo Orsini, Mad. Lemaire; Alphonso, Signor Gassier; and Gennaro, Signor Mongini. It was the last appearance of Signor Mongini. The professional services of this gentleman being required at Milan, he is unable to remain for the extra nights, which (in accordance with a custom perhaps "more honoured in the breach than the observance") are to follow the regular season, and to keep the house open for an indefinite period. The opera was very favourably received, and Signor Mongini—who sang so admirably, especially in the death scene, as to make the necessity of finding a substitute for him in future representations of Oberon a matter of regret—was more than once recalled, with Mlle. Titiens and M. Gassier.

Between the last two acts a scene from the ballet of Orfa introduced Mlle. Amalia Ferraris—who, since her last appearance at Her Majesty's Theatre, a good many years ago, when a mere beginner, has risen to the highest eminence among European dancers. This lady, now a consummate mistress of her art, combines a marked originality with all the best qualities that constitute the perfection of Terpsichorean display. At present, however, we can merely add that she achieved a success as unequivocal as it was well merited, and that she was twice summoned before the curtain at the end of her performance in an elaborate pas de deux with M. Chapuy (also a new importation).

The last act of Lucrezia was succeeded by a further novelty, in the shape of Meyerbeer's celebrated "Shadow Song," given by Mad. Marie Cabel with such fluency, neatness, grace, and brilliancy of execution as to raise the enthusiasm of the house and elicit a unanimous recall, although it was nearly midnight when she made her appearance. Mad. Cabel (whom all our musical readers must remember) has apparently lost none of those attractions which made her so distinguished a favourite when "Opera Comique" reigned paramount at the St. James's Theatre; but this she will have a better opportunity of showing in the Figlia del Reggimento to-night.

"It is some years," says a contemporary, "since we have seen Mad. Marie Cabel in London, and we are glad to find that time, so far from exercising any deteriorating influence upon her, has not merely improved the quality of her voice, but has also given the final perfecting touch to the vocalisation that was already above reproach. Although Mad. Cabel did not make her appearance till considerably more than half-past eleven o'clock, and then only sang the 'Air de l'ombre,' from Le Pardon, she was enthusiastically applauded, and more than justified the choice of the not easily satisfied composer, who entrusted her with the original impersonation of the heroine of his last opera. Mad. Cabel's voice is singularly even and equal in quality throughout its entire compass; and nothing can exceed her brilliant and absolutely perfect execution of the difficult cadences in the Shadow song, nor can anything surpass in delicacy the deliciously-modulated shake with which she concludes the air."

To conclude, the entertainments of this (very) "long" Tuesday wound up with "God save the Queen," in which all the principal singers (except Mlle. Titiens) took part.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—Meyerbeer's grand opera, Le Prophète, was produced on Thursday night for the first time in the new theatre, with a splendour and magnificence that we believe has never yet been equalled. We must, for the present, be satisfied with announcing that Signor Tamberlik made his first appearance this season in the character of Jean of Leyden, that his singing was as much distinguished as formerly for correctness, vigor, and energy, and his impersonation of the mock prophet characterised by a manliness which invested the character of the impostor-prophet throughout with wonderfully sustained interest. "Tamberlik's John of Leyden"—says the Morning Post—"is well known to our public, who have long justly regarded it as one of his very greatest efforts; and never did he play the very arduous character more finely than on the present occasion. All the great 'points' of the part were 'taken,' as formerly, with an unquestionable appreciation of their merit; and the 'Re del cielo,' in which the marvellous voice of Tamberlik, animated by truly heroic ecstacy, gives out those famous B and C naturals di petto, with a force which makes the 'vaulted roof rebound,' again created what the Italians would call a furore, quelled only by the reappearance of the singer twice before the curtain at the end of the act to which the air in question forms the finale." Mlle. Csillag gives evidence of additional powers in every part she undertakes, and her delineation of Fides will place her in a higher position than she has yet occupied. To appear in a character which some of the most consummate singers of the day have stamped with their individuality, indicates no small ambition; but Mlle. Csillag has proved herself capable of grappling with the extraordinary difficulties of a very arduous task, and of grasping the salient characteristics of the most original and masterly creation of the lyric drama. Berta was carefully performed by Mlle. Corbari. Signor Tagliafico looked as if he had stepped out of a picture by Velasquez, and sang unexceptionably the music allotted to Count Oberthal; and the three Anabaptists were admirably represented by Signors Neri-Baraldi and Polonini, and M. Zelger. The scenery, costumes, and mise-en-scène are even more splendid and complete now than when the original production of Le Prophète, eleven years ago, was the town-talk of the season. From the Cuyp-like beauty of the opening view to the massive grandeur of the cathedral interior—cleverly taken at the junction of the south transept and the choir, thus giving the effect of unlimited extent—each scene was exquisite in itself, and gained an effect by the constant changes of the crowd of auxiliaries, who always—and as if by instinct, so thoroughly were they drilled—formed into harmoniously-balanced groupings. The skating scene, of course, was the main feature of the scenic display, and the "Quadrille des Patineurs" was so exceedingly well managed that it was enthusiastically encored. The dancing of Mad. Zina in the pas de deux was absolute perfection. We have no doubt that, placed on the stage with such profuse magnificence, Le Prophète will now, after its five years' banishment, be a great and continued success.

THE BRASS BANDS AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

"THE Great Brass Band Contest," "The Great National Contest," "The Sydenham Contest," and "The People's National Festival," as it has been indifferently called, came off on Tuesday and Wednesday, and was a decided success. On the first day, when half-a-crown was the charge for admission, nearly 7000 persons assembled; and on the second, a shilling day, over 22,000. The preliminary contest on each day commenced in the grounds, from ten until half-past two, when the whole of the competing force congregated in the Great Handel Orchestra, and played the following selection, under the direction of Mr. Enderby Jackson:—"Rule Britannia;" "Hallelujah" (Handel); "Wedding March" (Mendelssohn); "The heavens are telling" (Haydn); "God save the Queen." The forty-four bands included about 1200 players, and the effect of their united powers was literally deafening. The precision and correctness of the immense body of instrumentalists was remarkable, considering how few opportunities they could have had of rehearsing together. Mr. Enderby Jackson directed, and proved a most admirable and energetic general. The new monster-gong-drum, seventeen feet in diameter, manufactured expressly for the Bands Festival, and played in furious reverberations by Messrs. Charles Thomson, of the Crystal Palace Band, and Middleditch, of the London Rifle Brigade, constituted a most worthy accompaniment to the brass thunders. On the Tuesday, the "Wedding March" from A Midsummer Night's Dream, and the National Anthem, were encored; and on the Wednesday both these pieces, with "Rule Britannia." After this grand ensemble, the twelve best bands selected from those who had exhibited in the grounds had to contend for the prizes in rotation in the Great Orchestra, before the judges, who pronounced their decision accordingly. On the first day forty-four bands appeared on the platforms, terraces, and various parts of the grounds. They were divided into sections of seven or eight bands, each section having three qualified judges to decide as to their fitness to compete for the prizes. The twelve candidates on the first day were — "The Saltaire" band (maintained by Mr. Titus Salt, of Bradford), who played a selection from Lucrezia Borgia; "The Cyfarthfa" band (from Messrs. Crawshay's Ironworks, South Wales, and from the ranks of which came the celebrated ophicleide player, Mr. Hughes, introduced to the public by the late M. Jullien, and other good performers), who executed a selection from Mr. Balfe's Bondman; "The Deighton Mills" band, who gave a selection from Ernani; "The Witney" band, who essayed their powers in a selection from Trovatore; "The Stanhope" band, a selection from Preciosa; "The Chesterfield" band (in the costume of the Chesterfield Rifles — Sir Joseph Paxton's regiment), selection from the Trovatore; "The Staley-Bridge" band, the overture to Guillaume Tell; "The Dewsbury" band (the crack band of Yorkshire), selection from Preciosa; "The Blackdyke Mills" band (a subscription band, supported by the wealthy proprietor of the mills), selection from Preciosa; "The Ackrington" band (the champion band of Lancashire, which has carried off all the county prizes), the overture to Nabucco; "The Holmfirth Temperance" band, selection from Trovatore; and "The Darlington Saxhorn" band (generally known as the Catholic Band, and which plays sacred music exclusively), the "Kyrie Eleison" and "Gloria" from Haydn's Mass, No. 2. The prizes were:— 1st, £40, in money, together with a splendid cup for the bandmaster, also a magnificent champion contre bass in E flat, value thirty-five guineas, presented by Mr. Henry Distin, of Great Newport Street; 2nd prize — £25, in money; 3rd prize — £15; 4th prize — £10; 5th prize — £5. These were awarded to the following bands in the order in which we name them:—"The Blackdyke Mills," conductor, Mr. S. Longbottom, leader, Mr. T. Galloway. "The Saltaire," conductor, Mr. Richard Smith, leader, Mr. W. Turner. "The Cyfarthfa," conductor, Mr. R. Livesey. "The Darlington Saxhorn," conductor, Mr. Henry Hoggett; and "The Dewsbury," Mr. John Peel.

On Wednesday seventy-two bands entered the lists, and, as on the former day, underwent a preliminary examination by the judges. The twelve bands qualified to contend for the prizes were as follows: — "The Brighouse," "The Chesterfield," "The Haywood Amateurs," "The Goldshill Sax-Horn," "The Keighley," "The Huddersfield," "The Darwen Temperance," "The Dawley Green," "The Cyfarthfa," "The Dewsbury," "The Mossley," and "The Meltham Mills." The prizes were: — 1st, £30, in money, together with a silver cup for bandmaster, also a complete set of "Boosey's Brass-Band Journal," sixteen volumes, bound, value twelve guineas, presented by Messrs. Boosey and Sons; 2nd, £20, in money; 3rd, £15; 4th, £10; 5th, £5. These were severally adjudged to "The Cyfarthfa" band, conductor, Mr. R. Livesey; "The Dewsbury," conductor, Mr. John Peel; "The Goldshill Sax-Horn" band, (from Mr. James Bagnall's iron-works, Staffordshire,) conductor, Mr. J. Blandford; "The Chesterfield" band, (who, in the costume of the Derbyshire Rifles, gave a selection from Lucrezia Borgia) conductor, Mr. H. Slack; and "The Meltham Mills" band (who played the "Hallelujah Chorus"), conductor, Mr. H. Hartley, leader, Mr. Cyrus Mills.

In addition, two special prizes were given: a beautiful electro-plated cornet-à-pistons, by Antoine Courtois, presented by Messrs. Chappell and Hammond to the best soprano cornet player of the two days' contest; and one of Boosey's best B flat euphoniums, electro-plated, presented to the best bass player of the two days' contest, by Messrs. Boosey and Sons. The judges had some difficulty in coming to a decision on these two points; and in the case of the bass prize were compelled to have a separate contest on the platform of the great orchestra, and ultimately awarded Messrs. Boosey's splendid gift to John Walker of the "Cyfarthfa" band. The judges were unanimous in awarding the cornet-à-pistons to Mr. W. Blandford of the "Goldshill" band.

When the final award was made, Mr. Bowley, the general manager, proceeded in a few brief but appropriate words to hand the prizes to the victors, and in doing so expressed the pleasure the Directors of the Company and himself, in common with the visitors, had felt in the complete success of this novel and interesting gathering, from which he augured most satisfactory results to the progress of music among the humbler classes. He tendered the thanks of the Company to the performers generally, who, though nearly all connected with our large manufacturing establishments, had devoted so much time to the cultivation of music. Mr. Bowley further acknowledged the liberal gifts of prizes by Messrs. Chappell and Hammond, Messrs. Boosey, and Mr. Distin, and especially commended the energy and ability with which Mr. Enderby Jackson, of Hull, had organised and conducted the undertaking. The proceedings, which were of a most animated character, did not terminate till half-past eight o'clock.

DR. MARK'S COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

THE annual examination of the pupils resident within, and attending at, the Royal College of Music, took place on the 28th of June in the large Lecture Hall of the College. As a more certain test of their abilities, it was considered desirable to have a written paper instead of a viva voce examination as formerly. The Rev. J. S. Sidebotham, M.A. chaplain of New College, and city lecturer at St. Martin's, Carfax, Oxford, and the Rev. J. B. Wilkinson, M.A., curate of St. John's, Manchester, very kindly undertook the preparation of questions and inspection of papers. The result was made known on Thursday at the institution.

The Rev. J. B. Wilkinson, addressing the boys, said, that although the first time they had been put to so severe a test as a written examination, he had much pleasure in the perusal of their papers; many showed very considerable intelligence; all were highly satisfactory, while some (which he should preserve), were drawn up with such care, and showed such good sense, that he was quite surprised and delighted. The rev. gentleman in the kindest manner pointed out any faults he had discovered, in order that the boys might avoid them in future; and concluded by bearing testimony to their uniformly good conduct, and to the marked attention they paid to the religious instruction he had given them on his weekly visits to the institution.

The Rev. J. S. Sidebotham said it gave him very great pleasure on the invitation of Dr. Mark to examine the school, and he was happy to say that the inspection of the papers, although numerous and necessarily involving considerable trouble, had afforded him much satisfaction. It was to be expected that among the papers of boys so very young (the average age being ten years) would be found many erroneous answers. A few, however, were very amusing; and on the whole they were very sensible, and indicated that the boys had profited by the sound instruction they had received. As thus early evincing such intelligence, he felt a deep interest in them, and would be delighted, with Dr. Mark's permission, to have an opportunity at the next examination of witnessing their further progress. The rev. gentleman then read over the names of the boys who had distinguished themselves in the examination, and stated the number of marks each had obtained.

The Rev. W. Huntington said it always afforded him great pleasure to come among them, and he was delighted to hear from the rev. gentleman who had examined the papers that they had so well acquitted themselves. Of their manners in general he could not speak too highly, especially of their conduct at church, which was always most exemplary. He assured Dr. Mark that he took such interest in the institution that he hoped to visit it even more frequently than hitherto.

Dr. Mark desired to express his best thanks to the reverend gentlemen for the great patience they had exercised in the examination, which for many days had occupied their valuable time. He assured them it had afforded him the highest satisfaction to learn that his "Little Men" had paid so much attention to their religious training, convinced that no education could be complete or effectual unless accompanied by tutoring the heart in the moral and religious duties of life. Dr. Mark then proposed three hearty cheers for the examiners, which was warmly responded to by his "Little Men."

At the close of the examination the masters and pupils presented to Dr. Mark a silver cup, bearing the following inscription:—"Presented to Dr. Mark, by the masters and pupils of the Royal College of Music, as an affectionate token of regard. June 18, 1860." Also the following address :—"Dear Sir,—Will you kindly accept this present from the masters and pupils of the Royal College of Music, in testimony of their affectionate regard and esteem, and on this, the anniversary of your birthday, permit us to express our wishes for your future happiness, and for the prosperity of your great National Institution, in which we have derived so much benefit, both from your care and instruction, and spent so many happy days." Signed by 200 of the masters and pupils of the institution. Dr. Mark, returning thanks, said he felt very deeply this token of affection ; the expression of confidence was most cheering to him. He would spare no effort to add to the comfort and happiness of his young charges, and trusted they would zealously co-operate with his endeavours to raise the institution to the highest state of efficiency.

The examination in the musical department was, as usual, highly successful; the ability of the "Little Men" was well sustained by the performance of a selection from Lurline, and other favourite pieces, including solos both by the least and most advanced pupils; all rendered with such precision and good effect as to call forth warm commendation. These interesting proceedings ended, the "Little Men" were regaled with plum pudding, cakes, &c., in commemoration of Dr. Mark's birthday; and after terminating a happy day with games and pastimes the boys repaired to their several homes to spend the holidays. The names of the boys who distinguished themselves in the examination are T. J. Ireland, J. Jones, Colbeck, Sibbit, King, Gribbin, Marsden, Field, Hawley, Green, Taylor, Wood, Fairbrother, Higginson, Wheatley, Brunner, Guest, and Shrive. The reports of the Examiners are subjoined:—"To Dr. Mark,—I have great pleasure in forwarding my report of the examination of your 'Little Men.' Their information was tested in the five Books of Moses, the Gospel of St. Luke, and the Church Catechism—doctrinally and practically, and I have very great satisfaction in saying that my expectations have been exceeded by the result. The papers evince very careful teaching on the part of the master, Mr. Powell, and attention and perseverance on the part of your pupils; and from this, the first public test of their examination in general knowledge, I hopefully look forward to the next as calculated to afford you every encouragement to prosecute your great and laudable efforts for the more effectual development of the system you have at heart. I feel thankful that the community possesses an institution such as the Royal College of Music, where, to a sound education in general knowledge, and the study and practice of music, a high moral training is joined, while the social comfort and well-being of the pupils is affectionately considered. I heartily wish you success in the great and good cause, and trust your efforts may meet with the return they so fully deserve.—Believe me, Dr. Mark, very faithfully yours, J. B. Wilkinson, Curate of St. John's, Manchester."

"Having been requested by Dr. Mark to undertake, in conjunction with the Rev. J. B. Wilkinson, the examination of the boys under his care, I have great satisfaction in bearing testimony, both to the general intelligence of the school, and to the soundness of the instruction imparted. The subjects which came more immediately under my notice were Arithmetic, Geography, and English Grammar. I consider the papers generally creditable to the boys, with whose efforts I had every reason to be satisfied, especially that it is a formidable test even for men, much more for boys, to have placed before them a paper of questions unknown to them, with nothing but their memory to help them to the answers. I am decidedly of opinion that Dr. Mark's idea of combining instruction in music with the elements of general education, is not only a reasonable one, but one which, in the present instance, has been eminently successful, and which, I believe, if nationalised, would prove not only attractive, but of the highest service to the lower classes, as tending to rescue many a boy from vice, and, at the same time, to impart to many now without it, a sound, practical, and religious education, at a singularly inexpensive rate. Any benevolent person who may feel disposed to assist Dr. Mark in establishing similar institutions, in other parts of the United Kingdom, and so extend to other boys the benefits now enjoyed by a very limited number, which does not exceed two hundred, would benefit not only the poorer classes, but, as the system has a tendency to raise the boys from a low position to one of respectability and usefulness, society at large. — John Samuel Sidebotham, M.A., Chaplain of New College, Oxford, and Preacher at St. Martin's, Carfax."

THE NOBLEMEN AND GENTLEMEN'S CATCH CLUB.—One of the oldest musical clubs of the Metropolis closed its 99th season on the 6th instant, at the Thatched House, St. James's Street. The professional members present included Mr. Francis, Mr. Benson, Mr. Land, Mr. Cummings, Mr. M. Smith, Mr. Lawler, and the secretary, Mr. Orlando Bradbury. It is proposed to celebrate the centenary of this celebrated club next year.

Concerts.

PRINCE GALITZIN'S SECOND RUSSIAN CONCERT at the St. James's Hall achieved an extraordinary success, the audience not only trebling in number that of the first, but comprising the élite of the musical connoisseurs of the metropolis, who are so rarely seen in a concert-room, except upon some very special occasion. Applause under any circumstances is gratifying, but the genuine enthusiasm with which every piece was received, emanating, as it did, from such very critical hearers, must have been in the highest degree satisfactory to the illustrious chief, whose noble bearing and classical head would at once command attention and make him "the observed of all observers." As a proof of the warm appreciation manifested, there were no less than half-a-dozen encores in a programme numbering fifteen pieces. Two choruses of Bortniansky, "Sanctus" and "Te ergo;" an air of Glinka, sung by Mlle. Parepa; Prince Galitzin's "Pater noster" and "Kozlow" Polka, the latter a delicious musical "sell," which would have made the fortune of poor Jullien; and Glinka's "Mazurka," charmingly played by Miss Arabella Goddard (who modestly contented herself by bowing in lieu of accepting the "bis"), were the morceaux thus honoured. The least effective portions of the selection (no fault of the executants, however,) were the arrangement of Chopin's étude in F minor and "Les adieux de Schubert" (which, by the way, is not "de Schubert") both of which fell somewhat flatly, despite the best efforts of Mad. Sainton-Dolby, Herren Ries and Pollitzen, and Mr. Patey. In addition to the pieces already named, Prince Galitzin contributed the following of his own compositions: Chorus, "Sancta Maria;" Romance for voice, Mad. Sainton-Dolby, with violoncello obbligato, Mons. René Douay; and the Herzen Valse, all of which showed that the Prince was as thoroughly at home in writing for, as he is in conducting an orchestra. Signor Mongini gave a solo of Glinka, from the Russian opera, Life of the Czar, and also joined Mlle. Parepa and Mr. Patey in a trio, from the same pen. A Polacca for orchestra and chorus (Glinka again) brought this most interesting concert to a brilliant termination, and we are glad to learn that a third concert will take place on the 27th inst.

MR. LINDSAY SLOPER'S ANNUAL MORNING CONCERT (June 27) took place at St. James's Hall, and was one of the most attractive of the season. With Mr. Sloper were joined, in the instrumental department, M. Sainton and M. Paque, and in the vocal, Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mlle. Artôt, Mad. Sainton-Dolby, Mr. Sims Reeves, and the English Glee and Madrigal Union. Mr. Sloper played Beethoven's Twenty-four Variations in D major; with Mad. Sherrington and Mr. H. Goodban, Gounod's Serenade for voice, pianoforte, and harmonium; with M. Sainton and M. Paque, Dussek's Trio in F major, for piano, violin, and violoncello; with M. Sainton, Spohr's Rondeau Brillant, in E major, for piano and violin; three mazurkas, by Chopin; and some very original, piquant, and charming pieces of his own composition. The incomparable ease and finish of Mr. Lindsay Sloper's playing were displayed to eminent advantage in Dussek's splendid trio, which on the whole was a grand performance on the part of the three executants. The trio was rescued from almost total oblivion by Miss Arabella Goddard, who introduced it for the first time in public in this country, at her matinée in St. James's Hall (Jan. 1859), and recommended it at once and for ever to all lovers of genuine music and seekers of good music for the pianoforte. The trio excited the greatest attention, and made a real impression. A more faultless performance of Beethoven's fanciful variations we do not remember. If Mr. Sloper possesses one qualification more than another, it is that perfect fluency in which he has no superior. Moreover, his taste and refinement are remarkable, and the musical thinker invariably distinguishes his performance no less than the accomplished executant. The other morceaux played by him, besides those we have mentioned, were not less interesting. The Rondeau of Spohr, in which the playing of M. Sainton was faultless, was entitled to unreserved commendation. A solo on the violoncello, by M. Paque, made up the sum total of the instrumental selection. The vocal music presented nothing novel or particular. Every artist chose a well-known piece, as is the custom at London concerts in the "season." Mr. Sims Reeves sang Mendelssohn's "Hunter's Song;" also the new ballad "I love you," which, both through its own merits, and by virtue of the great tenor's inimitable singing, has become one of the most popular songs of the day, and on this occasion, as on every other, was tumultuously encored. Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington displayed her brilliant vocalisation in Adolphe Adam's "Ah! vous dirai-je, Maman," and Mlle. Artôt exhibited her admirable talent in Handel's "Verdi Prati" and Rossini's "Non piu mesta." Mad. Sainton-Dolby, moreover, showed her artistic versatility in Gluck's "Che farò," and the very pretty ballad "The Skipper and his Boy." The English Glee and Madrigal Union sang Elliott's glee, "Come see what pleasure," and Mr. J. L. Hatton's four-part song, "The homeward watch." The hall was attended by an elegant and fashionable assembly.

Apsley House. — The Duke of Wellington entertained at dinner on the 29th ult., officers of the "Victoria Rifles," of which volunteer regiment His Grace is Colonel. In the course of the evening a selection of vocal music was performed in the Waterloo Gallery, under the direction of Mr. Land, by the members of the London Glee and Madrigal Union, Miss J. Wells, Miss Eyles, Mr. Baxter, Mr. Cummings, Mr. Land, and Mr. Lawler.

Royal Surrey Gardens.—The first of Mr. Balfe's series of three concerts attracted an audience that filled the enormous music hall of the Surrey Gardens in every part, and overflowed into the surrounding grounds. The attractions were sufficient to justify this large attendance, for the programme was, with one exception, devoted exclusively to Mr. Balfe's own music; and the vocal part was supported by Mlle. Parepa, Mad. Weiss, Mad. Laura Baxter, the Misses Brougham, Mr. Weiss, Mr. Kelly, Mr. Perren, and Mr. Sims Reeves. Mlle. Parepa, in the melodious song from Satanella, "The Power of Love," was encored, and the effect was much enhanced by her distinct articulation. The clever trio, "Vorrei parlar," from Falstaff; the laughing trio from The Rose of Castille, sung by the Misses Brougham and Mr. Perren, and encored; the ballad, "In this old chair my father sat," Maid of Honour, sung by Mr. Perren, and also encored; and the song called "The Two Locks of Hair," given by Mr. Weiss with true dramatic expression, were all more or less worthy of notice. Mr. Sims Reeves was, of course, the "lion" of the evening, and on his appearance received the lion's share of applause. He sang the new ballad "I love you" — Mr. Balfe's latest production, and which promises to be as popular as any of his former compositions— with such expression that an enthusiastic encore was the result. Mr. Reeves instantly complied. His next piece, a new song, entitled "The British Volunteer," composed by Signor Alary expressly for this occasion, was also redemanded; but no sooner had Mr. Reeves commenced the song a second time than a scene took place, alike disgraceful to the audience and creditable to the vocalist. After Mr. Reeves had for some time vainly endeavoured to make himself heard, he bowed and retired. The Misses Brougham then appeared, but were also compelled to retire. The disturbance continued some minutes, when Mr. Reeves again ascended the platform, and was received with deafening applause. No sooner, however, were the first notes uttered of Signor Alary's "Volunteer" than the tumult again began, and the singer was again compelled to retreat. Mr. Balfe, after some time, succeeded in obtaining a hearing, and asked the audience what they wanted. Amid the indiscriminate shouts that followed, disjointed words were at times audible, supposed to have reference to certain songs which our great tenor has made popular, and the audience wished to hear, although they had not come to a decision as to which of them was to be sung. Mr. Balfe now said that Signor Alary, whose song they had encored, was in the hall; but all to no purpose. Mr. Reeves again appeared, and was again received enthusiastically, but had no sooner, for the third time, recited the opening lines,

"Let others long for sleek repose,
I'm never happy when at rest —" than the disgraceful scene was resumed. To cut the Gordian knot, Mr. Balfe then announced that Mr. Sims Reeves would sing his last song, and, as if to shew his superiority to his audience, the great tenor gave "Then you'll remember me," with infinite pathos and effect. The audience were unconscionable enough to raise another cry of "encore," and Mr. Sims Reeves, with the utmost good humour, unhesitatingly acceded to the unreasonable demand, and repeated the last verse. We cannot contrast too strongly the extreme forbearance, the imperturbable good nature, and the willingness of Mr. Sims Reeves to make any concession, short of offering an insult to a brother musician, by singing another song as an encore to his composition; in other words, the thoroughly gentlemanlike behaviour of the vocalist, and the obstinate, deliberate, selfish cruelty —the intense vulgarity, in fact — that distinguishes a portion of the Surrey Gardens audience. The only reproach that could possibly be made to Mr. Reeves is that he showed almost too great solicitude to flatter the caprices of a turbulent minority. It is really time that such disturbances should cease. It is scandalous that Mr. Sims Reeves can never sing on the other side of the river without subjecting himself to persecution of this kind; and in the interest of art we protest against our greatest English singer injuring his voice for the mere purpose of gratifying unreasoning selfishness. We trust that for the future Mr. Reeves will not submit to such dictation, but refuse to sing more than the number of times that his name is mentioned in the programme. We feel sure that he will be supported by all well-judging persons.

Signor Billetta's Matinée took place at Campden House, Kensington, on Tuesday week. Fortunately the day was fine, and the aristocratic visitors were afforded an opportunity of varying the agremens of the concert by a promenade in the beautiful pleasure grounds. Mesds. Borghi-Mamo, Lemmens-Sherrington, Rieder, and Lemaire; M. Depret, Signors Neri-Baraldi, Solieri, Cimino, Dragone, and Mr. Patey, were the singers. The special features in the performances were a romanza by Broga, sung to perfection by Mad. Borghi-Mamo, and unanimously encored; the "Shadow song," from Dinorah, by Mad. Sherrington; and a very pleasing duet of Signor Billetta's composition, sung by the same lady and Signor Solieri; the "Pappataci" trio from the Italiana in Algeri, by Signors Solieri and Cimino, and Mr. Patey; and Signor Billetta's song, "Lettre au bon Dieu," by M. Depret.

Herr Louis Engel's Annual Matinée, which was given at 13 Gloucester Place, Portman Square, on the 29th ult., was a brilliant affair, highly patronised, fashionably attended, with a capital selection, performed by unexceptionable artists. Herr Engel, one of the most admirable players ever heard in this or any other country on the harmonium, an instrument fast rising into fashion and repute, chose for his solos a fantasia on Don Pasquale, a fantasia on Irish and Scotch airs, and Garibaldi's March, all his own composition, the last a "palpable hit." The ease and finish of his playing on an instrument almost as refractory as an organ are indeed remarkable, and none but a performer on the harmonium can estimate such talent at its true value. Herr Becker on the violin, and Messrs. Blumenthal and Ritter on the piano, gave pieces of their own composition. A new song, "Comment est ce arrivé," written by Herr Engel, was given by that admirable artist, M. Jules Lefort, with great effect, and is likely, from the graceful character of the melody, to become very popular. Three of the choruses from the repertory of the Orphéonistes, which produced the most effect at the Crystal Palace, were performed, viz., "Les Enfants de Paris," "La Retraite," and "The Recruit." Vocal pieces were also contributed by Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mlle. Parepa, and Signor Solieri.

Mr. John Thomas's Concert was given at the Hanover Square Rooms, on Monday, the 2nd inst. It opened with the "Meditation on a prelude of Sebastian Bach," by Gounod, a piece well adapted to exhibit the thorough mastery which Mr. Thomas has acquired over the harp. He was ably supported by Herr Becker on the violin, and Herr Engel on the harmonium. A descriptive piece composed by himself, entitled "Winter, ending with a Hymn," is extremely ingenious, and was received with loud applause. Two pieces, the first his own composition, entitled "La Meditation," and described as a "Rapsodie," followed by Alver's "Danse des Fées," were eminently successful. His other contributions were "L'Esperance," designated as a Mazurka; a "Grand Studio," entitled "Imitazione del Mandolino"; "March of the Men of Harlech," his own composition; and Handel's

"Harmonious Blacksmith." Herr Ernst Lubeck executed two pieces of his own on the pianoforte. The singers were Mlle. Artôt, Miss Augusta Thomson, M. Depret, and M. Jules Lefort.

MLLE. FINOLI'S MATINÉE MUSICALE was given on Monday, the 2nd inst. Mesdames C. Hayes and Rieder, Signori Oliva, Fortuna, Delle Sedie, and Solieri, assisted as vocalists, and Signor Pezze and Signor Regondi as instrumentalists. Mlle. Finoli possesses great talent, which has been improved and refined by education. Her fine, real mezzo voce was heard to perfection in one of Rossini's brilliant airs. Mad. Rieder astonished all with her flute-like variations, and was encored unanimously. The matinée was held in Messrs. Collards' new rooms, and was well attended. Mlle. Finoli, who is a person of superior birth, has many friends among the upper classes of English society, and is largely patronised by amateurs and connoisseurs of rank.

MR. AND MAD. R. SIDNEY PRATTEN'S MATINÉE MUSICALE, given under the most distinguished patronage, on Thursday, June 21, at Messrs. Collards' new concert room, was a very elegant affair, and attracted a large crowd of fashionables. The vocalists were Mad. Rieder, Miss Augusta Thomson, Mad. Louisa Vinning, Miss Palmer, M. Depret, and Mr. Santley; the instrumentalists—Mr. W. G. Cusins (pianoforte), Mad. Pratten (guitar), and Messrs. Pratten and Rockstro (flutes). The concert commenced with a novelty in the shape of a quintet for flute, violin, two altos, and violoncello, by Kuhlau, which received every justice at the hands of Messrs. Pratten, Willy, Webb, Hann, and Pettit. The remaining instrumental performances consisted of solos on the flute and guitar by Mr. and Mad. Pratten, and on the pianoforte by Mr. W. G. Cusins. Mr. Pratten—one of our most eminent professors of the instrument, and, as we need scarcely inform our readers, first flute of the Royal Italian Opera band—played two fantasias of his own composition, one on Marie Stuart, the other on the Trovatore, both with the greatest success, using his New Perfected Flute with the old system of fingering. Mr. Pratten's splendid tone and brilliant execution excited universal admiration. Mad. Pratten—one of the most accomplished guitar players in the country—having sprained her left hand a few days previously, could only introduce one piece in consequence, and that with so much distress as to make it painful to look at the fair artist playing. In her performance, nevertheless, of a "serenade" and "Lord Raglan's March," both by C. J. Pratten, she exhibited those admirable qualities of execution and style which place her in the very foremost rank of legitimate guitarists. Of the vocal music the most effective performances were the grand air from the Etoile du Nord, for soprano and two flutes, sung by Mad. Rieder, with Messrs. Pratten and Rockstro as accompanists, and the trio from Spohr's Zemira ed Azor, "Senn' fugge l'ombra intorno," by Mad. Rieder, Misses Augusta Thomson and Palmer. We may mention, too, a new Italian canzone, "O tu'l più bel sospir," written by Mr. Sidney Pratten—a graceful and melodious composition—given by Miss Augusta Thomson. Mr. Santley introduced the romance from Dinorah, "O live, or let me die;" and M. Depret—who although he is not a Duprez, is, nevertheless, a good tenor—sang some couplets by Clapisson, and a romanza by Schubert; and, to conclude, Miss Palmer gave Mr. Hatton's song, "The Sailor's Wife;" and Mad. Louisa Vinning sang "Vedrai carino," and the Scotch ballad, "Within a mile of Edinbro'."

THE ORPHEONISTES IN THE CATTLE MARKET.—On Thursday a Court of Common Council was held in the Guildhall, the Lord Mayor presiding. There was a large attendance of members. Mr. J. Stewart moved "that it be referred to the Markets Improvement Committee to consider whether it is expedient to return the sum of £350, which has been paid into the Chamber for the occupation, during a fortnight, of the two hotels at the Metropolitan Cattle Market by the Orphéonistes of France." He did not, he said, attach any blame to the committee in any way, as they had never treated with the Orphéonistes direct in any way; but, under all the circumstances, he thought it would be a graceful compliment to return the money. Mr. Deputy Holt seconded the motion, which gave rise to a desultory discussion, in the course of which it was explained, on the part of the committee, that they had treated the whole affair as one of speculation, between M. Delaporte and his agents, on the one hand, and the Crystal Palace Company on the other; and it was represented that the money, even if returned, would not reach the hands of the ill-treated Orphéonistes themselves. It was also stated that in addition to the rent of £350, it had been agreed that the Orphéonistes, or their managers, should insure the hotels, and pay any taxes that might be demanded owing to their occupation, and it appeared further that the entire expense connected with that occupation exceeded £1,300, no less a sum than £500 having been paid to various army contractors for the hire of the wretched straw beds, &c., with which they lately were supplied. It was further stated that the Crystal Palace Company had guaranteed a sum of £5,000 towards the expenses incurred by the Orphéonistes, and ultimately an amendment in favour of the "previous question" was carried by a large majority. So the motion was lost.

BADEN-BADEN.—The season has been inaugurated this year by a political prelude, which, it is said, is merely the precursor of a European Concert, the programme of which was determined here. Let us hope that, in the performance, there will be no discords or unexpected modulations, and that the future which is in store for us does not resemble the "Music of the Future," but that of Palestrina, pure and serene, and, despite all its richness, never overstepping the bounds of perfect harmony. The musical season began with a concert, to be followed by a great many more, at which, as during all preceding seasons, we shall have the most celebrated artists of Paris. It is very true that the programme of a musical concert is not to be compared to the peculiar concert we mentioned above; still it is attended by difficulties of its own, which the public, and, unfortunately, even the artists themselves, do not sufficiently take into consideration. What would you say of an opera libretto, in which several airs or several duets followed each other? You would say, and very justly, that it was badly arranged; for one of the first conditions of a good book is variety. Again, the composer who should write several pieces of an opera in the same key, in the same tune, and of the same character, would run the risk of your accusing him of a want of discernment and an ignorance of effect! Well, the very same thing holds good of a programme; several slow pieces in succession; two bravura airs, one after the other, or three pieces in the same key, may render a concert monotonous, not to say an absolute bore, though all this has nothing to do with the first concert given here. A fragment of Hummel's celebrated Septet opened the proceedings, and was capitally played by MM. Alexander Billet, Rucquoy, Doerschel, Stenebrüggen, Grodvolle, Cosmann, and Hartmann. M. Cosmann gave some pieces on the violoncello; Gleichauf, a violinist of the school of Vieuxtemps, whom he resembles especially in quality of tone, played a "rêverie" and a fantasia by his master. Alexander Billet, the favourite pianist of the Nice public, besides executing with remarkable vigour and correctness his part in the septet, made quite a sensation in a brilliant and sparkling rondo of Weber. Mlle. Sanchioli introduced "Una voce" and a cavatina from La Donna del Lago. This lady might be reminded, however, of the maxim of Buffon—"Style makes the man," or at least of the golden truth, that style makes the artist.

The third and fourth concerts were superb, thanks more particularly to M. Laub, the violinist, who shines especially as an interpreter of classical music, though this in no way prevents his playing with equal success such difficult pieces as Ernst's Otello, &c. Herr Laub performed, with Mlle. Caussemille and M. Cosmann, fragments from one of Beethoven's trios, for piano, violin, and violoncello, and Mlle. Caussemille the variations and finale from Beethoven's sonata dedicated to Kreutzer. Mlle. Caussemille has made great progress during the last two years; neatness, elegance, and feeling being among the valuable qualities she has attained. A violinist of the name of Didio, previously unknown to us, did not meet with a very flattering reception. His play is monotonous, and, moreover, he chose pieces ill suited to his talent. In the vocal department we have not been lucky. Up to this moment, the only singer worth naming has been a young Hungarian, Mlle. Litschner, who, in 1859, carried off the first prize at the Paris Conservatory, and sang last winter at Marseilles.

ARNHEIM.—A grand music festival is to take place at Arnheim (Holland), on the 9th, 10th, and 11th August, the more interesting from the fact of its being given by the famous society Maatscheppi, which, on such occasions (happening once every six or seven years) invariably distinguishes itself. The programme looks very promising. In addition to Handel's Samson, we find Ferdinand Hiller's Lorelei, Caenen's Elie, the overture and choruses of Van Eijken's Lucifer, Mendelssohn's Lobgesang, a new symphony by Verhulst, and Beethoven's No. 7 (in A major). The last day is set apart for a concert, in which many renowned artists will take part.

ST. JAMES'S HALL.—The new concert-hall in Regent Street (St. James's Hall) is magnificent; we have nothing like it in Paris. Situated in the finest quarter of London, in the midst of amusements and business, it is capable of accommodating more than 2000 persons, comfortably seated in sofa-stalls (a luxurious refinement previously unknown), or in spacious, well-ventilated galleries. In the evening it is splendidly lighted by a system of stars which hang from the ceiling, like comets with flaming tresses, and appear to glisten in a firmament of gold and azure. This superb edifice is the result of the intelligent and bold spirit of enterprise which distinguishes Mr. Chappell, one of the first music-publishers in England, or rather in Europe, to whom the arts are already deeply indebted. There is a grand concert of religious and classical music every Monday at St. James's Hall. The works of Handel, Mendelssohn, and S. Bach, as well as the last inspirations of Beethoven, and all the great masterpieces of the German school, are played to perfection by the first artists of the day: Miss Goddard, the classical pianist, par excellence; Sainton, the admirable violinist; Piatti; and the most famous virtuosi who reside in London, or merely visit it during the season. The hall is never empty. Twenty-seven of these Monday Concerts have already been given, and yet it is no easy matter to obtain seats. Attached to the Hall is a large restaurant (for it would not do to forget the material and substantial part of the business), and the rent of it is 50,000 francs a year.—F. A. FIORENTINO.

SCARBOROUGH.—Tuesday evening's concert at the Music Hall was rendered interesting by the engagement of Miss Susanna Cole, a much and deservedly admired metropolitan vocalist, occasionally one of the musical attractions at the Crystal Palace. This young lady possesses a most charming voice of good compass, with perfect intonation, and she has moreover the happy auxiliary of a graceful and appropriate manner. She sang the "Di Piacer" of Rossini with a fluency and taste that made the old song new again; and in her selection from the opera of Lurline, she was equally at home. Her rendering of Meyerbeer's "Robert, toi que j'aime," shewed her ability in another line; and the pretty ballad by Macfarren, "The beating of my own heart," was given with a simplicity of feeling combined with expression that rivetted the attention of her audience. Every song was re-demanded."—Scarborough Gazette.

MR. BUCKSTONE'S BENEFIT ADDRESS, delivered at the Haymarket Theatre, on Wednesday evening, July 11th:—

"Ladies and Gentlemen,—According to custom on these occasions, I appear before you, not only to give an account of my stewardship, but to touch upon various topics connected with this theatre, and which I think may interest you; but when I begin to consider my various topics, I find that I have very few to touch upon, and therefore feel like the celebrated needy knife-grinder who had no story to tell, or his cousin the well-known New Zealander, but with no dramatic ruins to contemplate. The volunteer movement has already been well and deservedly expatiated on by the press; the exploits of Garibaldi are not exactly suitable themes for the address of a theatrical manager; and although the recent state of the weather might afford me a very fruitful subject, yet we only talk about the weather when we have really nothing else to say; and I do not think you would be particularly interested if I were to discuss the question of church rates. Still, there is one gratifying subject that I can dwell upon, and that is the constant success which attends this theatre. Whatever may be the cause of such success—whether it may be the skill and enterprise of the management, the good character of the house, the popularity of the actors, or the talent of the authors, it will not become me to assert. I can only say that we are always successful here, and I am quite satisfied with knowing that pleasant fact; while to prove this, ladies and gentlemen, I have but to inform you that our last long season, which we brought to a close in July, 1858, extended to one thousand four hundred and twenty-eight nights; that after a short recess for repairs we commenced the present season on the 7th of September in the same year, and have continued open ever since, this being its five hundred and sixtieth night. During this time we have produced some of the most popular comedies of the day—The Contested Election and The Overland Route by Tom Taylor; Everybody's Friend by Sterling Coyne; The Family Secret and Does he Love Me? by Mr. Falconer; all of whom are again at work for the Haymarket. Other comedies, by well-tried authors, have also been produced; and these, with many representations of the standard drama, of new and old farces, with Christmas pantomimes, Easter pieces, and ballets, and all supported by an unrivalled company of performers, and received with approbation by you, have achieved that genuine success of which I hope I may be allowed to boast. And now, ladies and gentlemen, for want of any particular topic on which to discourse, I will endeavour to explain one thing to you, and that is a manager's benefit. The question has often been put to me, some saying, 'What do you mean by taking a benefit—isn't it your benefit every night?' I believe there are a few managers in town and country who would say, 'Decidedly not.' But a manager's benefit may be thus explained:—He pays throughout the year large sums of money to his tradespeople, to his gas company, timber merchant, ropemaker, draper, ironmonger, basket-worker, upholsterer, cabinet-maker, stationer, printer, modeller, tailor, milliner, dyer, hairdresser, and many other tradespeople that I cannot just now remember—though I shall recollect them when their bills come in. These tradespeople make the manager some return by patronising his night. Then there are his personal friends, to whom he occasionally gives an order or a private box; they think it but right and proper to be paying parties on such an occasion:—then there are the manager's unknown friends amongst the public, and I am happy to see, by the attendance of to-night, that this manager numbers many such. They also flock on these occasions to prove their regard, and to hear what the manager has to say for himself. Sometimes members of the dramatic profession will show their unanimity by patronising a brother or a sister performer, and I feel much gratified by informing you that to-night a celebrated brother actor—attached to this theatre—has not only taken a box, but has paid for it handsomely. This combination secures a good house and a good sum for the manager's pocket. Then why should he refuse to take it? Who ever refuses to take money? I am sure you will believe me when I tell you in confidence, that from the politician to the player, it is an objection that I never knew insisted on. With respect to the future, ladies and gentlemen, every exertion will be made to sustain the high character of this theatre. New comedies and many other novelties are in preparation. There will again be a pantomime at Christmas—a fairy tale at Easter; recruits will be enlisted to strengthen our corps, and as I am now making arrangements extending to this time next year, there is every probability of the doors of this establishment remaining open for many a merry month to come; while, with the one hundred and thirty thousand volunteers belonging to the country, added to the thousands of volunteers who throughout the year march in here at pit, box, and gallery, I think I may feel assured that not only England, but the Haymarket Theatre, is quite safe. Now, ladies and gentlemen, in thanking you for the brilliant assembly of this evening, I bid you farewell, but only until to-morrow, and beg to say that, during our recess of twenty hours, we shall be diligently occupied in sleeping, dining, and reading the newspapers. We shall be quite ready to face our audience again at the "ringing in" of the overture at seven o'clock to-morrow night.

The most telling points of the speech were received with vehement expressions of approval, and Mr. Buckstone retired in the midst of a perfect ovation. The performances concluded with the amusing farce of The Happiest Day of My Life.

THE ACTRESS AND THE DRESSMAKER.—The director of the Ambigu Theatre, M. de Chilly, recently engaged Mlle. Suzanne Lagier, the actress, at 20f. a night, to play the part of the Reine Bacchanale, in the drama of Le Juif-Errant, which drama is now being performed at his house. A few days back a dressmaker, named Bayol, put in an opposition to the payment of the salary to the extent of 500f. due to her from the actress for goods supplied. But Mlle. Lagier notified in due legal form to the director that if he did not pay her every night 20f. before the curtain rose, she would not go on the stage. Under these circumstances, he cited both the claimants before the Civil Tribunal, to have it decided what he was to do, and the case was heard on Saturday. The actress represented that she absolutely needed the 20f. a day to maintain herself, while the dressmaker insisted that her debt should be paid, but she offered to take it in instalments of 5f. a day; the director, on his side, prayed that the actress should be made to execute her engagement with him. The Tribunal decided that of the 20f. a day, the dressmaker should have 5f., and the actress 15f.; also that the latter should continue to perform under pain of paying the director 20f. a day for the space of one month, after which time the Court would give a further decision.

SIMS REEVES'S newest and most popular Ballad is "I love YOU," composed expressly for him by Balfe. "I love you" was sung by Mr. Reeves, and enthusiastically encored, at Mr. G. W. Martin's Concert, Exeter Hall, Mr. Lindsay Sloper's and Miss Susannah Cole's Concerts, St. James's Hall, and will be sung at Mr. Balfe's Benefit Concert at the Royal Surrey Gardens, and at the Crystal Palace Concerts. London, published, price 3s., by Duncan Davison & Co., 244 Regent Street, W.

MEYERBEER'S FOURTH MARCHE AUX FLAMBEAUX ("Royal Wedding March"), composed in honour of the Marriage of the Princess Royal of England with Prince Frederick William of Prussia, which was played with such immense effect by the Band of the Guides at the Fête of the Orphéonistes at the Crystal Palace, is published for the Pianoforte, price 4s., by Duncan Davison & Co., 244 Regent Street, London, W.

"I LOVE YOU," New Song by BALFE, composed expressly for Mr. SIMS REEVES, and sung by him with the greatest success, is published, price 3s. by Duncan Davison & Co. 244 Regent Street, W.

"GOOD NIGHT," New Song by A. REICHARDT, Composer of "Thou art so near and yet so far," is published, with English and German Words, and a Portrait of Herr Reichardt, price 2s. 6d. by Duncan Davison & Co. 244 Regent Street, W.

"I WOULD I WERE A BUTTERFLY," by A. SCHLOESSER, sung with immense applause by Mad. LEMMENS-SHERRINGTON, is published, price 2s. 6d. by Duncan Davison & Co. 244 Regent Street, W.

NEW SONGS by J. W. DAVISON, "Rough wind that moanest loud" (sung by Mr. Santley at the Monday Popular Concerts); "Swifter far than Summer's flight," (sung by Miss Palmer at the Monday Popular Concerts); "False friend, wilt thou smile or weep," Beatrice's song in the Cenci (sung by Madame Sainton-Dolby, at the Monday Popular Concerts, St. James's Hall); are published by Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201 Regent Street.

The above Songs form Nos. 1, 2, and 3 of Vocal Illustrations of Shelley.

"Mr. Santley was encored in one of the thoroughly picturesque and poetical settings of Shelley, by Mr. J. W. Davison, mentioned a week or two since. His song, 'Rough wind that moanest loud,' is a thoroughly good song."—Athenæum.

"Madame Sainton-Dolby's greatest efforts were called forth by Mendelssohn's 'Night' song, and Mr. J. W. Davison's 'False friend, wilt thou smile or weep' (from Shelley's 'Cenci'), to both of which she did the amplest justice. The latter work is one of the most poetical and beautiful of the 'Vocal Illustrations of Shelley,' composed by Mr. Davison many years ago, and which, though rarely heard, possess far more sterling merit than nine-tenths of the most admired songs of the day. A more intellectual treatment of the words could not well be imagined. Mr. Davison has completely caught the spirit of the poetry, and heightened its beauty by the potent charms which belong only to the sister art. 'False friend, wilt thou smile or weep,' sung to perfection by Madame Sainton-Dolby, was enthusiastically applauded."

MUSIC AND THEATRES IN PARIS.

July 18, 1860.

THE most remarkable feature in my this week's not over rich budget of news, is the extraordinary success which has attended the return of M. Roger to the Opéra Comique, the birthplace of his two-fold fame as a singer and an actor. It was not necessary to sit on the tripod at Delphi in order to foretell that his welcome back to his artistic home would be a warm one, but it would have been a bold venture for the prophets' mantle to predict that he would draw a succession of overflowing houses in the height of the summer season. Yet such is the fact, and money is, on his nights of performance, refused at the doors. He made his re-appearance in La Dame Blanche, which he continues to play on alternate nights. Mad. Ugalde, whose return has been almost equally successful, appearing in the intervals in Galatée and l'Ambassadrice. The consequenc of this prosperous condition of things is that Le Petit Chaperon Rouge and Mad. Faure's début therein are postponed sine die. A. M. Laget, late of the Toulouse Theatre, has presented himself for approval to the patrons of the Opéra Comique. He made his first appearance in the character of Tracolin, in Le Toseador, and showed himself possessed of certain sterling qualities, but with a certain outward crust of provincialism, of which he must rid himself without delay. M. Roger will be shorly off for Baden; but before he goes he is to sing in the Domino Noir with Mad. Ugalde.

At the Grand Opéra they have been giving Semiramis three times a week. The Prophète is being rehearsed, and will be shortly produced with Mad. Tedesco and Gueymard. Michot, I understand, is shortly to try his strength in the part of Raoul in Les Huguenots.

The much praised prima donna, Mlle. Emy Lagrua, of whom I gave you some intelligence last week in mentioning her recent appearance at Pesth, where in the character of Norma, and in that of Leonora in the Trovatore, she displayed her fine dramatic power, splendid voice, and broad noble style, to the intense gratification of M. Salvi's subscribers,—Mlle. Lagrua—I must repeat her name after the long-winded parenthesis its mention has imposed upon me, which if there be any truth in fame will often enough have to repeat it—Mlle. Lagrua—I say once more—is shortly expected in Paris, where she is to make a sojourn of some six weeks, until it be time to return to St. Petersburg, where she has an engagement on the most brilliant terms for the next two years. Now is the time, therefore, for one of your London impresarii to persuade the great Emy to emigrate at some future day towards your shores.

Mad. Charton Demeur has, I am informed, just entered into a contract to perform next season at the opera in Madrid. There is also a good time coming for the dilettante of Bologna, where Mad. Borghi-Mamo is engaged for the autumn season, to whom have just been added M. and Mad. Barbot. The manager is mounting Le Prophète for them, in which Mad. Borghi-Mamo will sing the part of Fidès, Mad. Barbot that of Bertha, and M. Barbot will personate John of Leyden. I hear nothing more of Mad. Miolan-Carvalho's Spanish engagement. In the meantime, it is settled that she is to sing in September at Berlin, where the director of the Royal Theatres has engaged her for twelve performances. I have just said that Le Prophète was being got up at Bologna; it is also to be one of the operas produced in the course of the ensuing season at the Carcano in Milan. It is evident, therefore, that Meyerbeer is at last making a rapid conquest of the Italians, and that at the moment they are proudly throwing off the yoke of German arms, they are about to yield a long deferred submission to the dominion of Teutonic art. Is there not some mysterious connection between liberty and the æsthetic genius of the north which would account for their simultaneous change of taste and of political condition? Some such musical metaphysician as Wagner might write a pretty disquisition on this theme, only I shouldn't like to read it.

Having worked round to Germany and German musicians, the occasion is opportune to tell you that the veteran Moscheles is at present in Paris, where he intends to remain a fortnight. In exchange we have despatched Litolff to Wiesbaden, to organise a musical festival, to take place there on the 24th of August. The operatic season has commenced at Vienna. Among the remarkable features of the programme, I may mention the production of the Pardon de Ploermel; of L'Enfant des Landes, an opera in four acts, by M. Rubinstein; of Wanda, by M. Doppler; of Alma, by M. Thomas Loewe; and lastly of The Phantom Ship, by Richard Wagner. Mlle. Trassini is to sing the part of Dinorah, and MM. Bech and Walter will be the Hoel and the Corentin. M. Forst, the manager of the Josephstadt Theatre, has just obtained the privilege of building a new theatre, the site of which is to be at Fünfhaus. It should have been, were there such a place, at Siebenhaus, for it will be the seventh theatrical edifice possessed by the Austrian capital.

You will rejoice to hear a fact I have to inform you of about Joachim the celebrated violinist and director of the Court music at Hanover. The emoluments of his post have been doubled. From what you (Ed. M. W.) and I know of his character and his complete absorption in his art, to the exclusion of all worldly considerations, it is very certain that his good fortune will affect him far less than it does his friends. At Stockholm MM. Vieuxtemps and Ole Bull have been giving a series of concerts, not conjointly be it understood. The first-named artist chose the inopportune period when the coronation festivals were going on, and was consequently less successful than his fellow artist. He has been compensated, however, by the honour of being elected a member of the Musical Academy of Sweden, and being decorated with the order of Vasa. The violinist in question being a Belgian, I may without too violent a transition introduce a little musical gossip concerning that part of the world, cruelly designated by Charlotte Bronte le royaume de Labasse court. M. de Beriot, the celebrated violinist, has been gratifying a select circle of friends with several fragments of a comic opera composed by him while in Russia, the orchestral parts of which were scored by M. Gevaert. The work is said to contain a number of light, fresh, and original melodies; but as it is to be produced next winter at the Opéra Comique in Paris, we shall have an opportunity of revising the judgment of the composer's perhaps too partial friends.

The Société Godefroid of Namur has been getting up a grand festival after the German fashion, to come off on the 22nd. Haydn's Seasons, the words translated by Roger, will be executed by a large number of artists and amateurs, under the direction of M. Haussens. The orchestra will consist of two hundred instrumentalists, selected from among the best performers of Belgium and other countries. The Conservatoire of Brussels will take part in the festival, and the chief performers of the Brussels Opera, viz. MM. Wicart, Carman, de Poitier, and Mesds. H. and A. Haynsa and P. Ranés. The season at Spa is said to have commenced somewhat languidly, notwithstanding the excellent intentions of the director of the establishment there. Herr Laub the German violinist will perform at the earliest concerts given, and Mad. Miolan-Carvalho is expected on the 27th.

Having, in gathering scraps of fact, gossip, and rumour, for the edification of your readers, made the grand tour of Europe, I return whence I started, to gay Paris, but not to a gay subject. Poor Goria, whose death I announced in my last, has been laid in his last resting-place. The funeral ceremony was performed in the church of Notre Dame de Lorette, and was attended by almost every musical artist of distinction now in Paris, and by a great number of ladies, pupils of the deceased composer. Bataille sang the adagio from the Sonate Pathétique of Beethoven, for which poor Goria had a special affection, in a voice betraying the deep emotion of the singer. His remains were followed to the cemetery by a numerous concourse of friends and fellow labourers, among whom he has left the sincerest regret.

On Saturday last the section of Beaux Arts at the Imperial Institute pronounced their decision on the competition for the prix de Rome, awarded to the best musical composition. The successful competitor was M. Emile Paladilhé, who has scarcely attained his sixteenth year. He is a pupil of M. F. Halévy, and Auber is reported to have said of him, with prophetic discernment as far back as five years ago, "ce sera un compositeur." The second grand prize was carried off by M. A. Deslaudres, a pupil of M. Leborne; and M. Isidore Edouard Legouix was honorably mentioned. The latter is a pupil of Ambroise Thomas and Reber.

As you have got the International Statistical Congress sitting in London, it may gratify them to know that the receipts by theatres, concerts, balls, and spectacles of all kinds, during the month of June, amounted to 1,029,170 fr. 22 centimes.

JOSEPH HARTMANN STUNTZ.

(From a Foreign Contributor.)

Munich, July 20, 1859.—A rare man and artist departed this life within these few days, and thousands, deeply grieved, stood at a tomb that conceals a man whose fame after death will—as Providence often wills it—by far outshine the acknowledgment paid to the deceased in his lifetime.

Joseph Hartmann Stuntz was the son of Johannes Stuntz, who descended from small tillers of vines in Ichtingen, in Brisgow.

Let us first speak of the father, in whom we find a strong and energetic nature, full of the then germinating idea of the fulfilment of the rights of human nature, and we find a man, having made his own education, who merely by his energy arrived to get attainments in all the branches of science and of art.

Johannes Stuntz lived in Paris in the years of 187– –, where he studied the art of landscape painting, and by studying the works of Gluck and other authentical composers, devoted himself at the same time to the study of classical music After various changes he went through, partly as landscape painter, partly, in the first years of the Revolution, as a zealous officer in the Garde Nationale, and afterwards as officer in the Corps du Génie, in Strassburgh, and later as Commissaire Civil in the then called Département du Jura, we meet him in the summer, 1793,—in consequence of his eager part he took in the political troubles in France,—at Arlesheim, in Switzerland, in the present Canton Basil; his having lived there quite retired, he now was at leisure to give up himself with zeal to his vocation as gouache painter, and as such he is on the same level with Philip Hackert.

In the splendid and far-famed park and gardens near Arlesheim, the possessor of the same at that time, Baron d'Andlaw, offered to Johannes Stuntz a small house, in which Joseph Hartmann was born on the 23d of July, 1793.

During the time of the Directoire the family Stuntz returned to France, first to Chaumont and then to Strassburgh. In Strassburgh it was that the eminent musical talent of Joseph Hartmann, then scarcely seven years old, captivated the attention of his father and of some of his friends in a high degree. Almost exclusively, the father occupied himself with the musical cultivation of his young son, who, after the battle of Austerlitz, composed a reception march for the return of the Garde Artillerie, and soon after, when a Te Deum of his was performed at the Minster in Strassburgh, the dilettanti there crowned the young composer, now fourteen years old, on the choir of the Minster with a wreath of laurel. As the father saw in the perpetual summons to the army of the Napoleonisme at that time no welfare for his gifted and talented sons (a younger son, who died early, showed an extraordinary talent for sculpture), he made up his mind to leave Strassburgh, and relying upon the circumstance that—from that time he was in the army—he was known to his colonel the Duke Max., afterwards King Max. I. of Bavaria, he went to live in that country.

Scarcely arrived in Munich with his family, King Max. I. ordered at once that Joseph Hartmann is to be admitted in the Royal Chapel, and fixed at the same time that the Maître de Chapelle at that time, Von Winter, is to be his master.

Soon after, Joseph Hartmann Stuntz left for Vienna with a royal stipend, in order to profit of the instruction of the clever and spirited Salieri, but it only lasted a short time, because then the Bavarian and Viennese Courts were not on good terms, and therefore Stuntz was obliged to leave Vienna, and only was able to return again to this capital in the year 1815 to continue his studies with Salieri, and there it was, no doubt, that Stuntz at the side of a master like Salieri, and by the impression of the then new works of Beethoven, appropriated himself, his technical attainments, and the severeness, profoundness, and solidity of his musical judgment, which so very much distinguished him.

In the year 1816 he returned to Munich, where he at once was appointed Maestro at the New Italian Opera.

In the year 1818 he was given in marriage to Fräulein Marie Appenburg von Schaden, a lady who, besides her intellect and high education, also was a thorough musician, and as such an able alto, having been taught by Tersechini's method. In the same year Stuntz got leave to go to Italy, where, having been commissioned by the Scala, he composed in 1819 an opera, La Rapresaglia, which was received with so much approbation that it was performed sixty times running, and Stuntz got the title of Maestro di Cartello; in 1820 he was called to Venice, where he composed for the Fenice, the opera Costantino, which was received with great acclamations.

Returned home in the meantime, he composed in Munich the operette Charlot, or the Foster Brothers, a work distinguished by the sweetness of its melodies. Soon after, he again was called to Italy, to Turin this time, where he composed for the Royal Opera in the Carnevale of 1821–22 the opera Dalmiro ed Argone, and immediately after he had to go to Milan, where he composed in the Carnevale 1823 the comic opera Elvira e Lucindo. On account of his having not been well he was obliged to refuse a calling to Rome to the Argentina.

Returned to Munich in 1823, he was made Vice-maître de Chapelle, and Director of the Vocal Music at the Royal Opera, and in 1825, after Winter's death, King Louis appointed him as First Maître de Chapelle.

Now begins his more local activity, partly by his compositions of masses and psalms, both in the strict and free style, of cantatas and overtures, and partly by instrumentations. The profoundness of his knowing he imbibed in Italy by the study of the works of the old classical composers, he first showed in a splendid cantata which he composed for the obsequies of Clara Vesperman, a celebrated German singer. At this time he wrote over again the opera Das Donauweibchen (the Nymph of the Danube), and composed a cantata for the inauguration of the synagogue in Munich. In 1828 the first vocal society was established in Munich, which was very considerable, then called the "Liederkranz," and which Stuntz accepted to conduct. Now Stuntz entered a new phasis for his activity, namely, as a German liedersänger (minstrel, or composer of lays as quartetts, choruses, &c. &c.), and as such he created works which alone secure him the duration of his fame.

Some of the poems of King Louis were among the first ones he was glad to accept, as "Sonnet to my Wife," and the "Bavarian Schützenmarch."

In 1833, when King Louis returned from Greece, Stuntz received him with the "Heldengesang in Walhalla," the real type of the German pithy and energetic strain, since then spread over the world, and adapted in many languages, with different patriotic words put to it. A sequence of "Gesänge" may perhaps be translated by national songs for more than one voice; though "Gesänge" are a style of songs peculiar to Germany, as "Deutcher Gruss" (German Greeting); "An mein Vaterland" (To my Fatherland); "The Banquetlied," composed for the Artists' Festival in 1840; a Chorus for the laying of the foundation stone of the Befreiungshalle in 1842, a chorus which long since outrun the frontiers of Bavaria; then the "Landsquenet-Lieder," and several occasional compositions; further, some smaller quartetts and arrangements of classical composers, &c. &c.

But also on other fields Stuntz never has been inactive. For several of the festivities at the Bavarian Court he composed; for instance, in 1811, at the birth of the present King, Maximilian II., a "Lobgesang an die Gottheit;" in 1823, at the marriage of Princess Elizabeth, present Queen of Prussia, a "Te Deum;" in 1832, at the marriage of Princess Mathilde, present Grand Duchess of Hesse, a Festspiel "Ahnen and Enkel" (Ancestors and Grandchildren), and so on. Stuntz also presided at the concerts at court, and at the musical academy; and besides all that he never neglected his compositions for the Roman Church.

In consequence of new regulations in the directoire of the Royal Opera, Stuntz was pensioned from this establishment, and now began his almost exclusive and never-ending productive activity for the Chapelle Royale.

Then the vocal music without orchestra was introduced in the Chapelle Royale, after type of the Capella Sestina in Rome, and there is it that Stuntz again earned the palm of fame. His compositions for the Roman Church are in the strictest style. He is quite master of the Cantus firmus. But besides the profoundness and earnestness in these compositions, there is throughout so euphonical and harmonious a strain, which touches and appeases not only the heart of the connoisseur, but also that of every layman. His church compositions are partly for mixed chorus, partly for men's or women's voices, either with or without accompaniment of the organ. His last Mass is only for women's voices, with accompaniment of violas and violoncellos; and he indeed crowned himself with his last work produced during his illness, a Requiem for five voices, and which was performed with a most touching awe at the mass for his soul.

Stuntz not only confined his zeal to compositions, but it extended to the historical study of works of the most ancient composers; and when quite familiar with Palestrina, Leonardo da Leo, Orlando, and others, he, with his clever and finished pen, brought to light the works of a Tosquin da Press, Cypriano da Rosa, Pierre de la Rue, and others.

Also in the varied and ornamented music he accomplished a master piece in a Missa solemnis, composed for full orchestra. Besides this, he did not neglect the other musical territories: Canone (Catches);

Madrigals; charming songs for one voice, and with accompaniment of the piano; a vocal quartett, in the style of the old music camern, are speaking proofs of his multilateral operations.

In the year 1846 he composed an opera Maria Rosa, which, as we are sorry to say, wrecked, because of the awkwardly and not well-written words, whilst the music is of a high value, though of course lost. A great Symphony of his was performed six years ago, with loud acclamations, in the concerts of the Hofcapelle, and also a Concert Overture in 1857. Stuntz knew how to apply the instruments in his compositions with great effect and elegance, and resembles Auber in the technical parts of his Instrumentations.

In consequence of an order of the King, he composed, in 1858, a Bavarian National Hymn (the words by Dr. L. Wohlmuth), for mixed chorus and full orchestra. We, who heard it, say that it is a masterpiece of grandeur and simpleness, but till now it could not be performed for want of a suitable occasion. In 1853 Stuntz composed for the celebration of the King's return from Italy a Cantata, written by the first burgomaster. At the performance in the open air, Stuntz caught a severe cold, which turned in an inflammation on the chest, so that he was confined to a sick room for several months; after his recovery he went to spend a winter in Italy, where he anew was the object of ovations of his many friends there.

Returned from Italy, he again began to suffer from his chest. Repeated travels to the milder climates had perhaps been fit to procure him mitigation, but Stuntz would not hear of it, for nowhere he felt comfortable when far from his habitual sphere of activity; restless, thinking and working was his unremitting striving, and to the last breath his head was full of music.

A chronical disease of the heart increased his illness. Nevertheless he did not intermit his activity; he ordered to be driven in the Chapelle Royale, where he did his duty for the last time six weeks before his death. On the 18th of June in the early morning, on the 41st anniversary of his wedding-day, he gently slept away, having maintained his amiability and tranquillity of mind, both issuing from the purest of hearts, up to the last moment. Stuntz was a finished man—a good man; he sided with the liberal party, and indeed carried many a grief in his heart for the sake of his country; but he bore it calmly, and bore it as a man firm in his self-consciousness. Stuntz was a genuine, a genial artist; modest, and free of all boasting. After-ages will say of him, that he took up one of the first places among the musical composers and authorities of his time.

Letters to the Editor.

MR. HENRY SMART'S CHORAL BOOK.

SIR,—In one of your papers last year, August 2nd, I see a long advertisement setting forth the peculiar merits of Mr. Henry Smart's "Choral Book." Without disparaging that gentleman's efforts in what he believes the best mode of advancing Church Psalmody, I would only call his attention to the terms in which he mentions the Hymnal noted. Doubtless, not having it before him, he has greatly altered the advertisement of that publication in his reference to it; the words he quotes should be "the ordinary metrical VERSIONS of the Psalms" (NOT Metrical Psalmody, as quoted in Mr. Smart's advertisement) "are no longer found, &c. &c." I would also inform Mr. Smart that many persons whose musical taste is by no means at the lowest ebb, do not consider the plain song of the Church either meaningless or uncouth. Hoping you will insert this as a justification of a publication fully intended by its compilers as an effective adjunct to the service of the Church,

I remain, Sir, your obedient servant,
VERITAS.

THE CHEADLE ASSOCIATION.

MR. EDITOR,—Sometime ago the "Cheadle Association for promoting Church Music" offered two prizes of five guineas each, for the best music adapted to the Christmas and Easter Hymns, stating "any violation of the rules of harmony will at once disqualify the tune in which it occurs." After some months of consideration they awarded the prize for the Easter Hymn, but, strange to say, the "Association" overlooked consecutive fifths in this composition. This could not have been a mere oversight of the composer, as it occurs not only in the score, but in the organ part. I send a copy of the tune and the Cheadle prospectus, that you may judge for yourself. Perhaps the "Association" can enlighten your readers on this subject, which has caused some surprise in musical circles.

Yours very truly,
OXONIAN.

THE CHEADLE PROSPECTUS.

"A prize of five guineas will be given to the composer of the best psalm tune to suit the words:—

'Jesus Christ is risen to day. Hallelujah!
Our triumphant holiday. Hallelujah!
Who did once upon the cross. Hallelujah!
Suffer to redeem our loss. Hallelujah!'

the 'Hallelujah' to be sung at the end of each line.

"CONDITIONS:—

"The tunes to be strictly original, full throughout, of a simple, solid, and ecclesiastical character, and within the compass of an ordinary parish choir.

"Many inquiries have been made as to the meaning attached by the committee to the words 'simple, solid, and ecclesiastical.' The committee beg, therefore, to refer to the tunes numbered 5, 12, 23, 36, 55, in the Cheadle Hand-book of Psalm Tunes, published (price 9d.) by Mr. T. Harrison, 59 Pall Mall, London, as specimens.

"It is intended to publish the successful tunes as substitutes for the Easter and Christmas Hymns now in common use. The copyright will be the property of the association.

"Any violation of the rules of harmony will at once disqualify the tune in which it occurs.

"The tunes must be distinctly written in compressed score, on music-paper of the quarto size, each tune accompanied by separate voice parts, on paper of the same size, with the words written under the notes. Each composition must be distinguished by two mottoes (the name of the composer not to be sent), and forwarded before March 25th to the Rev. George Mather, Huntly Hall, Cheadle, Staffordshire. The postage must be paid or they cannot be received."

[The copy of the "tune" has not reached us.—ED.]

SIR,—When I affirm that the ratio of the basal minor 3rd is 16 to 19, I either state what is true or false. In neither case is it a speculation, as your correspondent A. G. Henderson is pleased to represent it. His very first sentence, in your last number, is therefore disingenuous. Then, as to whether his or my "conclusions are in opposition to nature," let the examples which terminate this article settle that point. After this Mr. H. very properly observes, "What everybody feels to be true must be true," and so I say; and since everybody feels that the sharp 1st of the key is above the flat 2nd, the sharp 2nd above the flat 3rd, &c., as this is in perfect agreement with my discoveries (not inventions, nor speculations), and confessedly in direct opposition to the fictions resulting from the fanciful speculations which turn all this topsyturvy, it follows that these facts verify my theory and not the theories to which they stand opposed. Then follows, "and we shall go on our own way," which is very likely to be the case, seeing that long-cherished notions are disposed to stick to us, however false they may be; nevertheless, if a tree can be fairly judged by its fruits, the examples which follow, to which innumerable others may be added, will again lend their aid, and save us much trouble. Mr. A. G. H. goes on to remark, "This was, in fact, the language used by the Aristoxenians of Ancient Greece towards the mathematicians of the day who would lay down laws for tuning of the lyre. And the Aristoxenians were right, because their antagonists were not in a position to lay down any absolute laws on the subject. They knew nothing of the physical condition of sound, nor of the true relation of the intervals, with the exception of the 4th, 5th, and octave." Now this is really splendid; an open confession, for which I feel extremely obliged; for this, in short, is the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Immediately after this, however, we have: "The case is different now. Thanks to modern physical experimenters and mathematicians these relations are now in the clear light of day." For this turn in the evidence, I confess, I was not at all prepared, nor can I comprehend it, knowing, as I do, that all the moderns have done, by way of improvement in this matter, is to add the prime 5 to 1, 2, 3, the only primes admitted by the Greeks into the composition of their musical ratios. It follows, however, that consistently with this statement, "the clear light of day" is an influx proceeding entirely from this solitary candle! Moreover, Mr. H. himself objects to 7 and all the higher primes. I am really obliged to Mr. H. for his efforts to enlighten me on the subject of musical ratios, that is the orthodox ratios, but to save him trouble, I beg to inform him that, somehow or other, I scraped acquaintance with them, without the formality of an introduction, soon after completing my studies respecting the alphabet. Moreover, many years ago, I wrote a small work entitled "An Essay on Acoustics," built entirely upon the orthodox foundation respecting the ratios of the primative intervals, the truth of which I had not then been led to call in question. But when, some time after, I was induced to experiment upon these matters, instead of deriving pleasure from the so-called perfect ratios, I was disgusted with their effects. Having thus been led to perceive that the assumed orthodox doctrine, in regard to the ratio of intervals is radically false; the arguments by which it is attempted to prop it up, illogical and inconclusive; and its fruits (meaning thereby its real fruits, that is, those which appertain to it, and emanate from it, and not those falsely and cunningly ascribed to it,) most detestable, I set to work with the view to cleanse and purify this Augean stable, and having at length accomplished the task, I wait the opportunity to present the fruit of my labours to the public.

As it so happens that what I intended as my concluding article upon this subject is placed next to Mr. Henderson's, what is therein observed will render it unnecessary for me to follow Mr. H. in detail through his long "tangled skein." I shall, therefore, merely observe with respect to logarithms, that however useful as artificial numbers they may be in matters relating to artificial sounds or temperaments, they are of no use whatever when perfect ratios are concerned. And, furthermore, that even in respect to fractions, as in my case the denominator is always the unit (to the simplicity of which I beg to call attention), it follows that in the arithmetical operations relating to my theory, the numerator only is concerned. That on the key-board of the piano the interval of a major and minor 3rd make a 5th is of course true. It is also true that $\frac{4}{3} \times \frac{5}{4} = \frac{5}{3}$ the ratio of the 5th: but in respect to these matters Mr. H., as well as many others, have to be informed that no primary ratio and interval can ever be the product of other primary ratios and intervals, simply because primes are not products. For example, the ratio of the major 3rd, represented by the prime 5, x 19 the representative of the minor 3rd = 95; but the prime representing the 5th is 3, the octaves to which are 6, 12, 24, 48, 96, &c. As I am not here writing a treatise upon harmony, it is impossible to go into this subject except in a very cursory manner. I may here inform Mr. H. that the foundation of my theory rests upon the inherent and abstract qualities of numbers, as primes, products, &c., and also upon certain laws relating to order, unity, and position. It is therefore in no otherwise connected with the generation of acute or grave harmonics than as it were collaterally; or as effects with effects, but not as cause and effect. Furthermore it is important to observe that in speaking of music as a science, temperament must be entirely put aside, and not even thought of. Science, according to my views, is not a "beautiful scheme of the Almighty architect," but truth within but not above the sphere of nature; which truths, nevertheless, like those of a higher degree, exist by derivation from the Source of all truth, according to the laws of His own order, but not by arbitrary appointment or preconcerted scheme. Moreover, with respect to Him, simplicity has reference to the unity and subordination of principles, rather than to paucity of materials. It may suit the inventors of artificial systems to rid themselves of all but a few of the lower primes, but it does not thence follow that the higher primes fulfil no part in the divine economy, or that because no one is gifted with the power to invent, that is to create a real system, we are therefore debarred from searching into the mysteries and wonders appertaining to that which, as proceeding from the Creator, is alone real. Being convinced that a quarter of an hour spent in the study of my Ratiometer will do more to disabuse the mind from the quagmires of false principles, than whole volumes of argumentative writings, and especially where matters relating to the ordinary operations of arithmetic are not ignorantly scoffed at, because unknown, or confusedly perceived; if Mr. H. is really in search of truth, and should be coming to London, I shall be happy to exhibit it to him.

The grave harmonics, unit-sounds, or bases generated by the notes above, according to the Orthodox theory.

For the edification of the uninitiated, it may be necessary to remark that, according to my theory, the note F♯ in bar 2 is considerably sharper than the F♯ in bar 1, yet without producing any change in the basis or unit-sound. In respect to the bases in the lowest part of bar 2, it is to be observed that the basis G is generated by the notes D, D♯; the basis D♯ by the notes D, F♯; and the basis B by the notes F♯ D♯. In bar 5 the basis C is generated by the notes G, G♯; the basis G by the notes G, B; the basis E♮ by the notes G♯, B. In bar 6 the basis E♭ is generated by the notes E♭, F; the basis F by the notes F, C; and the basis A♭ by the notes C, E♭!

There are, doubtless, some who will call this a strange and curious mode of criticism; and so it is, for being new and unknown, it is therefore not only strange, but somewhat ominous withal: and it is curious from its singular agreement with my theory of musical harmony, and opposition to every other.

I am, Sir, yours &c.,

THE STAGE; FEMALE PLAYERS; AND TOM D'URFEY.—From the first establishment of the stage till after the Restoration the female characters were played by boys; there may, however, have been some exceptions to the general rule. The Court Beggar was acted at the cockpit in 1632; in the last act Lady Strangelove says, "If you have a short speech or two, the boy 's a pretty actor, and his mother can play her part." Women actors now grew in request. Prynne says, 1663, "They have now their female players in Italy and other foreign parts," and in Michaelmas, 1629, they had French women actors in a play personated at Blackfriars, to which there was a great resort. Pepys says he saw The Beggar's Bush on the 20th of November, 1660, at which time the play was acted entirely by male performers. He was at the same play again on the 3rd of January, 1661, and then, for the first time, he saw women come upon the stage. In Davenant's patent there was a clause to this effect—"Whereas the women's parts in plays have hitherto been acted by men, in the habits of women, at which some have taken offence, we do permit and give leave for the time to come that all women's parts shall be acted by women." Tom D'Urfey was the delight of the most polite companies from the beginning of Charles II.'s reign till 1710, yet, towards the close of his life, he stood in need of assistance to prevent his passing the remainder of it in a cage, like a singing bird, for, after having written more odes than Horace, and about four times as many comedies as Terence, he found himself reduced to great difficulties by the importunities of a set of men, who, of late years, had furnished him with the accommodations of life, and would not be paid with a song; Addison said this in No. 67 of the Guardian, and recommends him to the public notice, observing that he remembered King Charles leaning on Tom D'Urfey's shoulder more than once, and humming over a song with him, and that many an honest gentleman had gotten a reputation in the country by pretending to have been in company with Tom D'Urfey.

RETROSPECT.

Gorgeous with artful lustre
Sparkles the fairy scene,
Fanciful beings cluster
Round one that seems their queen:
Queen-like she moves alone.

Bounding with airy lightness,
Tripping with nimble grace,
Smiles all content and brightness
Light up her youthful face:
Mortal she seemeth none.

Mortal!—Lo now before ye,
On that poor mimic fay,
Quenching her dream of glory,
Death his gaunt hand shall lay:
Ere yet the mask be done.

Paint not that scene of horror,
Shriek not those shrieks again;
Tell only how they bore her,
Racking with martyr's pain,
Home, gentle dying one.

Swiftly some gay bird speeding,
Pinions thus bright expand,
Earthward then falls a-bleeding,
'Neath thy relentless hand,
Hunter with heart of stone.

THE LATE MR. GEORGE HAUSMANN.

(From the Edinburgh Daily Courant.)

DEATH has been busy of late among our musicians. It is just a fortnight to-day since we had to deplore the loss of one of the most talented of their number, Mr. Louis Drechsler, and now a similar sad duty devolves on us owing to the sudden decease of Mr. Hausmann. Both of these events have occurred within a year of the death of the lamented Mr. Dürrner, and in the case of all three the anxious question may well arise—who shall supply the place? For many years Mr. Hausmann had been so constantly and so prominently before the Edinburgh public as to cause him to be looked upon as a resident musician, which, indeed, he was during the whole musical season. Knowing with what a sudden and severe shock the announcement of his death has fallen upon a large portion of the inhabitants of this city, we were anxious, before paying our tribute to his memory, to obtain, for the information of our readers, some particulars as to the cause of his death. Owing however, to its having taken place in his native town of Hanover, we have as yet been able to learn nothing further than that his death was sudden and attributable to heart complaint. It had been evident for some months that he was not in robust health, but we believe that so sudden a seizure was quite unexpected.

Mr. Hausmann held a high place among violoncello players, as a proof of which we may refer to his honourable position in Mr. Costa's unrivalled band. As an orchestral player, he displayed a vigour in attack, and a correctness in execution, which few could surpass, and the influence of which imparted steadiness and spirit to the performers around him. As a solo player, it must be admitted that he was less successful, his tone being frequently harsh and his manner somewhat spasmodic, yet he always obtained the welcome of a favourite, and even as a soloist his familiar form and tones will be much missed in our concert-rooms.

Two years ago Mr. Hausmann, with much diffidence, undertook the post of conductor of the Edinburgh Musical Association, and both the executant members and the subscribers will bear us out when we say, that two more successful seasons have seldom, if ever, occurred during its existence. As a conductor, Mr. Hausmann showed a correct and reverential appreciation of the works which were performed, the various degrees of time and shades of expression being most carefully attended to; while in the adjustment of the programmes there was the evidence of a refined and classical taste. This work, carried on with unflagging energy and zeal, was purely a labour of love, to which, however, the Association responded by cordial assistance at his benefit concerts. At the last of these he appeared in the further capacity of an orchestral composer, and if he did not exhibit any striking originality of invention, he at least showed a creditable knowledge of orchestral effects, and of the uses of the various component instruments. To him, too, belonged the credit of carrying on, what never was done so successfully before, a series of classical chamber concerts, which—in general only appealing to a few select dilettanti—became, under his management, both fashionable and popular.

In private, Mr. Hausmann's loss will be severely felt, for there his obliging nature, amiable disposition, and musical enthusiasm, made him a universal favourite; and by his death many a musical côterie will feel a blank which, while reminding of past enjoyment of his company, will produce a feeling most fitly expressed by the words of our laureate—

"Oh! for the touch of a vanish'd hand,
And the sound of a voice that is still."

A MUSICAL INSTRUMENT.

What was he doing, the great god Pan,
Down in the reeds by the river?
Spreading ruin and scattering ban,
Splashing and paddling with hoofs of a goat,
And breaking the golden lilies afloat
With the dragon-fly on the river?

He tore out a reed, the great god Pan,
From the deep cool bed of the river.
The limpid water turbidly ran,
And the broken lilies a-dying lay,
And the dragon-fly had fled away,
Ere he brought it out of the river.

High on the shore sate the great god Pan,
While turbidly flowed the river,
And hacked and hewed as a great god can,
With his hard bleak steel at the patient reed,
Till there was not a sign of a leaf indeed
To prove it fresh from the river.

He cut it short, did the great god Pan,
(How tall it stood in the river!)
Then drew the pith, like the heart of a man,
Steadily from the outside ring,
Then notched the poor dry empty thing
In holes as he sate by the river.

"This is the way," laughed the great god Pan, (Laughed while he sate by the river!)
"The only way since gods began
To make sweet music they could succeed."
Then dropping his mouth to a hole in the reed,
He blew in power by the river.

Sweet, sweet, sweet, O Pan,
Piercing sweet by the river!
Blinding sweet, O great god Pan!
The sun on the hill forgot to die,
And the lilies revived, and the dragon-fly
Came back to dream on the river.

Yet half a beast is the great god Pan
To laugh, as he sits by the river,
Making a poet out of a man.
The true gods sigh for the cost and pain,—
For the reed that grows nevermore again
As a reed with the reeds in the river.

HOGARTH AND HIS CARRIAGE.—By "carriage" is meant carriage.—Hogarth was a remarkably "absent man." On setting up his carriage, he paid a visit to the Lord Mayor, and having protracted his stay until a heavy shower came on, he was led out by a different door to that by which he entered, and, unmindful of his carriage, he set off on foot, and reached home dripping wet. When Mrs. Hogarth asked him where he had left his carriage, he said he had forgotten it.—Not from the Cornhill Magazine.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—Notice.—In consequence of the numerous applications from non-subscribers and the public at the Box-office to witness the performance of Weber's grand romantic Opera of OBERON, with its entirely new and magnificent scenery, its costly appointments and mechanical effects and transformations, splendid dresses, &c., proving it to be one of the most elaborate and georgeous spectacles ever produced in Her Majesty's Theatre, the Lessee and Director has consented, notwithstanding the enormous expense consequent upon its reproduction (as it embraces nearly the whole of the artistes and personnel of the establishment), to give two more grand representations of Oberon on the following dates:—To-night, July 21; and Monday, July 23, for which purpose he has entered into a fresh engagement with Mad. ALBONI, and has recalled by telegraph Signor MONGINI, who had taken his departure for Italy.—This Evening, July 21, will be performed Weber's grand romantic Opera of OBERON, with the following great cast:—Reiza, Mlle. TITIENS; Fatima, Mad. ALBONI; Puck, Mad. LEMAIRE; Roshana, Mlle. VANERI; Oberon, Signor BELART; Babiken, Signor GASSIER; Scherisman, Signor EVERARDI; and Sir Hugo, Signor MONGINI (who has returned from the Continent expressly for the occasion). Conductor: Mr. BENEDICT. Gallery, 2s.; Seats, Half-circle, 2s. 6d.; Gallery Stalls, 5s.; Pit, 3s. 6d.; Seats, Second Circle, 4s.; Seats, First Circle, 5s.; Pitt Stalls, 10s. 6d.; Third Tier Private Boxes, to hold four, 10s. 6d.; ditto, Two Pair, £1 1s.; ditto, One Pair, £1 11s. 6d.; Pit Tier, £1 11s. 6d.; Grand Tier, £2 2s. Early application to secure places is earnestly recommended, as being the only means of preventing disappointment. The Box-office of the Theatre is open daily from 10 to 6, and on the Evenings of Performance until the end of the Opera.

The Musical World.

LONDON: SATURDAY, JULY 21, 1860.

THIS is the age of "revivals." Not to glance at the Operas, where Gluck and Weber are being resuscitated, but to confine ourselves to the pianoforte and instrumental chamber music, simultaneously with a revival of the works of Jean Louis Dussek (more leisurely but as surely) is being effected a revival of the works of Franz Schubert. By means of these "revivals,"—unlike some others of the present day that might be named,—we are returning to a purer worship than has for some time prevailed. Of Dussek we have lately said enough; but a word or two about Schubert, and especially about Schubert as an instrumental composer, may not be without interest.

The pianoforte writings of Franz Schubert possess much of the romantic character that distinguishes more or less every one of his well-known songs. They are numerous, of all varieties of form, and, though they have achieved a far less degree of popularity than his vocal compositions, are scarcely inferior to them in genius and originality.

We may perhaps shock the prejudices of many in avowing our opinion that Schubert, from a certain point of view, was a somewhat overrated man. That he has "a spark of the divine fire" is not to be questioned. The concession, wrung from the haughty, and occasionally prejudiced, Beethoven, may be accepted as rather an epigrammatic than a strictly just expression of the truth. "A spark of the divine fire" was in Schubert, no doubt—nay, more, a flame. He was, however, neither a universal nor a commanding genius; nor was he a musician of very profound acquirement. He belonged to that order of composers and poets, so numerous in Germany, of which Carl Maria von Weber is the most illustrious representative. From peculiarity of intellect and temperament these musicians would probably have reached eminence in any pursuit to which the circumstances of early life and education might have conducted them. Their organisation was not, as in the instances of Handel, Mozart, Beethoven, and the greater composers, so happily attuned to music that it were absurd to deny their being chosen instruments of Heaven to delight the world with melody. Thorough enthusiasts, with quasi-morbid natures, they seem ever lamenting their incapacity to set forth in plain and convincing language the thoughts that struggle for utterance within them. The antipodes of common-place, they are, notwithstanding, all more or less in trammels. Such men can hardly fail to meet with ardent worshippers—natures like their own, yearning for the impossible, disdaining self-evident truths, with minds attuned to their own in sympathetic discord. These proclaim Schubert and the rest the only true prophets, and advocate their pre-eminence over every rival.

What has been denominated the "Romantic School" is clearly traceable to Weber, Schubert, and their imitators and disciples, who in eager quest of a new and more striking language, have unconsciously given circulation to endless mannerisms, upon which the more ordinary sort of music-makers have laid hold to make their own emptiness pass current. But Schubert must be carefully separated from the impostors who make art subservient to the double-end of show and traffic. He neither held out wares for sale in a bazaar, nor exhibited them as a picture-monger, still less as a polichinello, to the vacant gaze of the illiterate mob. Schubert was a man of strong convictions, besides being a man of truly imaginative genius. That he did not succeed in becoming a thoroughly practised musician was partly due to an incomplete education, partly to a stubborn organic deficiency. As painter, poet, or novelist—anything indeed but arithmetician, mathematician, logician—Schubert would have attained an equal celebrity, and have displayed quite as powerful an individuality as distinguished his career as a musical inventor.

But to leave mere speculation; in various symphonies, overtures, quartets, &c., Schubert evinced a strong desire to excel in the sonata form. Disdaining, however, or failing to understand entirely its indispensable conditions—clearness, consistency, symmetrical arrangement of themes, keys, and episodic matter—he was by no means as successful as he could have wished. Though gifted with an abundant flow of ideas, Schubert was wanting in the faculty of condensation and methodical disposition of parts. He accepted all that presented itself to his fancy, rejecting nothing as inappropriate or superfluous; and then, while rarely insipid, nay almost invariably interesting, he is too often diffuse, obscure, and exaggerated. Occasionally, in place of developing the principle subject of a movement, he conducts an accidental phrase, a simple figure of ornament, a fragment of remplissage, through a labyrinth of progression and modulation, until the ear becomes fatigued, and satiety gives way to revulsion. In six grand sonatas for the pianoforte solus—which if length, vastness of proportion, and ambitious endeavour were enough to constitute perfection, might rank with the finest of Beethoven, or the most impassioned of Dussek—exuberance of detail, want of connection, excessive modulation, redundant episode, strange and unnatural harmonies, and other glaring defects, lessen the impression that would otherwise be produced by many exquisite and undeniable beauties. A grand duet in A minor, also for the pianoforte, exhibits the same inconsistencies, amidst merits that are not to be contested. The minor works of Schubert for the same instrument—especially some marches and short characteristic pieces—are remarkably attractive; but in these, not being limited to set forms, his ideas are presented in their primitive simplicity, without any attempt at development. Here, for the reasons thus briefly stated, Schubert is quite as happy as in his best compositions for the voice.

For all who have a touch of romance in their dispositions, the pianoforte works of Schubert, like everything else that came from his pen, must possess a strong measure of interest. There is something fascinating in the tone of melancholy that marks even his smallest effusions, while the unquestionable originality of his ideas places him altogether beyond the pale of ordinary thinkers, and extorts forgiveness for the absence of those qualities which have conferred durability as well as charm on the faultless models bequeathed us by the great masters. We have said enough to explain why Schubert—like Beethoven, Weber, Mendelssohn, &c.—should be assigned a place apart from his contemporaries; but the peculiarities that have won him this distinction have, in another sense, prevented him from exercising any decided influence on the progress of the art, of which he was a gifted, if incomplete, disciple.

A GENTLEMAN connected with the Norwich Festival has written to The Times, communicating the extraordinary fact, that for singing at two concerts last year at Bradford, Mlle. Titiens and Signor Giuglini received no less than £600, which, as any one with the slightest arithmetical genius will at once perceive, is at the rate of £150 each for a single concert. People who have voices like ravens are amazed to hear of those large sums being paid to those whose privilege it is to delight the public with their singing, and ask how it is that mere histrions and cantors receive such exorbitant wages to what are given to ministers, judges, and the wisest of the land. Wisdom, however, has always been what the writers of Money-Market and City Intelligence articles call "a drug in the market." We have surely plenty of barristers, and it is notorious that even an unsuccessful counsel will make a capital judge; while, as for ministers, is it not easier to form a cabinet—aye, half-a-dozen cabinets—than to get up one really good opera company? Besides, there is nothing new in singers and actors being remunerated at these high rates, and therefore nothing at which any one need be astonished. Great artists have always been regarded as luxuries, and as luxuries which must be paid for so dearly that it is only in the very richest countries they can ever be secured. In Italy we no more expect to find the most renowned vocalists than to find the finest fish at the seaside, or the best growths of claret at Bordeaux; they are forwarded and exported without delay to those places in which there are the most profitable markets for such commodities—that is to say to Paris, to London, or to St. Petersburg.

We make a remarkable fuss about a few great artists being paid such enormous salaries that if, by a lucky chance, they retain their powers and their reputations for a dozen years, they may perhaps be able to lay by enough to enable them to live for the rest of their lives at the rate of a thousand a year. Why in ancient Rome nearly all the popular players reckoned their fortunes by thousands and millions. Œsopus, who was not only the most famous tragic actor, but also the most prodigal spendthrift of his time, is said to have left twenty millions of sestertii to his son—something like one hundred and sixty thousand pounds of our money, and this the mere wreck of a fortune. Roscius, by the admission of his illustrious advocate, gained one year with another an annual income of half a million sestertii, and yet he often performed for nothing, as a means (said the malicious critics of the day) of currying favour with the public. Why then should Mlle. Titiens and Signor Giuglini not have now and then their hundred and fifty pounds a night? Vegetating on our hundred and fifty pounds a year, we say coolly and deliberately that we do not regret the large sums that are paid to great artists, but only that there are not more great artists to command, if possible, even larger sums.

The Operas.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—The last night of the "Subscription" has come off, but by no means the last night. The bonâ fide public, who take places on the eve of performance, or pay their money at the doors, are virtually just as much subscribers as those who hire boxes and stalls in advance, for what is conventionally termed "the season," and for these numerous and not inconstant patrons, the lessee of Her Majesty's Theatre continuing to provide entertainments, the attractions of which are enhanced by the co-operation of new singers and dancers of eminence, it is as well to postpone our accustomed "review" until everything has been brought forward originally announced in the prospectus, or which the restless activity of Mr. E. T. Smith may still have in store, to multiply the incidents of this his very remarkable "first campaign." On Saturday one of the pleasantest of comic operas, La Figlia del Reggimento, was produced, with the celebrated French (or Belgian?) singer, Mad. Marie Cabel, as the heroine; Signor Belart, the capital Spanish tenor, as Tonio; and Signor Ciampi, the new Italian "buffo," as Sulpizio. The impression created by Mad. Marie Cabel in 1854, when an Opéra Comique troop (principally from the Théâtre Lyrique) gave a series of representations at the St. James's Theatre, can hardly have been forgotten. Among the parts then essayed by this admirable lyric comedian was Maria (in the French, and original, version of Donizetti's sparkling work), her impersonation of which was justly eulogised for its spirit and vivacity. But little, if at all, inconvenienced by the trammels of a foreign language, Mad. Cabel, in the Italian adaptation of La Figlia, exhibits, with signal felicity, the very same qualities that won the admiration of good judges when, her own native tongue being the medium of communication, her task—taking into account the genuine accomplishments she possesses, both as singer and actress—was comparatively easy. Mad. Cabel's voice has lost none of its intrinsic charm, her vocalisation none of its "finesse" and bird-like volubility, her demeanour none of its indefinable grace—artfully studied, though to all appearances unstudied (a stereoscopic illustration of the "simplex munditiis"), her bye-play none of its piquancy and animation. Coming immediately after Mlle. Piccolomini, who offered a portraiture of the Vivandière, amid its uncommon sprightliness, a little too saucy and "theatrical," the Maria of Mad. Cabel may at first sight appear somewhat wanting in sentiment, vigour, force, and even spontaneity; but a closer acquaintance will possibly lead to the conviction that, if less theatrically striking, it is truer to the nature of "things in general," and vivandières of gentle blood in particular. In her execution of the music, the thoroughly practised mistress of the French style of singing is everywhere evident; and if her farewell to the regiment (Act I—"Convien partir") lies open to the reproach of being less pathetic than the situation demands, all the rest—from the duet with Tonio to the final air—is irreproachable. The cadenza to the air of Caffariello, which Maria humours the old marchioness by trying over at the pianoforte, was set off, on the present occasion, by a variety of embellishments and tours de force—including an endless succession of shakes in the higher register, achieved with invariable perfection—which gratified and astonished the ear in an equal measure; and while Mad. Cabel's whole performance was an uninterrupted success, this was perhaps her most brilliant display, and brought down "thunders of applause." Signor Belart has rarely, perhaps never, more honourably maintained his claim to be regarded as one of the best tenor singers now before the public, than by his uniformly correct and effective execution of the music of Tonio, to which, by the way, he adds, for the first time in England, an air (in the second act) always introduced at the Opéra Comique, but invariably omitted from the Italian versions, at Her Majesty's Theatre and elsewhere. This air (too genuine to be neglected) he sang to such perfection on Saturday night, that it was impossible to decline the unanimous encore it elicited. Signor Ciampi fell somewhat short of what had been expected of him in Sulpizio. His "make up" was extravagant; while in his performance there were too many traits his frequent use of which encourages a belief that they are little better than "mannerisms." It is to be hoped this gentleman—who produced so marked an impression on the occasion of his début at Her Majesty's Theatre—may not turn out, in emulation of the man who was only well acquainted with one book, a singer who can only excel in one part; but certainly, there are strong touches of "Dr. Bartolo" in whatever he attempts. Signor Arditi presided in the orchestra, and the chorus-singers exhibited so much more precision than we have been accustomed to, as to warrant a conclusion that if those operas in which they have to take part, were brought out with less indiscriminate haste, a far more flattering account might be given of them. True, the choruses in La Figlia are not nearly so elaborate as those in the Huguenots and other operas; but this merely proves that the Huguenots, &c., require more careful preparation.

A word must record the enthusiastic reception awarded to Mad. Amalia Ferraris, who, since her last appearance in this country (nine or ten years ago), has obtained a European reputation as a dancer of the foremost rank in the highest school of art, and who now takes the place, at the grand opera in Paris, successively occupied by such favoured daughters of Terpsichore as Carlotta Grisi, Cerito, and Rosati. In a pas de deux with M. Chappuy (also a new comer), from the ballet of Orfa, originally produced for Cerito, Mad. Ferraris more than justified all that had been reported of her very exceptional talent, accomplishing feats that, one after the other, raised the admiration of the house. Does the lessee of Her Majesty's Theatre intend bringing forward any more "stars" before the termination of the present season? It is to be hoped not. His "cheap prices" have commenced, and the second and third tiers of his private boxes are thrown open (as at Jullien's concerts, and the Drury Lane Italian Opera) to the general public; so that, now the rumour that the engagements of Mad. Alboni and Signor Mongini were terminated proves false, and that future representations of Oberon—the most genuine and solid success of the season—no more depend upon the readiness and ability of Mad. Borghi-Mamo and Signor Giuglini, to get up the part of Fatima and Huon, there are still, with Mlle. Titiens and the rest, attractions enough to all intents and purposes. It might be ungracious to add that those whose duty it is to report (to say nothing of their readers) would be none the worse for a brief interval of repose, more especially as the temporary secession of the Italian artists is to be shortly followed, if we are well-informed, by the advent of another troop of singers from all climes, expressly engaged for the performance of English opera.

Although in reality Signor Mongini was allowed to take his flight homewards, his engagement having concluded, and had even, we learn, reached the northern capital of Italy, so great was the disappointment expressed by the public at the withdrawal of Oberon, so many the enquiries about its next repetition, that Mr. Smith had no alternative but to recall him, and he at once telegraphed to Milan for the great tenore robusto, and had him back to London by the wires; whereupon Oberon was given on Thursday, for Mr. Smith's benefit, and will be repeated to-night and on Monday, and no doubt some few nights more, before the rere-season be brought to a termination. It was ill-advised to allow Signor Mongini to depart in the midst of the triumphant sucess of Oberon, especially as no one could be found to substitute for him in the part of Sir Huon; but it was good policy and quick work to have him back again, and thus knock down grumbling and disappointment. "A good beginning," observes a first-rate authority, "is the half of all." A good ending is better, say we; and Oberon promises to wind up Mr. Smith's first season at Her Majesty's Theatre with astonishing brilliancy and éclat.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. — The second performance of the Prophète, on Saturday, was a great improvement on the first; and the third on Monday — an extra night — a still greater improvement on the second. This was no more than what might have been expected from music so elaborate and difficult, and from the working of such complicated machinery as is involved in the scene department. Such an opera, indeed, would necessitate at least a dozen full rehearsals at the Grand Opéra in Paris, in the place of the solitary ONE which Mr. Costa thinks himself fortunate in obtaining at Covent Garden. They manage these things better in France. Some people, however, are inclined to think that our English system works better in the end. If the public really knew how little dependance is to be placed on first performances of operas — at least of French grand operas and the larger works of the great Italian and German masters — they would be in no hurry to take their places the first night, but rather wait until such time as the members of the orchestra would feel more at their ease, the singers would get rid of their timidity, and the carpenters be enabled to work the scenes more smoothly. That the performance of the Prophète on the first night was not unexceptionable is not to be wondered at. The surprise indeed is that it was so admirable, taking all things into consideration. Mad. Csillag has added a new leaf to her already fairly-won laurel wreath by her impersonation of Fides, which proves her, if proof were wanting, to be a tragedian of the first order. If the music does not invariably adapt itself to her means, it is not her fault, but that of M. Meyerbeer, who wrote it for one of the most exceptional voices of modern times. The Jean of Signor Tamberlik is every way masterly — not only one of his finest performances, but one of the most striking on the lyric stage. Mlle. Corbari, too, sensibly improves, although the music is in parts too high for her. A more charmingly-acted and more graceful looking Bertha, however, we have not seen. Had the Prophète been brought out at the height of the season instead of a period when London is decimated, it would have filled the theatre cram-full for a dozen nights in succession. Mr. Gye will now have to wait until next year for the virtual success of the Prophète, which, with such a cast and such unparalleled magnificence in the costumes and decorations, it requires no prophet to foretell, will be triumphant.

On Tuesday, Rigoletto was announced, but was postponed until this evening, and Martha given instead. Mad. Miolan-Carvalho will make her first appearance to-night as Gilda in Martha, and Signori Mario and Ronconi sustain their favourite parts of the Duke and the Jester.

A Grand Concert was given on Wednesday evening, consisting of a miscellaneous selection, and Gluck's Opera, Orfeo e Eurydice. In this miscellany the most noticeable points were the overture to Oberon, executed superbly by the band, and the "Oath of Liberty," from Guillaume Tell, given with great effect by Signors Tamberlik, Lucchesi, Polonini, Tagliafico, Patriossi, M. Faure, orchestra, and chorus. The music of Gluck makes its way slowly, but steadily and surely. The fourth performance of Orfeo, on Wednesday, was by far the most interesting. The execution was better in every respect, and deeper and more earnest attention was paid by the audience to every piece. This is a good sign, and shows that art is progressing in the right direction. After the Opera, the Floral Hall was thrown open to the lovers of gas-lights, roses, fuchsias, cactuses, stove plants, green-house plants, and brilliant tournures.

The Huguenots was repeated on Thursday.

Concerts.

MR. AGUILAR'S SOIREES MUSICALE.—The last of this gentleman's Soirees for the present season took place at his residence before a distinguished audience. Among the most important pieces in the programme was Mr. Aguilar's sestett for piano, flute, oboe, horn, clarionet, and bassoon, capitally executed by the composer, assisted by Messrs. Pratten, Lazarus, Nicholson, Hausser, and Harper. Miss Lindo gave with great expression the "Inflammatus," from Rossini's Stabat mater, and Mr. Aguilar's charming song, "On a windy day." Mad. Rieder, Miss Augusta Thomson, Miss Wilkinson, and Mr. Tennant were the other vocalists. Among the distinguished company present were Viscountess Hawarden, Lady John Somerset, Lady Smith, the Baroness Meyer de Rothschild, and Mr. White (M.P. for Brighton) and family. Mr. Aguilar accompanied the vocal music; and, in addition to his sestett, played two fantasias of his own composition, on Weber's Last Waltz, and on airs from La Traviata. Mr. Aguilar and Herr Oberthur, in addition, played the Trovatore duet for harp and piano, the composition of the last-named gentleman, and Mad. Pratten a solo on the guitar, in which she was encored.

SOCIETY FOR THE ENCOURAGEMENT OF THE FINE ARTS.—The sixth and last conversazione for the season of this society took place on Thursday evening, at the French Gallery, Pall-Mall, and was most fully attended, the company extending into the vestibule. Mr. J. Edmiston was in the chair. The chief point of interest in the evening's proceedings was the announcement of the prize awards (silver medals) for the season, the report of which was read by the honorary secretary, Mr. H. Ottley. The prizes were—in historical painting to Mr. S. Solomon, for his picture of Moses, in the Royal Academy; in landscape to Mr. Vicat Cole, for his Harvest Time, in the exhibition of the Society of British Artists, Suffolk Street; in genre to Mr. H. Tidey, for his Queen Mab, in the exhibition of the New Water Colour Society; in sculpture to Mr. Durham, for his statue of Chastity, in the Royal Academy; in architecture to Mr. S. J. Nicholl, for his designs for the Church of St. Peter and St. Paul, at Cork, in the Architectural Exhibition; and in poetry to Miss Power, for her poem of Virginia's Hand. In music and engraving awards have not as yet been made, but will probably be announced on the re-assembling of the society in October. The announcement of the awards seemed to give general satisfaction. A concert followed, conducted by Mr. A. Gilbert, which presented some features of more than usual interest and novelty. One of the objects of the Society being the "encouragement" of practitioners, it was gratifying to find this agreeable réunion of Thursday the means of introducing some new and rising talent which we have no doubt will one day achieve considerable distinction. Amongst the vocalists Miss Kenny and Miss Rae appeared for the first time in the duet "Trabe, Trabe," by Kucken, and acquitted themselves in a manner to call for the warmest applause. The former young lady afterwards sang a German lied by the same composer; and, though evidently labouring under considerable nervousness, confirmed the good opinion she had already excited by the purity of her voice and the correctness of her style. Miss Rae was enthusiastically encored in Wallace's "The Bellringer," which she gave with charming effect. Miss Eleonora Wilkinson, a young lady, a pupil of Garcia's, who has we believe not as yet made her regular public appearance, made a complete succès in the polacca "La Placida Campagna," which was encored. Later in the evening she was equally happy in Mendelssohn's beautiful song "Through the Wood." Mad. Andrea, Mr. George Tedder, and Mr. Montgomery also contributed their aid in the vocal department. Herr Ganz played on the piano a serenade Italian and mazurka (Jaell and Ganz) in masterly style; and upon the same instrument Herr Semler (his first appearance in England we understand) gave a solo on airs from William Tell with brilliant effect. Nor must we pass over without the praise to which it was entitled the grand duet on Weber's Preciosa, most satisfactorily rendered by Miss Lindley and Miss Conaron. Altogether the evening passed off admirably, and all agreed that it was one of the most agreeable réunions of the season.

MLLE. VANERI OF HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE, and M. Samary, violoncellist of the Imperial Chapel of Napoleon III., gave a matinée musicale on Monday last at Collards' New Rooms. They were assisted by some of the artists from Her Majesty's Theatre, comprising Mad. Borghi-Mamo, Signor Belart, Signor Everardi, and M. Remusat, first flute in the orchestra. Mad. Everardi, wife to the barytone, and M. Jules Lefort, were also amongst the singers; and Mlle. Laure Colmache, and Mr. G. A. Osborne, pianists, added their services in the instrumental department. Mlle. Vaneri sang the cavatina, "Qui la voce," from I Puritani, and some French romances, displaying undeniable talent in both styles of composition, and delighting the entire audience by her ease and facility, and the fine quality of her voice; Mad. Borghi-Mamo introduced the grand air of Malcolm Græme, from the Donna del Lago, which she sang superbly, and a serenata by Braza with violoncello obbligato, which was almost equally effective. Mlle. Laure Colmache, in her two pianoforte solos—caprice by Mendelssohn, and Stephen Heller's "La Truite"—exhibited a sound free style, and much dexterity of execution. Solos were also furnished by Mr. G. A. Osborne on the piano, M. Remusat on the flute, Herr Engel on the harmonium, and M. Samary on the violoncello, all with masterly skill.

HERR WILHELM GANZ' ANNUAL MORNING CONCERT (June 29th) took place at St. James's Hall under royal and distinguished patronage; Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Cambridge and Her Royal Highness the Princess Mary heading the list of patrons. For such grand guests—patronesses are sometimes expected to attend performances to which they lend the glitter of their names—Herr Ganz provided a good bill of fare, comprising selections from the works of Mozart, Beethoven, Rossini, Hummel, Meyerbeer, &c., for the true devotees of music, and less recherché viands for the more homely disposed. It was in fact a well-varied programme and fitted to many tastes. Herr Ganz himself—a nimble-fingered and sound pianist—selected for his displays Hummel's grand quintet in E flat minor (Op. 87), for pianoforte, violin, viola, and basso—in which he was assisted by M. Sainton, Herr Goffrie, M. Paque, and Mr. F. S. Pratten; Beethoven's Sonata Pathètique; Thalberg and De Beriot's grand duo for pianoforte and violin, performed with M. Sainton; and Prudent's Caprice on airs from La Sonnambula, with all of which—more particularly Beethoven's sonata—the distinguished visitors appeared mightily pleased. Solos were executed by M. Sainton and M. Paque on their respective instruments. The vocal music was contributed by Mesdames Catherine Hayes, Lemmens-Sherrington, and Sainton-Dolby; Mr. Wilbye Cooper, Mr. Santley, and Herr Hermanns, nothing of which being novel stands in need of communication. Messrs. Benedict, W. G. Cusins, and Wilhelm Ganz officiated as conductors.

THE MATINÉE MUSICALE OF MADAME DE VAUCHERAN attracted a large and fashionable audience to the Beethoven Rooms, Harley Street, on Monday, the 9th instant. Mad. de Vaucheran is a pianist with a good deal of talent; but unfortunately she was so nervous the evening of her concert as almost to incapacitate her entirely from playing at first. She began with a duo for two pianos, whch she played with Mr. Walter Sangster, followed by an étude of Theodore Kulla.'s, and a duet for piano and violin by Stephen Heller, with Herr Goffrie. This would have been enough for the most experienced performer; but when we have to add Mozart's quatuor in G minor, and Beethoven's in E flat (Op. 16), for piano, violin, viola, and violoncello, it will be readily acknowledged that too much was asked of the fair artist, whose talent is by no means inconsiderable, and who will be appreciated yet at her full value. The vocal music was distributed among the following singers: — Mrs. Alexander Newton, Miss Rowcroft, Mlle. Vaneri, Miss Kate Ranoe, Mr. Leonard, Mr. W. Graeff Nicholls, Mr. P. E. Van Noorden, and Herr Eibenschutz. Mrs. Alexander Newton gave Bishop's "Lo! here the gentle lark," and the bolero from the Vêpres Siciliennes, with great brilliancy; Mlle. Vaneri sang the "Couplets de Mariée," from the Etoile du Nord, with remarkable skill; and Miss Kate Ranoe's pleasing voice and style were manifested in Mr. Balfe's song, "Oh! take me to thy heart again."

MISS ELEONORA WILKINSON'S MORNING CONCERT was given at the residence of Lady Bisshopp, 29 Hill Street, Berkeley Square, on Tuesday, July 3rd. Miss Wilkinson has not been long before the public, scarcely long enough, indeed, to warrant her giving a benefit concert. Young ladies, however, now-a-days, are by no means prone to backwardness. On the contrary, directly they have finished learning they begin to teach; and no sooner have they sung their first song or played their first piece than they begin to think about giving their first concert. This is another proof of the new spirit of the times, a sign that the properties of the "fast school" are not confined to the male sex. However, as Miss Wilkinson's concert was given in a private residence, it can hardly come within the category of public exhibitions, although no doubt any body might have secured the right of entrée by paying the asked-for fee. The fair beneficiaire was assisted in the vocal department by Mlle. Elvira Behrens, Mad. Sainton-Dolby, Mr. Wilbye Cooper, and M. Jules Lefort; and in the instrumental by Herr Lehmeyer and Herr W. Ganz (piano), Herr Ries (violin), Signor Regondi (concertina), Herr Oberthur (harp), M. Paque (violoncello), and Master Drew Dean (flute). Miss Wilkinson sang "Perche non ho" from Lucia; the song "Sweet Bird," from Handel's Penseroso; besides taking part in a duet with Mad. Sainton-Dolby, and in two quartets with Mlle. Behrens, Mr. Wilbye Cooper, and M. Jules Lefort.

MR. BALFE'S SECOND CONCERT AT THE SURREY GARDENS.—The music hall of these favourite gardens was so crowded on the occasion of Mr. Balfe's first concert, that we imagined the number of the audience had attained its maximum. There seems, however, to be no numerical limit to the lovers of music in the metropolis; and the attraction being greater last Wednesday, when the second of the popular composer's so-called "festivals" took place, the assemblage was proportionately increased. Every corner in the body of the hall was occupied—and there were no seats in this part of the building to take up valuable space, while all the galleries, including the topmost one, were completely filled by anxious listeners. To the thoroughly popular character of the programme the enormous audience is doubtless, in some measure, to be attributed. The pieces were not in this case all selected from the works of Mr. Balfe, but were mostly chosen rather on account of their tuneful then classical merits. Thus Mlle. Parepa selected from her extensive répertoire the "Shadow Song" from Dinorah, in which she was encored, and the spirited laughing song from Manon Lescaut. Miss Poole gave "The Young Recruit," which the Orphéonistes seem to have again brought into vogue, and, when encored, she sang "Wapping Old Stairs" unaccompanied, the droll pathos of which she brought out with exquisite taste. Mad. Louisa Vining gave Mendelssohn's "First Violet," and Berger's song, "'Tis best to be off with the old love before you are on with the new," for which, when encored, she substituted "Comin' thro' the rye;" and Mad. Laura Baxter rendered admirably the ballad, "I cannot change as others change." Miss Kate Ranoe, whose name will probably not be long unfamiliar to the public, sang Balfe's pretty ballad, "Oh, take me to thy heart again," with unusual expression and feeling. As this was virtually the first public appearance of Miss Ranoe, it is not surprising that traces of nervousness were perceptible; but it was nevertheless evident that the débutante possesses a mezzo-soprano voice of sympathetic and pleasing quality, that her articulation is remarkably distinct, and that her method does great credit to the celebrated Duprez, under whose guidance she has been pursuing her studies. Mr. Sims Reeves is the very Jupiter among singers with the audiences of the Surrey Gardens. and when he opens his mouth it is as though the King of Gods spoke in thunder. Two of his songs were set down in the programme in immediate succession, so that when Mr. Sims Reeves was honoured with the inevitable recall in "Come into the garden, Maud," he re-appeared and sang his second song, the very graceful ballad, "Margaretta," as the encore, and thus the insatiable instincts of the audience were appeased, with no injustice to the vocalist. "My Pretty Jane" was also redemanded, and Mr. Reeves instantly acceded to the call by repeating the second verse. Mr. George Perren gave the tenor air from the Trovatore, "Ah! si, ben mio!" but was more successful in the English ballad, "When other lips;" and Mr. Kelly, in the absence of Mr. Patey, sang the air, "Though forture darkly o'er me frown," from the Rose of Castille. The instrumentalists were Mr. Viotti Collins, who played the two Carnivals of Venice and of Cuba; and Miss Arabella Goddard, whose splendid performances of Thalberg's fantaisie on "The last rose of summer," and "Home, sweet, home," are too well known to require comment. The audience, although so numerous, evidently fully appreciated good playing, for they encored both pieces. After the first piece, however, Miss Goddard contented herself with bowing her acknowledgments, but the fair performer was compelled to repeat the second. Mr. Balfe's overtures to the Rose of Castille and to Falstaff were well performed by a small but efficient orchestra. Mad. Alboni is to be added to the attractions of the next concert.

MISS SUSAN GODDARD gave a Matinée Musicale at Collard's Rooms, on Tuesday, the 3rd instant. This young lady, one of our most promising pianists, performed Beethoven's grand sonata, in D minor; Moscheles' duet for two pianofortes, "Homage à Handel," with Mr. Benedict; and with Messrs. Buziau and Douay, a trio by Beethoven, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello. Mlle. Artôt, Mad. Everardi, Signors Corsi, Delle Sedie, and Everardi were the singers; Messrs. Benedict and Harold Thomas conducted.

MISS MADELENA CRONIN'S SOIREE (June 14th) is entitled to notice, were it for nothing else, in respect of the admirable selection of music offered by the beneficiaire, who is a pianist of no ordinary pretensions. The pianoforte pieces included the "Kreutzer Sonata" of Beethoven, played with Herr Becker; Hummel's sonata in F minor; Bach's fugue in C minor; Scarlatti's sonata in A major; Handel's "Harmonious Blacksmith"; Mendelssohn's caprice, No. 3; Liszt's "La Regata Veneziana"; and Chopin's "Impromptu in A flat." Mad. Louisa Vinning and Herr Eibenschütz supplied vocal pieces. The concert, which was held at 6 Harewood Square, Regent's Park, was attended by a brilliant and numerous assembly.

MR. JOHN NICKINSON, Organist of St. Mary's, Battersea, gave a concert at Lammas Hall, on the 3rd instant, under distinguished patronage. The concert was of a singular character, inasmuch as four blind artists assisted in it. They were—Mr. Lea Summers, pianist; Mr. W. Bishop, tenor; Miss Scott, soprano; and Mr. J. Reed, barytone. With these were engaged as vocalists—Miss Banks, Miss Bradshaw, Miss Eliza Travers, and Mr. Stanley Mayo. The performance was given under the immediate direction of Mr. W. H. Monk, of King's College, London, and the School for the Blind, St. George's Fields; who, with Mr. Nickinson, acted as conductors.

PROFESSORS' CONCERT UNION.—The third performance of the series of concerts given by the above Union was devoted to Miss Summerhayes, the young pianist, whom we have more than once noted as of provincial celebrity. The programme was first-rate, and comprised, for the special pieces, Spohr's trio in B flat, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, and Beethoven's quartet in D major, No. 3, for two violins, viola, and violoncello. In the trio Miss Summerhayes was assisted by Mr. H. Blagrove and Mr. Daubert; the quartet was executed by Messrs. H. Blagrove, Clementi, R. Blagrove, and Daubert. In addition to Spohr's trio, Miss Summerhayes played Mendelssohn's Rondo Cappriccioso and joined Mr. Blagrove in Benedict and David's duet on Oberon. The young lady's execution is neat and finished, and her style unpretending in the extreme. The singers were Mad. Louisa Vinning and Miss Lascelles. The last-named lady sang Mercadante's "Un Sogno," with violoncello obbligato by Mr. Daubert, as well as a new ballad called "In that happy time." Mad. Vinning gave Rossini's barcarole "Voli, voli," and both ladies united their voices in Mendelssohn's charming duets "The Greeting," and "Maybells."

MR. EDMUND J. CHIPP, one of our most accomplished organists and efficient members of the orchestra, has recently (June 21) taken his degree as Doctor of Music at the University of Cambridge. The exercise performed for the occasion was a sacred oratorio, entitled Job, the words entirely selected from the Holy Scriptures. Mr. Sims Reeves, with his usual generous feeling for a brother artist, most kindly volunteered (unsolicited) to sing the tenor part, but was unavoidably prevented from carrying out his intention by a previous engagement requiring his services on the day fixed by the authorities. Mr. Reeves, however, sent down the best possible substitute that could be found, Mr. Wilbye Cooper, who gave great satisfaction in the principal part. This is the first musical degree that has been taken under the present professor, Dr. Sterndale Bennett, and the only one with the exception of the "Professor," that has been conferred for eight years past.

MUSIC v. DEVOTION.

STRANGE as it may appear to many minds, Music has been characterised by some superficial thinkers as an art opposed to the true spirit of devotion. That nothing could be said more antagonistic to truth I need not go far to prove. For almost every great mind, whether scientific, philosophic, or poetic, has affirmed the contrary, and volumes of quotations might be easily collected to show that in the opinions of the best informed of our race, melody and harmony are the essence and soul of devotion. But space will not admit of many quotations, nor indeed are they here necessary, scattered broadcast as they are throughout our literature, and springing up in every direction. By one writer music has been beautifully defined as "an universal language, which harmoniously relates the reminiscences of the heart;" and Carlyle finely says,—"Who is there that, in logical words, can express the effect music has on us? A kind of inarticulate, unfathomable speech, which leads us to the edge of the infinite, and lets us for a few moments gaze into that." In similar strains speak all who have made the inner life of our species their study. They declare that music is an essential spiritual requirement of humanity. There is no grade of society, whether in civilised or uncivilised communities, but manifests in some degree the universality of this great gift of the Creator. And whilst freely granting that "he whose soul does not sing need not try to do it with his throat," I would as strongly avow that few indeed are they whose souls do never sing, or, at least, were not intended by the Great Father of Spirits to sing. The savage chieftain and his painted men-at-arms sing joyous songs in commemoration of victories won in the field, and ease their burdened hearts of sorrow in requiems to the manes of fallen heroes. Emperors and kings, ages before the "sweet singer of Israel" tuned his majestic harp, down to the present day, bowed and are bowing to the all-powerful spirit of song; whilst captives in their dungeons lighten their fetters, and transform their clanking harshness into melody by the aid of the same eternal beneficent endowment.

Whilst I would not for a moment seek to disparage the great and good results which have come down to us through the Reformation, whilst I admit to the full how much our present glorious liberty is due to the stern patriotism of the men who figured so nobly in that great struggle with priestcraft and mental tyranny consequent thereon, I still think a great error was committed in depriving the church ritual so entirely of its musical element, and one from which it has suffered, and is suffering at the present day. To this cause I think we may fairly attribute the rise of the High Church party. But time alone will show whether the effects that party shall ultimately produce are to be beneficial or disastrous to the Establishment. That some weak-minded or designing men have been met with in their ranks it would be folly to deny, having proved themselves such by eventually going over to Rome. But to say that all who are known as belonging to that party are men of the same stamp, would exemplify a most invidious spirit, and merit nothing short of contempt. Can it be supposed that a large body of men, high in natural endowments and educational acquirements, and having, many of them, a great stake in the varied interests and well-being of their country, are yet so blinded (as some affirm) to its welfare as to desire to hand over to a foreign power the consciences and spiritual liberty of a free and great people, as we are proud to entitle the dwellers in these our island homes? Surely not! Could such, indeed, be proved to be the fact, Bedlam could alone provide a proper "living" for such, and it would be the duty of the nation to place them there at once. Undoubtedly the scenes lately enacted at St. George's-in-the-East were disgraceful to a degree I care not to denominate, and are a scandal to the Church, which appears possessed of no power to put an end to them. But it can hardly be admitted that the persons who have figured in those shameful demonstrations are actuated by religious convictions of one kind or another. They were simply a lawless mob, who would not have been tolerated in any Ranter's conventicle, but who, in the Church as established by law, cannot be molested.

I am firmly persuaded in my own mind that for very many years past there has existed a deeply-felt craving in the soul of intellectual humanity for a higher mode of expressing its praises to the Almighty than the customary mode of reading the liturgy of the Church affords. Therefore I conclude it to be very probable that this much-maligned party in the Church may have prevented very many from going over to Rome who otherwise might have done so. It has been too much the fashion of the Establishment almost totally to ignore man's musical nature for generations past, and it cannot be matter for surprise, when a law of nature is violated, that she should seek to assert her eternal supremacy.

Let it not be supposed I am here advocating the bowings, crossings—and, above all, the confessional—of Rome. Far from it. I denounce them all, and believe them to be the very sands and shoals which have hitherto impeded the progress of that party who have sought the introduction of a musical service into the Church's ritual. I believe one of the most crying wants of our age is a pure and authorised musical liturgy, without the adjuncts of the puerilities of Rome, which at best tend only to mar the solemnity, beauty, and dignity of their otherwise noble service. The music of Rome is certainly an unobjectionable feature in the service of that church—unobjectionable because founded in nature and truth, and hallowed by the seal and sanctity of the ancient servants of God. "David appointed for the service of the tabernacle four thousand Levites, divided into twenty-four courses, and marshalled under several leaders, whose sole business it was to sing hymns, and to perform the instrumental music in the public worship. . . . . In chap. xxv. first book of Chronicles, an account is given of David's institutions, relating to the sacred music and poetry; which were certainly more costly, more splendid and magnificent, than ever obtained in the public service of any other nation." A time came when the Jews introduced within the temple walls cattle and merchandise, and the money-changers were busy there improving their temporal condition. The spirit of Mammon had usurped the seat of divine harmony, and "Ichabod" was written on Israel's glory. It is a bad sign of the times when the temples of Mammon outvie in splendour those dedicated to the Supreme Being. Who could suppose—did he not know it to be the fact—that that is Mr. Gingham, who "keeps" the shop in Spruce Street, marvellous for its breadth of plate glass and costly fittings, complacently, so to speak, worshipping the Creator in this incongruous eye-sore of a place, inferior in most points to a London cow shed? Yet so it is. Is there no music in his soul—has Mammon absorbed it all—that he can sit and listen unnerved to that horrible agology for "singing to the praise and glory of God?" True, the sight before us is one of the evidences of our freedom as a people—its only pleasing trait—and it is also true that God needs no temple made with hands of one kind or another. Man, however, needs a temple wherein reverently to worship God; and surely, if there is one building which more than another demands of him that he shall bestow upon it his best gifts, whether in its construction or internal conduct, it is the temple man rears in honour of the Creator of the universe. Who has not, on some lovely summer Sunday morning, gone into a place of worship with a heart leaping with love and thankfulness towards his heavenly Father, and has not there found those same feelings damped and well-nigh expunged by the cold, listless, unhearty tone of all and every thing around him? Few, I venture to answer, who take any interest in observing the age and manners in which his own lot is cast. On the other hand, let a man saunter in a listless careless mode into some Catholic place of worship, and, in spite of the priestly artifices, which tend to shock the mind — in spite of the service being performed in an unknown tongue — the music will lift his soul out of himself, and carry it even to the foot of the throne of the Eternal, and the man must worship and adore his Maker. And if such results are attained here in spite of many a drawback, what might we not confidently expect from the beautiful ritual of the Church of England (amended in some few points) set to fitting music, and performed in a manner equal to that of the Romish Church? I humbly believe nothing (under God) would so tend to increase in the land a spirit of true and genuine devotion. I believe that Romish chapels, now so much on the increase in this country, would henceforth increase but slowly, or probably suffer declension, and that secession chapels of all denominations would halt in their onward march, encouraged as they now are by that party in the Church which affects to ignore in public worship all that can prove from man to man he really does value his soul more than his body.

Let us then urge on our gracious Queen and the Parliament no longer to allow the present disorganised state of the Church to continue. Let the objectionable passages in its liturgy be expunged, the rubrics revised, and all matters relating to its conduct fixed, and placed beyond the possibility of dispute. Let the amended liturgy be then placed in able hands for the purpose of wedding it to music fitting the grandeur of the words, and the Church will attain her due position in the land, and we shall cease to hear that the most intellectual portion of the community are never to be seen in a place of public worship; for the Church will then have ceased to be a bye-word and a reproach, and will be loved, honoured, and maintained as a sure guide through the wilderness of this world to that far higher, holier, and happier one to which we all trust our God and Father will bring us hereafter.

WORCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—We have now had a sight of the complete musical scheme for the forthcoming meeting of the Three Choirs in this city, in the second week of September, and we can promise our musical friends that there is a rich treat in store for them. We announced some weeks ago that it was intended to have four oratorio mornings instead of three as heretofore, the full cathedral service on the Tuesday morning being dispensed with, and the usual sermon in aid of the charity for the relief of clergymen's widows and orphans being preached after the early morning service on that day. By this change in the ancient order of things at our festivals (which we believe has been brought about chiefly at the suggestion of the invaluable honorary secretary to the Festival, the Rev. R. Sarjeant,) something more of novelty will be imparted to the selection of sacred music than has been possible hitherto. For a number of years two of the three oratorio mornings have been regularly and systematically devoted to that greatest of oratorios, Handel's Messiah, and to the more modern Elijah of Mendelssohn, leaving but one morning for any other selection. By the change which will be inaugurated this year we shall have two spare mornings, and thus on the approaching occasion there will be given, besides the two standard works already mentioned, another of Mendelssohn's—his St. Paul, and Spohr's great work The Last Judgment, besides selections from Haydn's Creation and Handel's Judas Maccabæus. In the selection from The Creation the public will have an opportunity of hearing, for the last time, the delicious soul-entrancing voice of Clara Novello—after this year to assume her proper married title —in the lovely air "With verdure clad." This song will, we have no doubt, itself draw to our cathedral at the very opening of the Festival a full attendance, and perhaps on that account it was good policy to place this selection and the rarely heard St. Paul in the first morning's scheme, so that visitors may have no desire to defer their journey to Worcester to the middle of the week. Mad. Novello will also sing several of the recitatives and songs in St. Paul; Mad. Rudersdorff, Mad. Sainton-Dolby, Sims Reeves, and Belletti, also taking parts. The selection from Judas Maccabæus, on Wednesday morning, is admirably chosen, and includes some of the most beautiful pieces in the oratorio. Mad. Novello is set down for the airs "Pious orgies," and "From mighty Kings." Belletti sings the glorious war song "Arm, arm, ye brave"; to Sims Reeves is given the "Sound an alarm," and the beautiful trio and chorus "See the conquering hero comes," which was so wonderfully effective at the Handelian Commemoration, at the Crystal Palace, is included in the selection, together with the very pick of the choruses. The "cast" for the Elijah, on Thursday morning, is the best that could possibly be made. First and foremost we rejoice to see the principal part—the Prophet—given to an Englishman, for with all Belletti's acknowledged ability we have never listened to his enunciation of the beautiful bass solos in this oratorio with half the pleasure that Weiss' rendering of them has given us. Mr. Weiss, however, has a Herculean task in undertaking the whole of the principal bass music of the Elijah. Mad. Novello sings the glorious song introductory of the second part of the oratorio, "Hear ye Israel," and also assists in the beautiful concerted pieces—the double quartet, the trio "Lift thine eyes," the delicious quartet "Cast thy burden," and the "Holy, holy." Mad. Sainton-Dolby and Sims Reeves sing in the Elijah, and also in the Messiah on the Friday morning. In the latter, Novello will sing the divine air "I know that my Reedemer," and also take other parts in the oratorio. Of the evening concerts we shall take an opportunity to speak hereafter. We may briefly observe that the scheme contains more than one novelty, chiefest of which, however, is a new cantata, The Erl King's Daughter, which has never yet been performed in England. Sterndale Bennett's Pastoral, The May Queen, and a selection from Wallace's Lurline, are also included in the programme for the evening concerts. We may mention that the hon. secretary is in treaty with the Railway companies, and there can be no doubt that the most convenient arrangement for visitors will be made. It is also intended to issue serial tickets for the whole of the performances at a most reasonable rate, which we think will be largely taken advantage of when the conditions are made public.—Worcester Journal.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA AT SYDNEY.—In the past month there has not been much to chronicle, beyond a well-attended concert at Balmain on the 9th inst. The entertainments known as the People's Concerts continue to give satisfaction, and to be sufficiently well supported. It is still anticipated that there will be a revival of the Opera, under the management of Mr. S. Colville, at the Prince of Wales Theatre. Signora and Signor Bianchi are hourly expected, and will appear at the Prince of Wales Theatre shortly after their arrival. It seems, however, to be not yet quite a settled thing whether the Opera is to be re-established for any length of time upon its former basis. It is nevertheless probable that Signora and Signor Bianchi will appear in the new opera of Lurline, composed by our former fellow-townsman, Mr. Vincent Wallace, and recently produced at Covent Garden with complete success. Lurline will doubtless be well received as Wallace's chef d'œuvre. A great hit has been made in the production of Jessie Brown, or the Relief of Lucknow, which has drawn crowded houses for the last fortnight, and seems likely to run for some time. It is a spirited drama written by Dion Bourcicault, on the great historical event suggested by its title. The principal character is the Highland Jessie of Miss Provost, who is effectively supported by Messrs. Rayner, Burford, Fitzgerald, and other members of the company. The piece is placed upon the stage in a creditable manner, with new costumes, and effective scenery. A number of clever minor pieces have been well received. Amongst the plays brought out this month must be mentioned the three-act tragedy of Phædra, in which the character of the Athenian Queen was vividly sustained by Mary Provost. Unfortunately the weather was so inclement, and the down-pour so incessant, that there was but a thin house. In spite of discouragement, however, and the disadvantage of a very imperfect Œnone, Phædra was, to those who ventured out to see it, an intellectual treat. It will probably be reproduced shortly, and it is to be hoped under less adverse circumstances. The Royal Victoria Theatre is again open—the British and American Circus Company playing to tolerably numerous houses, attracted nightly by gymnastic, equestrian, and other performances.

ANECDOTE OF CHERUBINI.—Every musician has heard of Cherubini's rebuffs and discourtesies to other musicians, which, after their kind, were almost as numerous as the incivilities of our Abernethy. But, like other habitually rude persons, Cherubini could sometimes pay a compliment, and when he did so it was with a considerate grace as remarkable as his habitual bluntness. M. Halévy's notice of Onslow, lately read at the Institute, includes the following anecdote. — In a symphony by Onslow, which was performed at one of the Conservatoire concerts, a passage occurred, the contrivance and detail of which pleased the difficult Italian maestro mightily. When the concert was over, Cherubini borrowed Onslow's score from Habeneck, the conductor, — tore out the leaf containing the passage in question, and replaced it by a copy of the same in his own writing, — returning the MS. with a note in which he apologised for the liberty taken, adding "that he had long wished to possess Onslow's autograph."

ENGLISH ACTORS IN AMERICA.—A Philadelphia paper once had an interesting notice of the appearance of our countryman, Mr. Macready, at the Arch Theatre, in that city. We regret to find, however, that he was not treated with the courtesy which, apart from all differences of opinion respecting his merits as an actor, was surely due to him as a stranger to the country, and an artist enjoying a high reputation in his native land. His appearance at the "Arch," however, was the signal for a disgraceful "row"—for such it was—between the rival partisans of Mr. Macready and Mr. Forrest, the well-known tragedian of New York. During the progress of the play the efforts of the blackguard portion of the audience to get up a "scene" were defeated by the respectable majority of the spectators. They made sufficient noise, however, to drown the finest passages of the drama, and their more overt acts were outrageous. Pennypieces were flung upon the stage amidst outcries that would have shamed the fishfags of Billingsgate; and in the last act, a rotten egg was hurled at the person of Mr. Macready, but it missed the mark, and fell broken at his feet. This and several other gross insults were encountered with the most gentlemanly forbearance. At the fall of the curtain, he was "called for," and appeared amid an almost universal waving of hats, and the most tumultuous applause ever heard in a theatre. It was several minutes before he attempted to speak, so loud and general was the noise of friends and foes. He at length said he had understood, at New York and Boston, that he was to be met by an organised opposition, but he had an abiding confidence in the justice of the American people. (Here the noise and confusion completely drowned his voice, and three cheers were attempted for Forrest, and three hearty ones were given for Macready.) He resumed by saying, it was the custom in his country never to condemn a man unheard. (Cheers and calls, in which Forrest's name was heard.) Mr. Macready went on to observe that it had been said that he entertained hostile feelings towards an actor in this country, and that he had evinced a feeling of opposition towards him—all, which statements, severally and in the aggregate, he declared wholly and entirely unfounded. The actor alluded to had done that towards him which he was sure no English actor would do—and what he believed no other American actor would do—he had openly hissed him. (Great noise and confusion, hisses, and hurras.) Up to the time of that act he had never entertained towards that actor a feeling of unkindness, nor had he ever shown any since. When opposition in his country had been organised against a French company, he actively interested himself to allay it. He said he fully appreciated the character and feelings of the audience, and as to his engagement, if it was their will, he was willing to give it up at once ("No, no!" cheers, and hisses); but that he should retain in his memory the liveliest recollection of the warm and general sentiments of regard shown him, and should speak of the American people, whom he had known and studied for the last 20 years, with the same kind feelings that he had ever done. Throughout the closing scene—as, indeed, he did throughout the entire play—Mr. Macready bore up under the many vexatious annoyances of a small part of the audience with great apparent good humour, but once showing any warmth of feeling, and then but for a moment. "The movement of the whole evening," remarked the reporter of a Philadelphia paper, "was the most disgraceful that we ever saw in a theatre, and it was gratifying to hear the object of an assault so brutal and uncalled-for, attributed to the proper source—to a few ill-bred riotous persons, to be found in every community, in every nation." The same paper had a notice of Mr. Maurice Power, who had just closed an engagement at the same theatre. It appears that whilst he had been the delight of the New York public, the audiences of Philadelphia were not so well pleased. They went to the theatre expecting to see old Power redivivus, and of course went away partially disappointed. The American critic thus spake of his merits:—"There is much in Mr. Power's acting, and more in his appearance, that reminds us of his gifted parent. In the good-humoured twinkle of his eye, and that true Milesian jollity of countenance, no one for a moment could mistake his father's own son. His nice discriminating taste, and gentlemanly bearing on the stage, show him to be particularly fitted for the higher walks of genteel comedy. His speech about honour, in St. Patrick's Eve, was made just so much of, and no more, as a brave soldier would be likely to make of such a subject, and thus a fine opportunity for melodramatic rant was lost; and though he failed to bring down the galleries, he did not offend the good taste of the more judicious part of his audience. His brogue, without being caricatured, was rich and unaffected. The fault most obvious in Mr. Power's acting, is a want of sufficient flexibility of voice—that agreeable modulation of tone which is so pleasant to the ear, and which could easily be acquired by practice; his voice is pitched to a certain key, and kept too much upon a continual strain. But even during his short engagement here there was a sensible improvement in this particular. Should he appear before us again, we hope we may bespeak for him a more cordial reception."

"THE HARP OF WALES."

Sung by Mr. SIMS REEVES,

COMPOSED BY BRINLEY RICHARDS.

Price 2s. 6d.

"'The Harp of Wales' (sung for the first time) is a very graceful song, admirably adapted for Mr. Sims Reeves, and sung by the distinguished tenor with a refinement of expression which produced a magical effect on the audience, and raised demands for repetition which were not to be denied."—Daily Telegraph.

"'The Harp of Wales,' beautifully sung by Mr. Sims Reeves, was unanimously redemanded."—Morning Post.

"The other was new and sung for the first time by Mr. Sims Reeves. It is called the 'Harp of Wales,' and is a lovely and expressive melody. It was enthusiastically encored."—Daily News.

"Mr. Richards did honour to his fatherland by introducing a new song, 'The Harp of Wales,' which is sure to become a favourite of the Cymri, who are justly proud of their bards. So admirably was this sung by Mr. Sims Reeves, that an encore was inevitable, and the ballad was as warmly applauded the second time as the first."—Musical World.

Review.

Erin—fantasia on Irish Melodies; Caledonia—fantasia on Scotch Melodies. Composed expressly for Miss Arabella Goddard, by JULES BENEDICT. New Edition. (Boosey and Sons).

THAT these brilliant morceaux de bravoure should have attained almost unexampled popularity is not to be wondered at. Though not enthusiastic advocates quand même of the fantasia (according to the modern acceptation of the term) we cannot refrain from expressing our entire approval of the manner, at once clever and congenial, in which Mr. Benedict has treated the beautiful melodies that form the ground-work of the above-named pieces. For Erin he has selected two of the most racy of the Irish national tunes, which will be easiest recognised under the comparatively recent titles of "Believe me if all those endearing young charms," and "The Minstrel Boy." For Caledonia he has had recourse to "Auld Robin Gray," and one of the liveliest, most piquant, and characteristic of the Scottish reels. In both instances the wisdom of his choice is borne out by the complete success of his workmanship. The airs are admirably harmonised; the passages are, without exception, grateful, showy, and effective (at the same time not superfluously difficult). The plan of each fantasia is clear, well defined, and masterly; and in the Irish as in the Scotch essay the character of the national tune is imitated throughout with the utmost felicity. In short, Erin and Caledonia, while just as brilliant, just as ingenious in contrivance, and just as fitted for the advantageous display of "virtuosity" as any of the celebrated show-pieces of Thalberg, Döhler, Herz, or Léopold de Meyer, are more pleasing and far more entertaining than the majority of such effusions; perhaps because more unconstrained and in many respects more genuinely artistic. But in composing for Miss Arabella Goddard it was not surprising that Mr. Benedict should be happily inspired.

MUSIC AND THEATRES IN PARIS.

July 25, 1860.

PITY the sorrows of a poor correspondent, afflicted with an entire dearth of news. I have nibbed my pen with minute dexterity. I have squared the spotless quire before me with convenient symmetry. In my best round hand I have turned off a heading with the date appended, which is a perfect caligraphic model. Then comes a pause. I gaze wistfully at the blank beneath. The cream-laid desert spreads its virgin bosom before me and invites me to people it with a swarthy swarm of eloquent vocables. Alas! the blank without does but answer with melancholy fidelity to the blank within. Meanwhile, the ticking clock warns me of passing, precious, inexorable moments, drawing on with an invisible cord the steadily advancing post hour. I observe the ink is dry upon the neatly amputated nib of my pen. I dip again, shake off the superfluous liquid back into its Acherontic reservoir with a sanguine flourish, and make as I would commence without more ado. Again the stylus halts paralysed in mid air; again with vacant stare I watch its shiny black muzzle grow feverishly dry as though with nervous impatience at the long suspense. Memory peruses her tablets of the past week in vain for some incident worthy to be recorded in the columns of the M. W. She brings me instead a story of poor D. J., who had once in a moment of fatal good nature promised his friend Hammond, then managing the little theatre in the Strand, to dramatize the Pickwick Papers, just completed, and enjoying that gigantic burst of popularity which made Dickens' fame commence like a polar day without crepusculum. D. J. had with intelligible procrastination—for he abhorred dealing with material that was not all furnished from the mine of his own fancy—put off the task till matters were growing desperate, and the manager feared to be last in the field with his version; for they were springing up everywhere like mushrooms after a shower. At last the kind-hearted little author, seeing Hammond's distress, determined to overcome his reluctance to the work by one decisive resolute effort, and knowing his own powers of work, promised there and then that he would sit up all night and finish the piece off at once. H. in high delight took him at his word, provided quires of paper, a bundle of quills, a fresh bottle of ink, and, to prevent the devoted labourer flagging at his task, or cooling over his resolution, the best part of a bottle of excellent "Old Tom." With this little arsenal of materials before him, and a pair of fresh-lit long sixes, Hammond left his friend seated at the table wearing a fresh, sparkling, resolute air, and with a keen intelligent glance turning over the leaves of a bound copy of the Pickwick Papers, and with an easy mind retired to bed. In the morning, at the grey of dawn, down came Hammond in slippers and dressing-gown to inspect D. J.'s progress, and offer him some refreshment after his night's toil. Fearing to disturb him in some happy moment of inspiration, and perhaps spoiling the neat turn he might probably be giving to the tag of the last act, he crept cautiously into the chamber where he had left D. J. As he advanced, a touching spectacle presented itself to the exacting manager. There lay the weary head of the intellectual artificer sunk in the heavy sleep of exhaustion upon the table, and only saved from immediate contact with its hard pillow by the folded arms of the worn-out watcher, while the instrument of his toil, still clutched in the cramped fingers, thrust its feathery tip through the author's dishevelled hair, triumphant evidence of the tenacity with which he had wrestled with sleep, as a strong man wrestles with death. "Poor fellow," thought Hammond—gratitude at his friend's devotion giving an extra tenderness to his pity—"he has evidently struggled with painful staunchness till the last syllable of his work was finished, and then, no longer supported by his giant spirit, has sunk suddenly and heavily over his accomplished task, as a well-matched gladiator, after a long protracted contest, faints over his vanquished enemy." As he glanced at the gin-bottle, drained to the last goutlet of its stimulating contents, his impression of the intensity of D. J.'s application was deepened by the evidence of the eagerness with which he had availed himself of any artificial support to the strength and endurance of nature. Softly and tenderly he raised that poor weary precious head—the casket whence so many priceless gems had been drawn—some showered forth carelessly to glance in the sunlight of genial conversation—some carefully set in the lasting incorruptible gold of pure noble English, to be stored for ever in the jewel house of English literature. Softly, tenderly he raised that head hot and feverish with the reaction of overspent powers, and as he did so, the lips muttered forth under the influence of busy dreams the sublime incoherencies of genius, "All right! old fellow;" "All right! my boy;" "Getting on capitally." Hammond placed his friend for a moment in another recumbent position, as easy a one as he could, and hastily snatched up the much-desired MS., the fruit of so courageous and generous an effort. Eagerly he read ACT THE FIRST, Scene the first. Enter Sam Weller. The rest carebat. Six blank quires beneath anxiously awaited the conclusion.

On this occasion I enact the character of Sam Weller. Enter Paris Correspondent. P. C. loquitur: Nichts. Niente. Nada. Nihil. Nothing.

If my legitimate helpmate, Memory, be barren or coy, may I not, as many venerable patriarchs of the confraternity of chroniclers have done before me, take unto myself the hand-maiden Imagination, to the end that a progeny may be born unto me, if only of canards? But no! the canard is a base bird, with the incubation of which I will have nothing to do. Rather will I arm me with the far-sighted rifle of authority and slaughter them wherever they appear, as enemies to the true dignity of the journalist. Yet amidst the famine that has visited the purveyors of musical and dramatic intelligence here, I must dish up, if not a banquet, some sort of repast that shall be palatable, if not substantial. The culinary genius of France inspire me, thou that makest savoury salmis of cast-off shoon and dressest eggs in as many divers fashions as there are days in the year! What have I to offer for my first course?

At the Grand Opera Semiramis still retains its position in the bills, and with good reason, for the receipts grow higher with each performance. The Opera Comique presents a more varied series of entertainments but with as little approach to novelty. The Songe d'une nuit d'Eté has been done, and the Fille du Regiment, and the Dame Blanche, and the Domino Noir, but what sauce, however piquante, can disguise the staleness of such fare. Roger, by the way, after playing Horace in the last-named opera, has taken his departure for Baden. Having intended for a remove to entertain you with a little theatrical intelligence, and that article being entirely deficient in the market, we must pass on to the entrées. First, as an agreeable hors-d'œuvre, I have two little facts to record which you will receive with equal relish. M. Delaporte, who received such high honours for leading the Orpheonists into a string of bungling disasters and inconveniences, has very properly resigned his presidency of the Commission des Societés Chorales, having proved his total incapacity for any kind of business whatever. Secondly, Adolphus Sax, the much injured brass instrument maker and inventor, and a very excellent fellow into the bargain, has obtained an extension of his patents for saxhorns and saxotrombas for another five years.

For one of my entreés I have sent to Vienna, and beg to present it in the shape of a new theatre, to be built forthwith, between the Carinthian gate and a new street not yet formed. It will form a quadrangle 114 yards long by 100 wide. The design is to be thrown open to competition, and the prizes will be 3,000, 2,000 and 1,000 thalers, to be awarded to the authors of the three best designs. Foreign architects will be admitted to compete, and the last day for receiving plans is fixed for January 10, 1861. Wiesbaden next supplies a few scraps of gossip. The Italian troop there under Morelli has been playing Il Barbiere to a thronging audience, and there has been a capital concert at the Kursaal, where Mad. Sanchioli sang, as also did M. Bazzini. The orchestra belonging to the theatre officiated, and played, among other things, an overture by M. Schindelmeister, called Loreley, for the first time; it was much applauded. M. Niemann, the tenor, is expected at Wiesbaden, to fulfil an engagement at the theatre for six nights' performance. He is to appear at the French Opera in Tannhauser. Northern Germany has given its song-festival this year at Bielfeld, an appropriate locality for such a celebration, being the birthplace of the brilliant star, Sophia Cruwell (Cruvelli), whose brightness has deserted the firmament of art to set in the ocean of matrimony. (The bath was taken under the auspices of le Chevalier Vigier.) The festival in question extended over three days, the 20th, 21st, and 22nd of July, and was attended by 29 liedertafeln. At Darmstadt the 50th anniversary of the foundation of the Court Theatre was solemnised by the performance of Mozart's Titus. From the 4th of September, 1859, to the 23rd of May, there have been seventy-six operatic performances. The works which were most frequently played are Rienzi, Gustavus, the Huguenots, and the Sicilian Vespers. Those played for the first time were Rienzi, Dinorah, and Linda di Chamouni. Among the other works produced were Norma, the Etoile du Nord, Cinderella, Tannhauser, &c.

At Giessen, in the Grand Duchy of Hesse, there has been a solemn commemoration of Ludwig Spohr. One of his pupils, J. F. Bott, a violinist, and chapel master at Sax Meiningen, directed the concert; and the overtures to Jessonda, that to the Berg-geist, and the Hymn to Music (Die Weihe der Töne), were executed by the orchestra.

As an apology for a dessert let me invite you to the knowledge that at Milan a new opera has been brought out, and duly approved of by the critics of that ilk. Its composer is Maestro Gibelli, and it is entitled I Parenti apparenti. There is to be a concert at La Scala for the benefit of the wounded patriots of Sicily, wherein Bottesini, Cavallini, newly returned from St. Petersburgh, Mad. Moro, and Mad. Lesniewska, will take part.

I am reminded by the unpronounceable name last written, that the two brothers Wieniawski are now in Paris. The long talked of marriage between the violinist and Miss Hampton, a niece of Osborne, is to come off in a fortnight.

I have now brought my, I am afraid, barmicide repast to the benediction, and it not being the custom in this country to sit after dinner, I beg leave humbly to lever la séance.

ROSSINI'S SEMIRAMIDE.

By MERY.

IN the universal parterre of lyric art, there is a very numerous class of persons whom we must take into consideration.

They possess an instinct for the beautiful without a knowledge of it; they understand the language admirably, but are not acquainted with its syntax; they are ignorant of the process of composition, but annotate, as they pass on, a musical solecism; they form a refined phalanx, absolutely considering themselves happy from their ignorance, for their attention is never diverted, in their naïf fits of ecstacy, by involuntary recollections of post-mortem examinations and dissections. These adepts, scattered through all the regions of art where the orchestra accompanies the voice, belong to no school, to no theory; they are acquainted neither with preferences nor systematic exclusion; they apply to music the eclecticisms of M. Cousin; for them the Alps and the frontiers of the Rhine have no existence; they are passionately devoted to all great things in musical art, whether coming from the Bridge of Kehl or the Apennines. In our grand and glorious age, when the illustrious poets of music have imparted to their language the vocabulary of the Infinite, these adepts among the audience have heard everything, understood everything, and retained everything, even during epochs of public deafness; yet, though able to reserve to themselves the benefits of their initiation, and indulge in egotistical enjoyment, they have constituted themselves the missionaries of art, and their enlightened enthusiasm has at length succeeded in bestowing hearing on the deaf, and baptism on pagans.

These amateurs entertain a repugnance for parallels and comparisons; in their opinion one masterpiece is worth another, and they do not take the trouble of analysing two scores, in order to know whether they ought to go into greater ecstacies of delight with the German fairy than with the Italian muse? Such cold dissecting-like calculations suit only the Harpagons of enthusiasm, those avaricious individuals who are stingy in their admiration towards the living, while they are frantic idolators of the dead. The amateurs of whom I am speaking possess the prodigality of the heart, and are not chary of their genuflections, whether it be at Mecca or Medina, at Babylon or Jerusalem. Now, in the majority of instances, these men have not a preference but a predilection for one work; a work which they place not above, not beneath, and not on a level with, such and such another work; a work which, right or wrong, is coupled in their minds with a certain incomparable charm, a mysterious fascination, and an exceptional charm; that work is Rossini's Semiramide. I have seen this masterpiece performed at Marseilles, in the month of July, when the heat of the theatre was forty degrees of Réaumur; and at Paris, in the month of January, with the temperature in the streets fifteen degrees below zero, and not a single adept was absent from his post. In the one place and the other, and under the same conditions of summer and winter, there would have been, for any other masterpiece, numerous instances of prudent defection. Why?—I cannot say. I state a fact; I do not account for it. I have applied for information on the subject to the oldest "Semiramidists," such as Armand-Marrast, Dr. Cabarrus, Desnoyers, Chenavard, Azevedo, General Mellinet, Mad. Malibran, Lablache, Antony Deschamps, and those illustrious and obscure contemporaries whose ecstatic enthusiasm has been hustled by my own, at 400 performances of Semiramide, in Paris and Marseilles, in England and in Italy, and all of them gave me no answer, and furnished no explanation of the fact. One man alone might have been able to tell me something new concerning this Eastern question, but he is a person who speaks neither of his sons nor daughters. That great Sphinx keeps his secret to himself, or tells it to the desert.

One day, the happiest day of his life, he set out from Naples, where he used to drink in intoxicating draughts of poetry and love, in his villa at Pausilippus. He traversed Rome, still disconsolate in the midst of her ruins; he followed the savage road of the Apennines; he skirted the lake of Trasimenus and the cascade of Terni, which seems to be eternally weeping over the defeat of a consul; he went along the Mincio, where Virgil invented melody, and at length reached that mysterious city, born, like Venus, from the waves of the sea, and preserving, at the bottom of her lagoons, secrets of melancholy and of love, which she tells great artists, her lovers.

The weary traveller fell asleep on the shores of lovely Venice, and had a Titan's dream, one of those charming but sinister dreams, in which the syren of Naples sings the melodies of Magna Græcia, in the cyclopean theatre of Taorminus, amidst the lamentations of Prometheus and the bellowings of Etna.

On awaking, he found in his hand the manuscript of a poet, and heard the evangelical words: "Take this and read: Tolle, Zege."

It was an old story, full of poetic beauties and naïf shortcomings; a legend lost in the night of time, but illuminated with all that oriental splendour which floats over the first ages of the world; a sanguinary chronicle, in which the perfumes of Arabia Felix are mingled with the fœtid vapours of the sepulchre, as during the last days of human innocence, when the gardens of the Euphrates were reddened by the blood of Abel. The master thought music was made for things like these, so he retired within himself, in company with Dante, whom he knows by heart.

The following, if we omit the details, is what the poet's book said:—

Preparations are being made for a grand festival at Babylon, about the year 1900 B.C. Queen Semiramis, the widow of Ninus, arrives from India, where she has been making conquests, and is about to give a king to the Euphrates and the East. What king will be selected? No one knows. Azema, a princess of the blood of Belus, can give a crown to whomever she marries. Assur, the minister, who, in league with Semiramis, has assassinated Ninus, thinks he has two chances of mounting the throne, by marrying either Azema or Semiramis. The great queen has had only one son, named Ninias, but he is said to be dead, and there is nothing which can thwart Assur's ambition. But Ninias—confided when still an infant to the care of King Phradates, by Ninus, who suspected Assur—is still living under the name of Arsaces, and is beloved by Semiramis, who has frequently seen him at Babylon, and in her expeditions among the Scythians and Sarmatæ. Suddenly an order of the queen summons Arsaces to Babylon. The young prince, in love with Azema, thinks that his marriage with her will shortly be solemnized. He arrives, full of joy, in the capital of Babylonia, at the moment Semiramis is about to name a king. The name of that king and husband are pronounced at a festival: it is Arsaces. Hereupon, the heavens are covered with clouds, the thunder bellows, the door of the tomb where Ninus lies buried is thrown open, and the spectre of the murdered king appears, spreading terror among the members of the court and the people, and orders Arsaces to go down into the tomb, and strike some victim whom he does not name. When the horrible apparition has vanished, the grand-priest Oroes, who is acquainted with all the secrets of the palace, reveals to Arsaces his rank, his name, and the perpetrators of the crime. Arsaces generously accords a pardon to his mother, and wishes to be avenged on Assur alone. When night has come, he descends into the necropolis of the Assyrian kings, where, sword in hand, he awaits a voice and an order; and when the cry, "Ninias, strike!" re-echoes beneath the vaulted roof, he obeys blindly in the midst of the darkness, and kills Semiramis. This horrible catastrophe is in accordance with history; no one would ever have invented it.

* * * * * * *

This subject, forty centuries old, offered a composer no point to start from, according to our received notions. A world of harmony had to be obtained from nothing: the dream of the lagoons revealed that world to the young musician.

He dined joyously, scattering among those at table his marvellous wit, his Italian gaiety, his pleasant smiles, and all the treasures of his inexhaustible spirits. When all this charming hubbub was over, the sublime hypocrite returned home alone, and, as grave as a hierophant of Isis, laid the first stone of the Babylonian pyramid called Semiramide. Outside, his companions at dinner observed to each other,—"What a charming fellow Rossini is. What wit! what grace! what gaiety!" "He was born to compose master-pieces of the buffo kind," wrote Stendhal, "but for Heaven's sake let him give up serious music—he is only an admirable buffoon."

Rossini has spent his life in making people believe he was what he is not. Every man of genius is fond of one particular amusement. Homer passed himself off as blind, and Cæsar as consumptive; the one travelled everywhere among the rocks of the Archipelago, while the other conquered the cold provinces of Gaul in ten winters, and, despite his delicate constitution, never caught cold. These two facts of consumption and blindness are nevertheless the property of history.

Having once entered the temple of Belus, Rossini picks up all the secrets connected with the initiation of the Ancients; he forgets the whole plan of known music, sacred or profane; he forgets the Greek melopœia, preserved, by Christian tradition, in the rites of the catacombs; he forgets the Biblical melopœia of the lamentations of Jeremiah, and of the canticles of Zion; he creates formulas; he ever appears to recollect them, like some Epimenides, a satrap of Semiramis, awakened, after a lapse of four thousand years, before the pyramid of Nimrod. At intervals, however, he will let off those wonderful specimens of vocalisation of which he possesses the modern secret, those astounding arabesques of pearls which roll forth like melodious commentaries of love, the fierce heavings of rage, or the infinite and ecstatic delights of joy and of passion. In certain passages of the work the composer must give all the exuberance of flowers to this country of the East, full of bright rays, to this people of the Sun, who speak the starry language of the Chaldeans, a language destined to become the hymn of Moses and of the Sulamite; he must bestow this embroidery, these garlands, these festoons of dazzling vocalisation on that formidable and voluptuous city, Babylon, which hangs its gardens and all the flowers of the tropics on the Euphrates, stained with blood by the arrow of Nimrod; he must bestow them on Semiramis, beautiful and terrible, who returns from India with her crown of gold and her ornaments of pearl, the jewels of Ophir and Ceylon.

Music must pour forth all its splendour on this cradle of poetry and the Sun, and keep its naïf simplicity for the villages of the North, where Annette marries Lubin, without point d'orgue, and without sun.

At the first hymn, "Si gran nume," sung by Oroes the priest, before the statue of Belus, we feel that some unknown religion is celebrating mysteries anterior to the priesthood of Melchisedek. The chords are slow and grave, and appear as though prolonged by the echoes of a Babylonian crypt. We already listen to mysterious threats of vengence and of death; we feel that this priest of Belus is acquainted with the mournful secrets connected with the palace of Semiramis, and that he has confided them to his God alone.

This sinister prayer is interrupted by the joyous chorus of a religious festival. It is an original and brilliant introduction, announcing to Babylon a day of azure and of gold, and causing us to forget the evil presages of the melopœia of Oroes. Idrene, king of the Ganges, arrives, and salutes the sun-god with a song, which appears to pour forth Indian pearls. The ambitious Assur appropriates the same kind of vocalisation, to dazzle the people and render them favourable to him. The grand priest, who is aware of Assur's crime, hurls at his head an anathema, and a superb trio of rage breaks forth, as the precursor of the thunder in a clear sky.

The chorus bursts out into the hymn to Semiramis. This is another choral melody, the colours of which belong to no known prism. It may possibly have been sung "By the rivers of Babylon"—"Super flumina Babylonis"—when, after the days of tears, the joy of an entire poetic nation saluted Cyrus, the liberator. Who can know the secrets of genius when writing unknowingly at the dictation of God? At the final explosion of the triumphal chorus the queen appears. She replies by intermittent notes, full of sadness, to the enthusiasm which greets her; the secret tears of the sinful woman flow in unison with the outbursts of the public joy. Semiramis throws a mourning crape on the festival of "So many nations and kings—Di tanti regi e popoli." It is a funeral song, mingled with the Hallelujah of the Chaldeans. The people await the regal name that is about to issue from the mouth of Semiramis. Suddenly, the joyous concord is broken up; the flame on the altar is extinguished; the day turns to night, and a finale of horror and despair puts an end to the festival. The name of the king has not been pronounced.

The crowd disperses in disorder, but when the last bar of the finale dies away, the horizon clears up; an orchestral prelude, as pleasing to the ear as the harmony of the dawn, announces the entrance of Arsaces. The divine master has taken the greatest pains with this admirable character, the Benjamin of his family. The "Eccomi alfin in Babilonia!" is a cry of the heart; it places the cavatina, at the very outset, on the heights of lyrical enthusiasm; its first bars breathe that religious dread which is inspired in the young hero by the silence of the holy portico and the presence of the Divinity. Then, afterwards, what impulsive bursts of youth! what joy at once more beholding his native country! what an expansiveness of love! what pure, naïf, and intoxicating delight! how adorable are the confidential communications to all that surrounds Arsaces, to Babylon, to its skies, to the great queen's palace, and to the gardens of the East, where he awaits Azema! Thirty-seven years have now passed over this cavatina, and the flowers embroidered on it, but it has lost none of its original freshness; time has not withered a single leaf, or stolen one pearl from its oriental tissue, the notes have turned into mosaic, and all of us, the young people of days gone by, who heard Pisaroni at the grand Italian fêtes, start again, as though still only twenty, when that cry of ecstatic joy, "Eccomi alfin in Babilonia!" reaches our hearts. The work is full of contrast. Gracefulness, however, must, as is always the case, float through the storm; luminous vistas always shine out upon the dark skies of the painter, Rossini; they are rays of hope. The duet commences by the ravishing "Bella imago," continues with melodious intermissions, full of love, and concludes by that thunder-clap, "Va superbo." This duet is a complete drama in itself.

The indolent languor of Sybaris, and the perfume of Oriental voluptuousness, are again to be found in the effeminate chorus which opens the second act, and precedes the delicious cavatina of Semiramis, "Bel raggio," a cascade of golden waters, softer to the ear than the murmurs of the fountains under the magnolias of the hanging gardens. No one would ever be tired of listening to Semiramis, as she pours forth this treasure of pearls from her coral lips, or of hearing the chorus taking part in her ecstacy, and the orchestra accompanying the flood of love with the sweetest voices of its instruments. We shall soon meet with the same charming tenderness in the duet "Serbami" between the Queen and Arsaces; such music was probably sung in the gardens belonging to the gynecæa of adulterous queens, on the eve of conflagrations and extermination.

The festival, previously interrupted, recommences; but, on this occasion, it is celebrated far from the temple of Belus. The people chaunt a hymn to Babylon, while the magi sing in a severer style. The scene in preparation is unequalled on the stage. Never did Greek tragedy, with its infantine melopœia and its primitive chorus, rise to such a degree of terror, even in Orestes, that sublime drama of horrors. Assur, Idrene, Arsaces, the court, the people, the princes, the satraps, and the magi swear allegiance and fidelity to Semiramis, and promise submission to the king about to be named before the altar of Belus. Never was a more melodious oath taken at the feet of a queen, beautiful, imposing, and as radiant as a daughter of the Sun. Orchestra and voices are confounded in languishing ecstacy, and, when the people joins in and repeats, in unison, the formula of the quartet, the scene assumes a character of religious solemnity cold words cannot express. Suddenly, a superb phrase, issuing from the throne, after a dazzling prelude of traits of vocalisation, announces that Arsaces will be king of Babylon and husband of Semiramis. At this name those present are greatly agitated. Assur protests against the choice in a magnificent vocal phrase; Oroes indignantly stops Semiramis before the altar; a peal of thunder is heard on the summit of the tomb of Ninus; a noise of solfatare echoes threateningly in the orchestra, and a lugubrious cry announces a terrible apparition.

Profound silence succeeds the tumult; Semiramis, in a trembling voice, commences the famous "Qual mesto gemitu," the first gush of a tempest of terror. The orchestra speaks only in lugubrious and strident notes; the knell of the tam-tam marks the steps of an avenging spectre, still invisible; every voice palpitates with emotion; low wailing rises at intervals from the crowd; we hear dreamlike lamentations, the death-rattle of dying persons, expressions of spasmodic delirium, words with the last syllable unfinished, and sobs arrested by the shivering of terror on the lips of those who utter them. The tomb of Ninus is opened, and the spectre of the king appears on the threshold; there then proceeds from the crowd a cry of lamentation; the ululatus of the women is rolled out in scales of desolation; the orchestra obtains from its lower instruments unheard-of chords; men's quivering voices die away in their breasts, and the proud Semiramis, crushed by the apparition, makes one supreme effort, and sadly pours forth some mournful words at the feet of the crowned spectre. But it is not to the guilty wife that Ninus will reply; he addresses the young Arsaces, and his melopœia, terrible from its lugubrious simplicity, appears to issue from the lips of some brazen image, or from the mouth of a Typhon incrusted on the marble of the tomb. Semiramis again advances, and the same voice stops her like a peal of thunder. The horrible vision then disappears, and the orchestra seems to accompany it under the vaults of the palace of death. A paroxysm of mad fright immediately bursts forth in every heart; the music reaches the point of delirium; and the strident voices are confounded in a strange unison, which conveys an idea of the immense shouts uttered by the accursed cities when a prey to the flames, or pillaged by Nabuchadnezzar.

Rossini worked for a long period on the colossal page, which begins with the breath of the phantom that appeared before Job and ends with the furious clamour of the guests of Belshazzar, thus traversing the whole series of funereal terrors. There were two rocks to be avoided; the composer could not ask material science for chords, or the logarithms of counterpoint for the metaphysical sentiment of fear, nor could he have recourse to the puerile plan of vulgar bugbears, to those discordant scales which excite childish dread; he had to translate, with all the good faith of a child of genius, the cries of his dreams and the icy terrors of his nights; and it was necessary that he should possess one of those nervous organisations which indulge in the harsh pleasure of nocturnal horrors, between the spectre of Apuleius and the phantom of Brutus, and are courageous only in full day, like Homer's Ajax, that coward at midnight. I have dared to suppose that Rossini wrote so many convulsive notes round a phantom, with faith in the supernatural, when listening to the joyous author of L'Italiana and Il Barbiere, after midnight, as he recited to me, in an agitated voice, verses from the Inferno of Dante, that lugubrious poetry always accompanied by the trumpet of Tartarus.

The third act of Semiramide commences with a duet, which would have been considered an impossibility previous to its birth; the master drew it from nothingness by a prodigy. Assur and the Queen, the two accomplices in regicide, are in each other's presence; the two giants of crime and passion come into collision, and the shock well deserves to have Babel as a witness. Sublime specimens of irony are first interchanged; then Semiramis bursts out, and launches in Assur's face the sentence of banishment, "Se la vita ancor t' è cara." The proud satrap draws himself up to his full height; he towers over the haughty queen, and crushes her beneath a strident scale; then, lowering his tone, he murmurs in her ear the fearful secrets of her crime; he recalls to her mind the night of the assassination, "Quella ricordati notte di morte;" he shows her the spectre of Ninus, always inveterate in pursuit of her, and this melody of hell, intolerable to her ear, awakens in Semiramis an unknown sentiment, the corroding flame of remorse. She humbles herself, she shrinks, she would fain reduce herself to nothingness, in order to become invisible to the eye of God and man, and to escape the thunder of heaven; she repeats, sotto voce, the same infernal melody, as though she were wrenching round in her heart the poniard plunged into it by the hand of Assur. Suddenly, trumpet-flourishes of triumph re-echo without; it is Arsaces about to receive the crown from the hands of Oroes. Semiramis awakes as if from a dream; she utters a cry of sublime joy; the lioness of the Euphrates revolts against her oppressor; the haughty Amazon raises against Assur that powerful hand which has subdued the world from the Ganges to the Nile, from the icy regions of Sarmatia to the sands of Lybia; she bursts into an admirable song of victory and vengeance; the humble woman is once more Semiramis.

The magi open the gate of the sanctuary and sing a hymn of marvellous style, a hymn obtained, doubtless, from some excavations in the temple of Persepolis, the most beautiful melopœia with which the Sun ever inspired his worshippers. Oroes then reveals to the young Arsaces the secret of his birth, gives him the sword of his father, Ninus, and the royal testament. All this is accentuated by the musicians with a scrupulousness of intention which leaves nothing to chance. The elegy, "In si barbara sciagura," sung by Arsaces, is noted down with tears, and accompanied by the sobbings of despair. The composer himself wept over this moving page, though he will never confess it. Another prodigy of melodious sensibility was requisite to reconcile Arsaces with his mother, after the fearful revelation denouncing the mother's crime to her son. The transition is managed with wonderful art; the orchestra is the first to plead in favour of Semiramis, and warbles soft notes, melted down in the crucible of heavenly pity, on the day of God's clemency, on the day of man's first repentance; these ineffable accents of commiseration, breathed forth by the instruments and the voice, reach the heart after first ravishing the ear, cause us to forget the guilty queen, and melt us to pity for the unhappy woman; we dismiss from our minds the past while listening to these two divine voices, to these miraculous accords, in which the son's joy is united with the mother's tenderness, and, immediately the pardon is granted, we ask ourselves with stupefaction, in what treasures of the Infinite the master found this angelic melody, this hymn of repentance and reconciliation. When such a duet is in the limbo of nothingness, God alone can guide the hand which discovers it!

Never, in this prodigious work, never does his inspiration fail the musician for a single moment; never do we meet with a trace of failing strength, a bar of make-weight, or a vulgar connecting passage; the music assumes all the varieties of Nature and takes all the voices of the external world, for Nature does not obey the precepts of a vulgar system of rhetoric; she is not contented with simplicity, although simplicity is a very good thing in its proper place; Nature takes every tone, decks herself out in every colour, and is revealed in every form. Nature is simple in the tranquil charm of her prairies, the calm of her dawns, the limpidity of her horizons, and the somnolency of her slumbering lakes; but, powerful mistress of art as she is, she does not always choose to preserve a simplicity which would become monotonous; she causes her Alps and Cordilleras to rise against it; she makes her tempests howl, her thunders peal, her cataracts roll, her oceans heave, and her superb forests blossom; her music and her language express everything, from the breath of wind which bends the flower, to the hurricane which uproots the oak; from the charming prattling of the rivulet to the terrible melopœia of Niagara; from the spark which glistens on the top of the wave to the burning eruption of the volcano. Such is the style of Nature; Rossini is a pupil of her conservatory, and has beneath his fingers the key-board of a universal harpsichord. We have just heard an exquisitely tender and touchingly simple duet; we have now its antithesis or antipodes. We are in the immense crypt where the tombs of the Assyrian kings are raised. A chorus of sinister voices shakes the vaulted roof of the necropolis; Assur, the last Titan of Babel, sings his death-hymn, and the orchestra exhausts its lugubrious notes. The vision from the tomb again rears its form before the satrap, who struggles against the grasp of an invisible arm, with the convulsive energy of a giant struck down by lightning. The accents of pity, terror, and vengeance are confounded in a rhythm of supreme desolation; it is the song of the damned accompanied by the hoarse cries of the cité dolente, and we fancy we hear, through the tumult of voices, that breath which caused Job to tremble, while concealing from view the lips which exhaled it. The breath continues, and will be the key-note of the trio, "Usato ardir," a masterpiece of the melody of desolation and the highest pitch of terror. We have, now, no more furious clamour, no more cries of despair, no more dramatic convulsion; we have the hymn of affrighted silence, the gurgling rattle to be ended only by death, the subtle grating of the stone which forms the funeral pyramid of Semiramis.

Happy is the author of the Italian libretto of Semiramide! He did not put his name on his work produced at Venice! He allowed the name of the divine master to shine alone on the first page of the immortal score! Another Italian, from Naples, was inspired with a happy thought when he said to me, one day, on board the steamer Le Sully:—"If the great St. Peter, the gatekeeper of Heaven, informs me that Semiramide is not performed in Paradise, I shall not enter the place!" Hyperbola is allowable to Italian enthusiasts: let us, who are always able to introduce good sense in our admiration, excuse the Neapolitan artist.

If there is a work which can afford to despise scenery, a magnificent mise-en-scène, and all the luxury of choreography, it is, most assuredly, Semiramide: the master of masters has embellished it with his music. But the Grand Opéra is bound to treat the Queen of Babylon, Rossini's glorious daughter, with imperial hospitality. The idea of bestowing on Semiramide letters of naturalisation as a French subject, nearly coincides with the recent discovery of the riches buried in the Assyrian soil. Immense new rooms have just been opened in our Louvre for the purpose of exhibiting the archæological treasures from the domains of Semiramis. The opportunity was too good a one to be neglected. Then again there were the magnificent works of Menro, Flandin, Layard, and Coste to be consulted for the decorative reconstruction of the city of Ninus. The task was zealously taken in hand, under the intelligent direction of M. Alphonse Royer, who has consecrated whole months to the study of ancient Babylon, and caused the most scrupulous care to be paid not only to the monuments, statues, and symbolical animals, but also to the costumes, armour, weapons, and the slightest accessories. Rossini's picture needed no frame; but, at the Opéra, even the eyes must be satisfied.

BERLIN.—(From a Correspondent.)—Mr. John K. Paine, of Portland, U. S., who has already received honourable mention in your columns, gave a capital organ performance last Thursday in the parochial church, to a select auditory, including the American Ambassador, (Gov. Wright), Hermann Grimm, Faubert, and several of the most renowned maestri of Berlin. The programme was as follows:—

1.	Fantasie und Fuge in E moll	J. K. Paine
2.	Choral—Vorspiel "Allein Gott in der Nöh 'sei Ehr."	Seb. Bach
3.	Präludium und Fuge in A moll	"
4.	Trio—Sonate in Es dur	"
5.	Fantasie in G dur	"
6.	Concert—Variationen über em Thema von Haydn	J. K. Paine
7.	Trio—Sonate in G dur, 1ster Satz	Seb. Bach
8.	Concertsatz in C moll	L. Thiele

Nos. 4, 6, and 7 appeared to give the greatest satisfaction. From the second of these numbers a good idea may be formed of M. Paine's inventive talent. The whole of the variations are extremely original, and, what is really of more consequence, are natural, and—music. The veteran Haupt (his teacher), generally speaking a stranger to "wreathed smiles," could not restrain the satisfaction, mingled we feel certain with a touch of pride, which he inwardly felt, manifesting itself upon the mirror of his soul. Faubert, too, seemed highly delighted. He shook M. Paine warmly by the hand, and gave him a few kindly words of encouragement. We were the more pleased to see this as M. Paine is a young man just entering upon the battle of life, and because the musical critics of the place, for some reasons best known to themselves and heaven, are pleased to ignore his performances. Knowing his classic taste, his sterling abilities, and his indomitable perseverance, we have not the slightest hesitation in predicting a brilliant future for Mr. Paine.

Amongst literary on dits one of the most interesting is that Miss Macready, the daughter of the great tragedian, is about to publish a volume of poems, of which report speaks flatteringly.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—Mlle. TITIENS begs respectfully to announce to the Nobility, Gentry, Subscribers, and the Public, that her BENEFIT will take place this evening (Saturday, July 28), being the last night of the season, when the performances will commence with the scene of Meyerbeer's Opera of LE PARDON DE PLOERMEL. Dinorah, Mlle. MARIE CABEL (her last appearance). After which, the last scene of LUCIA DI LAMMERMOOR:—Edgardo, Signor GIUGLINI (his last appearance in England this season). To conclude with Weber's grand Opera of OBERON. Applications for Private Boxes, Stalls, Dress Circle, and Pit Tickets, to be addressed to Mlle. Titiens, Box Office of the Theatre, or to the Box Bookkeeper, Mr. Nugent. Commence at half-past 7.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.—Last Night but Three.—Extra Night.—On Monday next, July 30, will be performed Mozart's Opera, DON GIOVANNI, being, in all probability, the last time it will ever be represented with the following extraordinary combination of artistes:—Donna Anna, Mad. GRISI; Donna Elvira, Mlle. R. CSILLAG; Zerlina, Mad. PENCO; Don Ottavio, Signor GARDONI; Leporello, Signor RONCONI; Il Commendatore, Signor TAGLIAFICO; Masetto, Signor POLONINI; and Don Giovanni, Signor MARIO. The Minuet by Mlle. ZINA and M. DESPLACES.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN. The Last Week of the Season.—On Monday, July 30, DON GIOVANNI. Tuesday, July 31, LE PROPHETE. Wednesday, August 1, Grand MORNING CONCERT, in the Floral Hall. Thursday, August 2, LE PROPHETE. Saturday, August 4, LE PROPHETE. The Theatre will positively close on Saturday Night, August 4.

LONDON: SATURDAY, JULY 28, 1860.

MOSCHELES, as the foreign papers inform us, is in Paris. The master and friend of Mendelssohn was also a contemporary of Schubert (ante, page 460); and as upon the present mania for "revivals" (a mania to be nurtured not strangled) the revival of one or two of the pianoforte concertos of Moscheles has exercised a certain measure of healthy influence, our readers may not be unprepared for a brief survey of his general merits as a composer—and more especially as a composer for the most universal of instruments.

Ignace Moscheles was unquestionably the originator of the brilliant school of writing which has produced such striking modifications of the style and taste of the last thirty years. Moscheles, indeed, may be denominated the real inventor to whom the pianoforte is indebted for certain new effects, which, could Mozart or Dussek now hear, they would surely fail to recognise as legitimately belonging to the instrument. A pianist of extraordinary capabilities in early youth, Moscheles, already acquainted with the composition of every contemporary and predecessor, was gifted enough to imagine and bold enough to realise something altogether different from all that he knew. The well-known piece called The Fall of Paris, may be symbolised as the acorn which afterwards grew, flourished, and expanded into the wide-spreading oak of modern fantasia. Its appearance was hailed with much the same astonishment that Clementi's celebrated octave-sonata had created so many years before, on a very different and much more serious race of men. Moscheles developed the school thus, no doubt, unwittingly originated; but his taste having a higher tendency he did not, like others, wholly abandon himself to its fascination. His studies, concertos, and many works of minor importance, conceived in a spirit almost precisely opposite to that which had actuated him in the composition of The Fall of Paris, are among the glories of the instrument, and have materially assisted those of Beethoven and his great predecessor in preserving a taste that has resisted all the charms of that "romantic" and inferior school which has so widely obtained since, and to which nine out of ten pianists of the present day are uncompromising adherents. It is the more to the honour of Moscheles that this school, though his own creation, the accidental birth of a leisure hour, the bagatelle of a moment's wantonness, has never so wholly influenced him as to make him overlook the fact, that the art of which he is one of the most brilliant ornaments, was destined for a nobler end than that of mere amusement, was capable of loftier appeals than those exclusively addressed to common and vulgar understandings.

Moscheles influenced his contemporaries by the novelty of his invention, it is true; but what injury he may have inflicted—if injury he has inflicted—was far more than counterbalanced by those graver studies to which we owe his most beautiful and thoughtful works. These cannot be over-rated, and will live for ever, while the others, even now, have not been surpassed for brilliancy of effect, and for that peculiar kind of display, which demands at the utmost a combination of manual dexterity with a graceful variety of style. Though all his best works show how thoroughly well Moscheles had mastered the sonata form, he has produced but few specimens of the sonata for piano solus, having been doubtless as much deterred by the singular fertility of Dussek from exercising his genius in that direction, as his young friend and almost pupil, Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy, was later deterred by the universal genius of Beethoven. As familiar as we are with most of the works of Moscheles, we only know two sonatas for the pianoforte alone which have proceeded from his pen—that in E major, dedicated to his friend and master, Beethoven; and that in F sharp minor, called the Sonata Melancolique. Both of these are thoroughly classical works, and though the former (an early effort) exhibits a redundancy, proceeding from a flow of ideas which mature experience had not yet taught to check (how difficult is it for a young writer to know what to retain and what to reject), there is so strong a feeling for regularity of form—one of the principal charms of Haydn's glorious invention—that little doubt is left, after its perusal, of the purely classical taste of its author.

THE question of conductors (chefs d'orchestre) and non-conductors, is daily becoming more simple and easy to grasp. True, there are two sides to it; but neither side presents any rough edges to mystify logicians, much less any thorns to perplex and puzzle conjurors. We do not wish to pass for conjurors; nor is it our intention to approach more than one side of the subject. This side, however, if it were possible for a "side" to lie in a nutshell, would lie in a nutshell.

A musical director without unlimited sway in his immediate sphere of action, might just as well break his conductor's stick, or by "an awk stroke" smite off his left ear. If he is to be thwarted at every step; if powers antagonistic to his, and caprices over which he can exercise no control, are to be tolerated; if he is compelled to take his performers, vocal and instrumental, en bloc, without reference to their skill or incapacity, and make the best of the matter, like a barrister with an indifferent brief; if, in short, there are wills opposed to his will, and fancies with which he owns no sympathy, and these are to counteract his policy, bother and irritate him, à maintes reprises, then he is nor better nor worse than the shadow of a director, in no more dignified a position than that of a puppet impelled by strings. Such, in a great measure, was the position maintained not long since by Herr Tudeliecesbejn, supposed chief of the Oivasolactocasin, but no more in truth endowed with a chief's indispensable authority than a figure-head can be said to be vested with the direction of a ship, or a standard with the conduct of its bearer to the fray. The Oivasolactocasin was its own director, and hoisted Herr Tudeliecesbejn, flapping about — as Mr. Carlyle would say (if he could) — like a wind-ensign, restless, fidgetty, and impotent. The result was disastrous (how could it be otherwise ?); a society which began well and promised better, took a sudden turn, and was fast hurrying to dissolution, when fortune intervened, and, if it did not save, at least suspended, the catastrophe. No one believed that the Oivasolactocasin, with its ill-regulated management and handcuffed conductor, would ever live to see the year of grace 1860; but lo ! and behold ! it has reared its head as freshly and daintily as Agag before Samuel; and public opinion, though it had been grievously discountenanced, and was still only half conciliated, instead of hewing it in pieces, as Samuel hewed Agag, answered its appeal with cheers and clapping of palms.

Nevertheless, before the Oivasolactocasin can expect to be firmly established, it must bow to circumstances and make its chief a despot. Let us turn to another and a far more important institution. At Her Majesty's Theatre (Anno Domini 1860—Mr. E. T. Smith, regnans), Herr Tudeliecesbejn of the Oivasolactocasin, &c.

SURREY GARDENS.—A Concert is to be given in these attractive gardens on Monday, August 6th, when the principal feature will be a selection of popular Irish melodies. In order to give full effect to this novel idea, there will be a chorus of 200 voices, in addition to the following vocalists:—Miss Parepa, Miss Poole, Mr. Wilbye Cooper, Mr. Santley, and Mr. Sims Reeves—it being the last appearance of this gentleman at these gardens.

The Operas.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—Oberon retained possession of the stage during the past week, including Monday, an extra night, until last evening, when Lucia di Lammermoor, and the last act of La Favorita were given for the benefit of Signor Giuglini, who sustained the tenor parts in both operas, with Mlle. Titiens as the heroine in the former, and Mad. Borghi-Mamo in the latter. To-night Mlle. Titiens takes her benefit, wisely adhering to Oberon as her share of the performance, with Signor Giuglini in the last scene of Lucia di Lammermoor. The season — the extra season — announced to terminate this evening, will be prolonged another week in consequence of the immense success of Oberon.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—The first performance of Rigoletto—and, if the announcement holds good, the last till next year—took place on Saturday night. The audience, though fashionable, was not so numerous as might have been expected at the only representation of Signor Verdi's best opera; but those who attended on the occasion had the advantage of enjoying one of the most legitimate treats the operatic season has provided. Never, perhaps, was the music of Rigoletto more generally well executed or heard with more pleasure.

The cast of the chief personages, with one exception, was the same as when people believed, and not without reason, tha amelioration in any important particular was impossible. The Duke of Mantua and his privileged buffoon, the hired bravo and his sister—partner in his guilty traffic—were, as before, represented by Signors Mario and Ronconi, Signor Tagliafico and Mad. Nantier-Didiée. The exception was a weighty one; but in this instance offered no cause whatever for dissatisfaction. It was said of the lady who played Gilda last year that she did not make us forget Mad. Bosio; but of Mad. Miolan Carvalho, who assumed the part on Saturday night, it may be stated, without flattery, that, in more respects than one, she actually revived the memory of that much-regretted artist. Perhaps—not even excepting Dinorah, her first and hitherto most successful portrayal in this country—Mad. Carvalho is more entirely at home with Rigoletto's unhappy daughter than with any other character in which the London public has been afforded an opportunity of judging her. Acting more thoughtful, graceful, and unaffectedly natural could hardly be cited, nor singing more finished and expressive. True, the quality of her voice being eminently French, it lacks the rich tone and volume which we are not merely accustomed to find in Italian sopranos almost as a matter of course, but also very frequently in the Germans and English; and, again, by the excessive strain upon the higher notes (the result, no doubt, of parts written by indifferent or selfish composers for her presumed exceptional means) the middle and lower registers have been materially enfeebled; but these drawbacks admitted, and there is no farther room for criticism. If, indeed, Mad. Carvalho had studied the music of Gilda under the direct superintendence of Signor Verdi himself, she could not have read it more correctly. Not a point of expression is overlooked, not a brilliant trait fails of producing the contemplated effect. In the two duets with Rigoletto; in the love scene with the Duke (who, disguised as Gualtier Maldé, a student, has won the affections of the innocent and confiding Gilda), which ends with the rapturous "ensemble"— in the solo air, "Caro nome che il mio cor," which contains some of Signor Verdi's most genuine melody, and is so thoroughly in tune wth the sentiment supposed to animate the bosom of Gilda; and last, not least, in the universally and justly praised quartet of Act IV. ("Un dì, se ben rammentomi"), where, through a chink in the door of Sparafucile's house, Gilda becomes a witness to the faithlessness of her lover, Madame Carvalho was uniformly admirable. Exception might be taken to one or two trifling changes in the air ("Caro nome")—which, besides being so perfect in itself as to stand in no need of improvement, is brilliant enough to all intents and purposes; but the whole was executed with such faultless accuracy, and expression so true and unfailing, that the audience were delighted beyond measure, and the triumph of the singer was complete.

"Addio !—speranza ed anima
"Sol tu sarai per me;"

Although the style of the music is so essentially different, Signor Mario's Duke of Mantua is in its way no less irreproachable than his Almaviva. As in the Barbiere, so in Rigoletto he has to make love; and in this especial branch of stage business he is wholly unrivalled. Nothing can surpass the natural grace and passionate intensity he exhibits in the duet with Gilda, where the passage already mentioned ("Addio! addio!") occurs; and never did Signor Mario more completely identify himself with the situation, or throw more fervid expression into every phrase. The charming air, "Questa o quella" (Act I.), where the Duke vaunts in his own person that fickleness with which, in the more popular "La donna e mobile," he afterwards less gallantly charges the fairer sex, was, like its successor, admirably sung — the encore, as usual, however, being reserved for the last, given with that easy nonchalance which the situation strictly demands. If these airs were to change places for once, it is by no means certain that "Questa o quella"—the most elegant and original, if not absolutely the prettiest, of the two—would not carry off the palm. Side by side with Gilda and the Duke of Mantua stood in dark and gloomy contrast the Rigoletto of Signor Ronconi, now, as ever, one of the most consummate achievements of the lyric stage. A character more studiously developed, more carefully considered in all its various aspects, or more thoroughly successful as a dramatic portraiture from one end to the other, could not be named. Those who have seen the Triboulet of M. Frederic Lemaitre (in Le roi s'amuse) will hardly deny that the Rigoletto of the Italian singer is at least a worthy rival. The indifference with which the favourite jester, hitherto untouched by misfortune in his own person, mocks at the misfortunes of others, until the unanticipated reproach of Count Monterone awakens him, as it were, to a sudden consciousness that he himself is not invulnerable, is wonderfully assumed by Signor Ronconi — who, from that moment, amid all his forced buffooneries, seems never to have the fatal malediction entirely out of his mind, but stands transfixed and bewildered while the courtiers rebuke the unhappy victim of his master's anger. In the next act the curse evidently hangs over him like a fate; and after his interview with the assassin, Sparafucile, the recitative in which Rigoletto contemns both his own vocation and the hollowness of the world shows the formerly heartless jester quite in a new light. This is as masterly a piece of declamation as the subsequent scene with Gilda, and especially the delivery of that beautiful passage —

"Veglia, o donna, questo fiore, Che a te puro confidai,"—

when Rigoletto confides his daughter to the care of Giovanna, is instinct with feeling and pathos. The despair of the wretched jester on finding that he has been duped into becoming the blind instrument of Gilda's flight, and his allusion to the "Maledizione" as the natural cause of this misadventure, are points that need only be glanced at. The whole of the next scene — where Rigoletto vainly endeavours to perform his accustomed task at the palace of the Duke of Mantua, and to laugh at the jeers of the surrounding courtesans, while his heart is bursting with anxiety about the fate of his lost child, in whose abduction he suspects the Duke to have had some hand — reveals that extraordinary command of histrionic effect to which Signor Ronconi owes the distinguished position he occupies among his fellows on the Italian lyric boards. His ecstacy at meeting with Gilda, the intense eagerness with which he listens to her narration, and the cry of anguish with which he responds to the words of Count Monterone, when the latter is conveyed to death — "No vecchio, t'inganni — un vindice avrai"—are, one and all, admirably impressive, and complete a delineation which for intense earnestness has rarely been surpassed. Upon the last scene of all — with the horrible incident of the sack, made still more repulsive by the joyous strains of the Duke, who, reconducted by Maddalena, goes off singing snatches of "La donna e mobile"—it is unnecessary to dwell. As usual, the Sparafucile of Signor Tagliafico and the Maddalena of Mad. Nantier Didiée were perfect—the former a bravo, whose cool audacity is incomparable; the latter an agent in all respects worthy so unscrupulous a master—both being in a dramatic sense picturesque, and in a musical sense beyond reproach.

The orchestral accompaniments (the most varied and ingenious to be found in any opera by Signor Verdi) were capitally played, and the execution of the choruses—always in keeping, and in more than one instance picturesque—left nothing to desire. The last scene, of which the murder and the storm are characteristic incidents, was admirably managed, and the curtain fell amid unanimous tokens of approval, the principal singers (not for the first time) being loudly summoned forward.

The "extra" performance of Le Prophète, on Monday, was remarkable for the immense improvement observable in the two principal vocalists. No traces of the nervousness we remarked on the first night were apparent, and both artistes gave full scope to their powers. Mlle. Csillag was in unusually good voice, and her vocal execution approached more nearly the perfection of her histrionic delineation than on the first representation of the opera. The air, "O figlio mio" calls into play the highest and the lowest notes in her voice, which are also the most powerful, and this wonderful composition, in which Fides blesses her son for having saved his mother's life, was sung by Mlle. Csillag with extraordinary pathos. Her action in this scene — tottering forward towards the doorway while Berta is being led off by Oberthal's soldiers, as if anxious to save her from her impending fate — was well imagined, and tended to lessen in some degree the unavoidable repulsiveness of the situation. It would be idle to analyse all the weak points in this over-praised and very inartistic libretto, but it is inconceivable that so clever a dramatist as M. Scribe should have allowed his hero and heroine to forfeit the sympathy of the audience so clumsily as in this scene. We cannot feel much after-interest in the fate of a man who knowingly and deliberately gives up his betrothed wife to infamy, and nothing less than the heroic self-denial afterwards displayed by Fides could make us forget that she has implored her life at the price of her daughter's dishonour, and then blessed her son for the infamous bargain. Mlle. Csillag's acting, we repeat, was very powerful, but, to be perhaps hypercritical, we could well dispense with the action of Fides kissing her hands to her son, which is but a weak substitute for the unutterable pathos which Mad. Viardot's eyes, not her hands, used to express as she slowly left the stage at the termination of this scene. Throughout the cathedral scene Mlle. Csillag was grand in the extreme.

The deep-toned imprecations which Fides heaps on the impostor's head, and which mingle with the organ-notes that peal out the announcement of his consecration, were given with fearful intensity; her bewilderment, when she is denied and pronounced mad by her own son; her first indignant refusal to kneel at his command, and the struggle which then takes place between affection and terror, were very finely portrayed; while the bitter despairing tones in which she uttered the phrase — went to the hearts of all her hearers.

Even Signor Tamberlik's great talent could make nothing of the ill-contrived situation we have above alluded to; but the "dream" which he recounts to the three Anabaptists, especially its close, was given with great effect. The scene in which Signor Tamberlik most excels is that in which John of Leyden quells his turbulent troops; and in this he has no rival. The fine prayer, with its effective staccato accompaniment of stringed instruments, was most impressively sung; and his stupendous ut de poitrine in the succeeding splendid appeal to the God of hosts produced an immense sensation. Indeed, from this point up to the final scene, in which he sings the famous brindisi, and the Sybarite prophet, surrounded by his seraglio, dies a Sardanapalian death, Signor Tamberlik was unexceptionable, investing with manly dignity the weak creature of the libretto, who, according to M. Scribe, after giving up his wife-elect to a life of shame, dubs himself prophet to regain her, and in the hour of triumph forgets his bride and denies his mother. Nothing but the exceeding genius of M. Meyerbeer could stamp with immortality such materials as these.

We cannot record much improvement in Mlle. Corbari, who, although she evidently spares no trouble, and although she did not sing so much out of tune on Monday as on the first occasion, is an unsatisfactory Berta. Unfortunately, too, her part consisting chiefly of concerted pieces, she neutralizes the efforts of others, and especially of Mlle. Csillag. The original and fascinating duet in the opening scene, "Della Mosa," produced no impression; and although Mlle. Csillag was very grand in the second duet for Fides and Berta, "Vana illusione," in which they lament the loss of Giovanni, the effect was ruined by Mlle. Corbari's defective intonation. Surely the difficulties of Berta are quite worthy to be surmounted by such artists as Mad. Penco or Mad. Carvalho; and although the part affords no great opportunity for display, yet it is full of charming phrases which only require to be brought out to be fully appreciated.

Of the orchestra, chorus, scenery, and general mise en scène, it is utterly impossible to speak in terms of too high praise. Even the least striking scenes, such as the frozen lake and the picturesque market-place of Münster, are quite equal as works of art to the grand cathedral interior, and this, as we have already stated, forms the most successfully arranged coup d'œil that we have ever beheld. Every detail is carried out with elaborate care, and the ingenious manner in which the idea of indefinite height is given by a painted canopy suspended just above the triforium, is especially noteworthy. This scene, indeed, offers the most complete picture of the pomp and pageantry of the Roman Catholic Church under its most impressive aspects that an untravelled Englishman can witness, and almost makes one overlook the inherent absurdity of the coronation of the leader of an intensely anti-Catholic movement — the ultra-Protestantism of which was even too strong for Luther to tolerate — taking place in a cathedral, and solemnized with all the rites of a forbidden faith.

A great improvement has been effected since 1855 by the introduction of chorister boys, their fresh young voices imparting a peculiar effect of reality to the scene.

ADDRESS

WRITTEN AND DELIVERED BY MR. AUGUSTUS SALA, ON BEHALF OF THE WIDOW AND CHILDREN OF THE LATE ROBERT BROUGH.*

In triumph comes the Hero of the Day—
Strong in the council, stronger in the fray;
See in his car the conq'ror—not the slave;
See o'er his head the silken banners wave;
Hear the loud trumpet's clanging blast proclaim
The grandeur of his exploits and his name.
He comes! He comes! his brow with laurel crown'd;
Behind his chariot captive kings are bound.
The town his advent surges forth to greet,
Maidens strew flowers 'neath his horses' feet:
The rev'rend senator and holy priest
Are proud to sit beneath him at the feast;
The peasant leaves his plough, the dame her bower,
To hail with shouts the Cæsar of the hour.

Yes; Fame and Fortune now are in his hands.
Who help'd to win them? Yonder strong limb'd bands,
The well bronz'd legions tramping slowly by,
Who march'd with him to conquer or to die—
Some have return'd, unconquered, now, to share
In ev'ry gift our gratitude can spare.

At such proud moments darts there through one head
One transient thought of yon poor conscript, dead?
Of yonder pale fac'd, well nigh beardless boy,
Whom nature seem'd to rear but to destroy?
He fought and bled. His valour help'd to swell
The glorious triumphs Cæsar bears so well.
Now his cold corse in some dark trench is laid,
Or sleeps beneath some hedg'row's pitying shade.

Too weak to cope in conflicts rude and rough,
So thousands die, and so died ROBERT BROUGH.

He was our conscript: fought the fight for years—
Fought it in sickness, poverty, and tears;
Till heaven was pleas'd his spirit to release,
And hush those troubled waters into peace—
To still that heart and sheath that dinted sword,
To "break the bowl" and "loose the silver cord."
He was our conscript: fearless in the strife,
And patient in that long disease—his life.

He drew the glaive for justice, honour, truth;
He fell a vet'ran, though in years a youth.
He mov'd your mirth—nay, sometimes, too, your tears;
He wore your harness, bore your shield for years.
His wit and fancy brought him nought but bread.
Your soldier yet deserves a mite, though dead.
The conscript's widow weeps, his children mourn;
'Tis yours to help the feeble, the forlorn.
He never sought a mean or base reward;
He never crav'd the bounty of my lord.
We crave it now. For alms we humbly sue;
We hinge the knee, we bow the head, to you.
We ask your charity. Not for ourselves—
He needs it not who sternly digs and delves.
But can those babies work? Can yon poor girl
Battle with life, its warfare and its whirl?
Ladies and gentles, we are in your hand,
Upon your pitying hearts we take our stand.
Grant us your sympathy, your voices too.
Bear with us kindly. Think that all we do
To win your praise, to deprecate your blame,
Is humbly done in friendship's sacred name.

Concerts.

SOCIETY OF BRITISH AND FOREIGN MUSICIANS.—The incessant rain militated against the complete success of the "day and night fête" which the "Society of British and Foreign Musicians" gave on Monday at the Surrey Gardens; but, in spite of the unseasonable inclemency of the weather, the music-hall was tolerably well filled in the evening by an audience whose enthusiasm manifested itself on every possible occasion. Indeed, almost every piece in the long programme was encored, and the vocalists were in every case compelled to accept the compliment, so heartily was it offered. Among the most successful of the morçeaux selected may be mentioned the "Shadow Song" from Dinorah, and the graceful ballad, "The magic of a smile," in both of which Mlle. Parepa was encored; Virginia Gabriel's effective song, "The Skipper and his Boy," rendered with great spirit by Mad. Sainton-Dolby; Bishop's evergreen, "Tell me, my heart," very nicely sung by Miss Theresa Jeffreys; and the comic song, "Tom the Tinker," for which, when encored, Mr. Hatton substituted his favourite, "Merry little grey fat man," and in which he excited the loud merriment of his audience. Mr. Sims Reeves sang Linley's "Bonny Jean," the new ballad, "Sweet love, good night to thee," composed expressly for him by Mr. Hatton, and Mori's favourite, "Who shall be fairest," and gave them all with such admirable expression, that at the end of each he received a perfect ovation. He repeated all three — we need not say that they were redemanded — and was compelled to bow his acknowledgments at the conclusion of the last, by way of escaping a second encore. The other vocalists were Mlle. Enrichetta Camille (a new and very promising English singer, who, under this Italian nom de guerre, has won well-earned laurels at many of the continental lyric theatres), Miss C. Hamilton, the Misses Brougham, Mr. J. Morgan, Mr. Walbank, and Mr. Santley, all of whose efforts were received with great applause. Mr. Hatton and M. Emile Berger accompanied the singers, and two popular overtures were well played by an efficient orchestra. The society has been self-supporting from the time of its foundation — thirty-eight years ago — until now, and we trust that the endeavour to increase its usefulness by establishing a fund for the widows and children of its members will be crowned with ultimate success.

SURREY GARDENS.—The third and last of the Balfe concerts came off on Wednesday evening, and attracted a vast concourse—vast indeed, as in the days of the great Jullien fêtes—the principal load-stars of the evening being Mad. Alboni and Mr. Sims Reeves. On the varied and novel entertainments presented to the visitors we need not enlarge—time and space command us to be brief. We may, however, state that enthusiasm was the order of the day. Indeed, both the great soprano-contralto and the great tenor, albeit so much used to vociferation, must have felt positively deafened by the approving thunders. As for Mad. Alboni, who was a greater novelty than Mr. Sims Reeves, had she lost her hearing altogether, we should not have been astonished. The people literally roared at her, as if every individual in the dense mass was contending who should roar loudest and longest. It must be remembered that Mad. Alboni made her first and only appearance at the Surrey Music Hall this season, which in some measure may palliate the boisterousness of the multitude.

THE BROUGH MEMORIAL CONCERT. — From circumstances over which the promoters had certainly no control, and which are indeed not easily to be accounted for, the attendance at this concert, which took place at St. James's Hall, was limited. A better programme, as our readers will already have seen, has seldom been put forth. The artists engaged were numerous and distinguished in their several walks of art; the selection of pieces to be performed was admirable; and, what is rare in a concert of so great length and with such a variety of names, the programme was with one exception carried out to the letter. Of course on such an occasion criticism is out of the question — the only novelty that could call for it was a new song, "Has anybody here seen Hugo?"—the words by the late Mr. Brough, the music by Mr. C. White—a pretty lively melody, given with much clearness and expression by Miss Poole. The rest of the concert consisted entirely of morçeaux, with which, as well as with the merits of the artists who executed them, the public are already familiar. We must say, however, that the utmost zeal and willingness to promote the cause for which they were called together was exhibited by every one concerned—all did their best, the entertainment as regards vocalists and instrumentalists, indeed every one professionally engaged, being entirely gratuitous. The following ladies and gentlemen should be recorded as having given their valuable assistance:—Mesdames Catherine Hayes, Louisa Vinning, Sainton-Dolby, Enderssohn, Weiss, Laura Baxter, Robert Paget, Parepa, Poole, Banks, Theresa Jeffreys, and Palmer, with Messrs. W. Harrison, Santley, Wilbye Cooper, and Weiss; as well as amongst the instrumentalists, Messrs. Sainton, Collins, Pratten, Lazarus, Harper, and Hughes. The accompanyists were Messieurs Francisco Berger, Kingsbury and Duggan; and Mr. Alfred Mellon, who kindly undertook the general direction of the concert, conducted an admirable band.

MM. RÉNÉ DOUAY AND HORACE POUSSARD'S MATINÉE MUSICALE (July 10) took place at Collards' new concert room. With the exception of a quartet by Beethoven, for two violins, tenor, and violoncello, executed by Messrs. Horace Poussard (first violin), Otto Bernard (second violin), Schreurs (tenor), and Réné Douay (violoncello), the programme was of a non-classical kind, the instrumental pieces being for the most part the composition of the players, and the vocal music in almost every instance being taken from the repertory of the French school. M. Poussard played Reber's La Barceuse, and a Morceau, by himself, called Rondo du Nuit, both most admirably, and with great effect. M. Réné Douay introduced a serenade by Schubert, and displayed great powers of execution and a fine round tone; and both artists joined in a duet for violin and violoncello, on airs from Semiramide. In addition, Mr. Lindsay Sloper played a solo on the pianoforte in his finest manner, and Mr. John Thomas a fantasia on the harp. The singers were Mlle. Vaneri, Mad. Rieder, MM. Depret, Fontanier, and Jules Lefort.

THE THIRD AND LAST PIANOFORTE CONCERT of Master Horton C. Allison, the extremely clever pupil of Mr. W. H. Holmes, was given at Willis's Rooms, on Thursday morning. The performances of the juvenile pianist included Mr. G. A. Macfarren's sonata, Ma Cousine; Professor Bennett's Rondo Piacevole; Mr. J. W. Davison's tarantella, Giovannina; two of the Pezzi di bravura of Mr. Cipriani Potter; air and variations composed by Miss Georgiana Holmes; Mr. W. H. Holmes's fantasia entitled Fairy Fingers; romance from Lurline arranged for the pianoforte; and caprice in D, composed by himself. The pieces most liked, perhaps the best executed, were the bravura sketches of Mr. Potter, the Rondo of Professor Bennett, and the Fairy Fingers by Mr. Holmes, which capital fantasia—one of the most brilliant and effective show pieces we know—was played with great dexterity and neatness. The audience were delighted beyond measure with all the young gentleman's performances, and applauded him in every thing. The vocalists were Miss Kate Ranoe, Miss Chipperfield, Miss Lascelles, Mr. Wallworth, and Mr. Walbank—the gentlemen two very walls of support to the concert. The company was more select than numerous.

BEETHOVEN AND PAER.—An old story is again on the tapis, this time with the honoured name of Ferdinand Hiller as authority, who heard it related by Paer himself. The substance of it is, that at a representation of Paer's Leonore, Beethoven said to the composer in words to this effect, "The subject is so good I must compose it myself." This might very well have been true of Paer's Achilles, brought out at Vienna in 1801, but cannot possibly be true of the Leonore. Paer must, in the course of years, have confounded the two in his memory. Here are those stubborn things, the dates. Paer called to Dresden as kapellmeister, 1803; produced his Leonore at Dresden, Oct. 3, 1804; Beethoven's Fidelio produced in Vienna, 1805; First performance of Paer's Leonore in Vienna, Feb. 8, 1809.—Dwight's Boston Journal of Music.

TO THE BURLESQUE OF THE "ENCHANTED ISLE"

By the late Robert B. Brough. Revived at Drury Lane Theatre, July 25, 1860, for the benefit of his widow and children. The Prologue written by SHIRLEY BROOKS, Esq., and delivered by Mrs. STIRLING.

A loftier language and a graver tone
Than mine, have made our mournful story known,
Yet pardon some few words that intervene
As lighter prologue to a mirthful Scene,
Some tribute-words you'll let me pay, the while
Our stage prepares to win your favouring smile:
Who have more right to smiles than those who cheer
To smiles the faces pale with sorrow's tear?

From that rich treasury whence the richest draw
The boldest "instance" and the wisest "saw,"
From those grand pictures, bright with freshest youth,
Where endless fancy decks eternal truth;
From him who read all hearts and hopes and fears,
As Newton read the mysteries of the spheres,
From that proud garden, whose exhaustless beds
Have furnished garlands for a thousand heads—
Our young, lost, poet borrowed, as of right,
The forms to fill the scene we show to-night.

Yet, be it said, and those who knew him best,
Would with their readiest voice my words attest,
He borrowed from that store-house rich and free,
Not in irreverence, but with frankest glee,
Not as a giber, with his length of ear,
Who seeks in noblest thoughts some theme for jeer,
But as a child, who laughingly will dare
Assume in sport a father's walk and air.—
There is a volume—might I wish it read,
'Tis Falstaff's Life—by him whose life hath fled—
That book our poet's memory bravely guards
From charge of mockery of the Bard of Bards.

So, on to-night's Revival deign to smile—
Laugh at the whims of his Enchanted Isle;
Remember that the work presented here
(Shared by a brother whom you scarce can cheer)
Was the first product of the buoyant brain
That toiled so well—that ne'er shall toil again:
The earliest laurel—the first victory won
In that gay field of fancy, wit, and fun
Where he was sought, for many a joyous day,
Nor sought in vain—till wasting life gave way.

For your kind presence in those crowded ranks,
There are four hearts that owe you deepest thanks—
But one is over-charged, and hushed—and three Scarce know their debt—accept their thanks from me.
We give, O gladly, friends, our Art, and you
Your generous aid. 'Tis all that each can do.

BROUGH MEMORIAL FUND.—The following eminent artistes in the kindest manner proffered their gratuitous assistance at the concert on the 20th of July in St. James's Hall:—Mad. Catherine Hayes, Mad. Sainton, Mad. Enderssohn, Mad. Weiss, Mad. Laura Baxter, and Mad. Louisa Vinning; Miss Poole, Miss Palmer, Miss Banks, Miss Jeffreys, and Miss Parepa; Messrs. W. Harrison (manager of the Royal English Opera), Wilbye Cooper, Santley, and Weiss. Soloists, Messrs. Sainton, G. Collins, Lazarus, Thomas Harper, and Hughes. The orchestra comprised Messrs. Antoine, Amor, Barret, Betzmenn, Collins, Dando, Doyle, Difolly, Folks, Glanville, Hill, C. Harper, Hann, Hann, jun., Howell, sen., Hawkes, F. Horton, Jolly, Kelly, Keevil, Lazarus, Love, Levy, T. Wand, E. Wand, Wilkins, Ward, and Zerbini. Pianoforte, Messrs. F. Kinsbury and Francesco Berger. Conductor, Mr. Alfred Mellon.

Letter to the Editor.

BEETHOVEN v. PAER.

Sir,—With reference to the above subject, I beg to forward you subjoined extract of a letter I have just received from Vienna:—

Extract.

"You ask me in relation to the story of Paer and Beethoven and the opera Fidelio, what are the facts? A question easily answered.

"That Paer did relate the story to Hiller there can be no doubt; it has for many years been before the public, though not always in precisely the same form. But Paer's memory must have played him false. He was in Vienna several years, and composed their some seven operas, one of which was Achilles, a grand work, and upon a subject peculiarly to Beethoven's taste. Now I can easily believe the anecdote true if told of Achilles.* In the autumn of 1803, Beethoven, who had been employed to write for the Theater an der Wien, was living in the theatre buildings, and Paer had gone to Dresden as Kapellmeister. October 3d, 1804, Paer's Leonore was performed for the first time, in Dresden, the composer leaving for Italy the next day. Beethoven's Fidelio was performed for the first time November 20th, 1805; Paer's Leonore was given for the first time in Vienna (in German), February 8th, 1809.

"These dates are sufficient to show that the story, as relating to Fidelio, can by no possibility be true.

"Your article is sufficient, however, and needs no confirmation from yours, &c. &c."

It will at once be seen that my suppositions, with regard to Paer's Leonore at least, were correct. What I particularly wished to prove, the fallacy, namely, of Paer's idea of having served as a model to Beethoven, finds ample confirmation in the above, and renders further comment on my part superfluous.

Yours &c.,

THE BACH SOCIETY.

After some years' labour, the objects of the Society have been to some extent attained, in the attention now being paid to the works of J. S. Bach by the musical public generally. While, however, the public have been on the alert, the season 1859-60 has passed away without any public performance. In 1858, the Grosse Passions awakened an amount of interest which should have been immediately followed up; but, instead of the announcement of further public performances, 1859 brought forth a fragmentary concert to the members only, and 1860 has followed the example. The devotion to, and enthusiasm for their cause, which the members of this Society exhibit, is, we believe, to a great extent thrown away: the public are ready to join in the objects of the institution by attending any concerts that may be announced, but the Society, from some cause inexplicable by us, has not for two years afforded them one opportunity. The choir, on which the success of the concerts so much depends, was, when we last heard them in public, in a very bad state. The year 1860 has changed all that; and by a disfranchisement clause of a sweeping character, the vocal divisions have been proportioned, the number reduced, and the efficiency quadrupled. The Committee of the Bach Society may safely be considered to understand their own business, and it is no part of our duty as journalists to dictate any course for them to pursue; but on behalf of the public, we cannot help stating the disappointment generally felt among musicians of all classes that so great a success as the concert in 1858 was not succeeded by further announcements.

On Tuesday last the first and last choruses, and two chorales, from the Grosse Passions Musik, and the third motett (of the set of six) constituted the first part of the concert, which took place at King's College. Two preludes and fugues for clavier were played by Mr. George Russell, and then the attraction of the evening commenced. The first eleven movements from the High Mass in B minor constituted the second part of the programme. They are every one of them of "such a character," as Herr Diogenes Taefelsdröckh says, "as to set neglect at defiance." The "Kyrie," after a short introduction of massive grandeur, is a fugue of wonderful elaboration and beauty; the "Gloria," which follows the second "Kyrie," may be fairly described as the most effective music ever written for these words. It is infinitely spirited and exulting throughout, giving way to an air for soprano, "Laudamus Te," which is melody in every note. The "Qui sedes," contralto air, is equally beautiful. The "Quoniam" is a most elaborate air for bass, and the chorus which follows it, "Cum sancto spiritu," is astonishingly vigorous and brilliant. The working out of the phrases, as it draws to its close, is a practical lesson in counterpoint of great value. The solos were sung by Miss Banks the faultless, Miss Palmer the clever and gifted, Mr. Benson of the Chapel Royal and Westminster Abbey, and Mr. Winn.

Should this Mass in B minor ever be performed entire, we could guarantee a numerous audience from among our own acquaintance.

THE ACTORS AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

Saturday was a grand day at the Crystal Palace. It was specially set apart for a bazaar, fancy fair, and concert on behalf of the Royal Dramatic College; and, judging from the number of visitors present and the animation which prevailed throughout the entire proceedings, we cannot but think the "event" was one of the most successful which has taken place for a long time past. The programme was of a very varied character; but the centre of attraction was certainly the portion of the palace where the fancy fair was held. This took place in the space opposite the orchestra, and the principal ladies of the various dramatic corps of the London theatres presided at the stalls. These comprised—Miss Swanborough, Miss Bufton, Mrs. F. Matthews, Miss Kate Hickson, Miss Saunders, Miss Eburne, Mrs. Billington, Miss Kate Kelly, Mrs. Stirling, Mrs. Leigh Murray, Miss Herbert, Mrs. A. Mellon, Miss H. Simms, Miss Daly, Miss Marston, Mrs. Fitzwilliam, Miss Amy Sedgwick, Miss Thorn, Miss Laidlaw, Mrs. C. Young, Miss Neville, Miss M. Wilton, and Miss Oliver. All these ladies exerted themselves to the utmost to entice customers—and few, if any, had cause for complaint when they reckoned up their "takings" at the end of the day. At one period Miss Sedgwick's "wheel of fortune," perhaps, obtained a rather larger share of attention than was bestowed upon some of the other stalls; but to compensate for this, shortly afterwards, Mrs. Stirling ruled supreme, and when her numerous admirers departed, they left minus many pieces of silver they had previously possessed. The same remarks will apply to almost all the other stall-keepers; and upon this point we can only say no one had cause for jealousy, but the funds of the college were largely benefited. Two other ladies, Miss E. Johnstone and Miss Hudspeth, also did a very "pretty business." They were the mistresses of a fancy post-office, where autograph letters of J. B. Buckstone, T. P. Cooke, William Creswick, Mad. Grisi, William Harrison, Miss Heath, Robert Keeley, Mrs. Keeley, Carlotta Leclercq, W. C. Macready, Samuel Phelps, Louisa Pyne, F. Robson, Tom Taylor, John Vandenhoff, Benjamin Webster, Alfred Wigan, Mrs. Wigan, Marie Wilton, and others could be obtained upon the payment of the postage—one shilling. It is only necessary to say that the postal arrangements—both as regards rapid delivery and revenue—gave great satisfaction.

But the men were not idle. Mr. Buckstone announced "as now selling," a full account of the "savage assault of Aunt Sally upon himself, described in letters from an eye witness;" while

* I cannot.—J. T.

Messrs. J. T. Toole and Paul Bedford intimated that they had gone into partnership, and had on sale "a quantity of St. Domingo Billy 'bacco boxes"—the quality of which was guaranteed by Mr. T. P. Cooke. How many editions the "new work" went through, or to what extent the receptacles of the "weed" found purchasers, we are unable to say; but if these transactions were upon an equal scale with others that took place during the day, all parties concerned had reason to be satisfied.

Then at different periods of the day there was much excitement by "Aunt Sally," "Cheap John," "Punch and Judy," and "The Tent of Mystery," under the direction of J. B. Buckstone, Frank Matthews, Paul Bedford, J. T. Toole, Clark (Haymarket), H. Compton, H. Widdicomb, James Rogers, J. Clarke (Strand), Jos. Robins, T.R.M., and Lewis Ball. The reason why we cannot give a "full, true, and particular account" of the Tent of Mystery, which was one of the most lucrative and striking exhibitions of the fête, is the solemn injunction which met the eye upon entering the mysterious cavern, "All who enter here must observe SILENCE as to what they see or ——."

About three o'clock Mr. Webster, the Master of the Dramatic College, delivered the following address, which was written expressly for the occasion by Mr. Robert Bell:—

The painter who displays his art on glass,
Creates what seems at first a dusky mass
Of tints and outlines—'til the light shines through,
And brings its latent beauty into view:
Then glow the colours, then the forms appear,
And what was dark before, grows bright and clear.

Thus, too, the poet who the stage essays,
And trusts his fame to audiences and plays,
Prepares a picture into which he throws
Wit, knowledge, humour, all the traits his muse
Can gather out of life, from sternest passions
Down to field practice, and the last new fashions.

But when 'tis done, and every scene is wrought
With finest skill in character and plot,
It waits the light that shall its depths illume,
And all is dim until the actors come.
They to its fable vital action give,
Quicken its words, and make its figures live;
Through them the scenes start from the silent page,
And with their breathing movements fill the stage.

'Tis in their name we have come here to-day,
To honour both—the Player and the Play.
The Drama needs no helping-hand; 'tis sure
Through all Time's shifts and changes to endure.
Not so the Player; when his prime is o'er,
He sinks neglected, and is seen no more.

You, who your Drama's credit justly cherish,
Will not consent to see the Actor perish,
Remembering what you owe him for the nights
Of innocent pleasure, and of grave delights,
His art has yielded you;—how his own ease
He sacrificed in the desire to please;—
Wore laughter on his face, when private grief
Was eating at his heart;—and found the chief
Reward for all his struggles, toils, and cares,
Not in the smiles of fortune, but in yours.

You will not fail him in his hour of need,
When his grey hairs, and want, for succour plead,
But with a liberal hand, and offering meet,
Will raise for his old age a calm retreat;
Where, cast for life, he may play out his part
In quiet trust, and with a grateful heart.

The concert then commenced. It was conducted by Mr. Benedict and Mr. Lindsay Sloper, and the artistes were as follows: Mad. Catherine Hayes, Mad. Florence Lancia, Mad. Louisa Vinning, and Miss Augusta Thomson, Mr. W. Harrison, Mr. Santley, Master Drew Dean, M. Jules Lefort, M. Engel, and Mr. Augustus Braham. The different vocalists were much applauded, and the instrumental portion of the entertainment (there were several bands) was listened to with extreme pleasure.

The upper system of fountains played about seven o'clock; but after they had ceased, a large portion of the visitors—who appeared highly delighted with the day's proceedings—lingered in the grounds and upon the terraces, watching the declining sun and gazing upon the magnificent scenery presented to their view in all directions.

The bazaar and fancy fair was continued on Monday, under the superintendence of the same ladies and gentlemen who attended on Saturday. The athletic sports and games by members of the volunteer corps (postponed from last Monday) were also concluded on that day. The great fountains and the whole series of waterworks were played at half-past five o'clock, as a compliment to the gentlemen of the International Statistical Congress, who had a déjeûner in the new dining-room of the palace as a termination to their labours.

DRURY-LANE THEATRE.—The dramatic entertainment for the benefit of the widow and children of the late Mr. Robert B. Brough must have been highly satisfactory to those by whom it was originated and carried out. The immense space of the great metropolitan play-house was filled by an enthusiastic audience, and the applause bestowed throughout the entire performance showed a most gratifying appreciation on the part of all present of the generous efforts made in every direction to give éclat to the event. When we state that the entertainment was supported by members of no fewer than five metropolitan companies, viz., the Haymarket, the Adelphi, the Princess's, the Strand, and the Olympic, in conjunction with the Savage Club Amateurs, it will be at once conjectured that the programme was of the most diversified and attractive character. Want of fulness, too, certainly could not be said to form one of its defects. To begin with, the leading members of the Princess's company appeared in the new comedietta of Cruel to be Kind, in which Mr. Harris and Miss Carlotta Leclercq carried off the honours. Then Mr. Leicester Buckingham recited Robert Brough's spirited lines upon "Godiva," with all the ease and dramatic intelligence of a practised elocutionist, and with a poetic feeling which evinced thorough sympathy with the spirit of the author. Mr. Buckingham was summoned before the curtain at the conclusion of the piece—an honour to which his masterly delivery of verses by no means easy to recite certainly gave him the fullest claim. After this, Charles Selby's well-written comedietta, The Last of the Pigtails, was given with much spirit by the Strand company—Mr. Clarke, Mr. Parselle, Mr. J. Bland, Mrs. Selby, and Miss Bufton rivalling each other in spirit and humour. Mr. George Augustus Sala then came forward, and read with an impressive earnestness that powerfully affected the entire audience an admirable address from his own pen, invoking aid for the family of the deceased. Miss Louisa Leclercq then danced a pas seul with all her accustomed grace, and then the popular Adelphi favourites, Mr. Toole, Mr. Paul Bedford, and Miss Woolgar, appeared in that diverting scene from The Willow Copse, wherein the fast man of former days is seen reduced to the condition of a street hawker by the vicissitudes of a cruel fortune. The incident, detached as it was from the body of the work, was thoroughly appreciated by the audience, and elicited the heartiest applause. Of course, too, Mr. Buckstone was greeted with shouts of laughter in the farce of Fitzsmythe of Fitzsmythe Hall, which came after; Mrs. Wilkins, Mr. Rogers, and Mr. W. Farren, who supported him, being very warmly received. An admirably written prologue to the burlesque of the Enchanted Isle, prepared by Mr. Shirley Brooks for the occasion, was given with excellent effect by Mrs. Stirling. The curtain then rose upon the burlesque—the earliest work, it will be remembered, of the two brothers, one of whom has just been taken from us by death. The cast was as follows: Alonzo, Mr. George Cruikshank; Ferdinand, Mrs. A. Mellon; Prospero, Mr. Leicester Buckingham; Ariel, Miss Kate Terry; Caliban, Mr. Francis Talfourd; Smuttifacio, Mr. John Hollingshead; Miranda, Miss Fanny Stirling (her first appearance on any stage), with the Princess's Rifle Corps and the members of the Savage Club as courtiers, sailors, foreign propagandists, &c. The members of the Savage Club fully sustained the histrionic credit they had acquired by their representation at the Lyceum, and Miss Fanny Stirling, who is the daughter of the Olympic actress, created a very favourable impression upon the audience. She has a charming face—the copy of her mother's—an agreeable voice, a pleasing manner, and much of that archness and vivacity by which our gifted comedienne has so long been distinguished. Nothing could have been more favourable than her début, and should she adopt the stage as a profession, we may fairly hope to rank her as one of its fairest and most talented representatives.

Scarborough.—The Spa Concert of Tuesday evening attracted a brilliant audience. Among the instrumental gems were Weber's overture to Der Freyschutz, Mozart's to Figaro, and a selection from the Zauberflöte; these were tastefully performed by the band,—the solos being given with a finish that proved the ability of the individual members. The vocalists were Miss Susanna Cole and Mr. Paul Standish. Mr. Paul Standish, in a song by Hatton, "Come, live with me and be my love," and another by the same composer, "Sweet love, good night to thee," called forth the warmest plaudits of the audience, who re-demanded the latter. Miss Cole appeared to captivate her hearers in every song. Rossini's "Di Piacer mi balza il cor" was perfect. In the duet "Mira la bianca Luna," with Mr. Standish, the vocalists appeared to emulate each other. Mr. Hatton, of the Spa establishment, presided at the pianoforte.

Lola Montez.—The New York Tribune, of the 6th inst., says:—"Late on Tuesday evening we were surprised to learn that the celebrated Mad. Lola Montez, Countess of Landsfelt, lay at the point of death, and was not expected to survive the night. On Saturday morning she arose in her usual health, but soon complained of giddiness, and, lying down, was at once deprived of speech and motion by a paralytic stroke. Sunday and Monday she was able to partially recognise those about her, but on Tuesday seemed to have lost all consciousness, and was pronounced by her medical attendants as beyond all hope of life. For some time past she has resided at No. 15 Clinton-place, and during her sickness has been faithfully cared for by several of her intimate friends."

The Late Robert Brough.—The efforts in London to raise a fund for the benefit of the widow and family of the late Mr. R. Brough are about to be seconded in Manchester by a number of gentlemen whose intention is to give an amateur performance at as early a date as will permit the necessary arrangements being concluded. The Manchester Examiner says that great energy is being exercised in the good cause, and that an influential number of patrons are promising every possible assistance.

The Copyright of "Paradise Lost."—As Lord Camden cites the example of Milton, to show that he placed no value upon the right of property in his great poem, it may be well to repeat the authentic facts concerning the sale of that copyright. Milton sold his copyright to Samuel Simmons in 1667, for an immediate payment of £5. But the agreement entitled him to a conditional payment of £5 more when 1300 copies should be sold of the first edition; of the like sum after the same number of the second edition; and of another £5 after the same sale of the third edition. The number of each edition was not to exceed 1500 copies. In two years, the sale gave the poet a right to his second payment, for which he signed a receipt on the 26th of April, 1669. The second edition was not printed till 1674, and Milton did not live to receive the payment stipulated for this impression. The third edition was published in 1678; and his widow, to whom the copy was then to devolve, agreed with Simmons, the printer, to receive £8 for her right, according to her receipt, dated December 21, 1680; and she gave him a general release, dated April 29, 1681. Simmons sold the right to Brabason Aylmer, a bookseller, for £25, and Aylmer sold it to Jacob Tonson, one moiety in August 1683, and the other moiety in March 1690, at a price considerably advanced. (Todd's Life of Milton, 193–195, London, 1826.) It thus appears that the poet was very careful to assert his full right of property, as he and others understood it at the time, and to make it available to his family. The amount which he chose to receive, compared with the real value of the poem, or measured by a modern standard, seems very trifling. But as such rights were estimated then, and considering that the poem gained slowly upon the attention of his own age, it was not a grossly inadequate price. When it had been published fourteen years and upwards, the copyright, between one bookseller and another, brought only £25. Yet its value could not have been affected by any apprehension, at the time of this sale, that it was not protected by the common law. Such notion had not then arisen; and long after, viz. in 1739, Lord Hardwicke protected by injunction the title of Tonson, derived under the assignment made by the poet in 1667. Doubtless Milton did not write his great poem for money; but we have seen that he supposed the right of exclusive property in authors was acknowledged by the law of his country, and he took pains practically to assert the right in his own case. It seems by no means a wild conjecture that he did this for the sake of example, as well as in order to preserve his reputation, by keeping the control of the text of his poem.—Curtis on Literary Property.

Zingarelli enjoyed a very respectable position; he had an amiable family; his wife manifested towards him not only a sincere attachment, but also a kind of respect. Yet never were there two persons more dissimilar in disposition: he was quick and passionate; she cold and impassible. But, above all, she possessed a defect which increased Zingarelli's hastiness; she was excessively economical, while her husband liked not merely to make a display of what he had, but even to indulge in pieces of extravagance, without troubling himself much whether he could afford them. One evening he was playing with a friend at picquet, a game at which he was a great proficient. "The snuffers," he said, addressing his wife. She gave them to him; they were a common pair. "Not those," he added. "But, my dear——." "The snuffers, I repeat, and the good ones." "Well, at any rate, let us snuff the candles now with these." "No, I will have the good ones." "But they will be spoilt: they are of polished steel and inlaid." "Gabriel," said Zingarelli, addressing his old servant, "go to Bressier's and get me a dozen pairs of snuffers." "A dozen, sir?" "A dozen!" "But, my dear——." "Of the best quality." "But——." "Inlaid!" "Good gracious!" "English manufacture." The poor woman was silent. Had she ventured to make another observation, Gabriel would have been ordered to fetch two dozen pairs.

Sung by Mr. SIMS REEVES,

COMPOSED BY BRINLEY RICHARDS.

Price 2s. 6d.

"'The Harp of Wales' (sung for the first time) is a very graceful song, admirably adapted for Mr. Sims Reeves, and sung by the distinguished tenor with a refinement of expression which produced a magical effect on the audience, and raised demands for repetition which were not to be denied."—Daily Telegraph.

"'The Harp of Wales,' beautifully sung by Mr. Sims Reeves, was unanimously redemanded."—Morning Post.

"The other was new and sung for the first time by Mr. Sims Reeves. It is called the 'Harp of Wales,' and is a lovely and expressive melody. It was enthusiastically encored."—Daily News.

"Mr. Richards did honour to his fatherland by introducing a new song, 'The Harp of Wales,' which is sure to become a favourite of the Cymri, who are justly proud of their bards. So admirably was this sung by Mr. Sims Reeves, that an encore was inevitable, and the ballad was as warmly applauded the second time as the first."—Musical World.

NEW SONGS by J. W. DAVISON, "Rough wind that moanest loud" (sung by Mr. Santley at the Monday Popular Concerts); "Swifter far than Summer's flight," (sung by Miss Palmer at the Monday Popular Concerts); "False friend, wilt thou smile or weep," Beatrice's song in the Cenci (sung by Madame Sainton-Dolby, at the Monday Popular Concerts, St. James's Hall); are published by Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201 Regent Street.

The above Songs form Nos. 1, 2, and 3 of Vocal Illustrations of Shelley.

"Mr. Santley was encored in one of the thoroughly picturesque and poetical settings of Shelley, by Mr. J. W. Davison, mentioned a week or two since. His song, 'Rough wind that moanest loud,' is a thoroughly good song."—Athenæum.

"Madame Sainton-Dolby's greatest efforts were called forth by Mendelssohn's 'Night' song, and Mr. J. W. Davison's 'False friend, wilt thou smile or weep' (from Shelley's 'Cenci'), to both of which she did the amplest justice. The latter work is one of the most poetical and beautiful of the 'Vocal Illustrations of Shelley,' composed by Mr. Davison many years ago, and which, though rarely heard, possess far more sterling merit than nine-tenths of the most admired songs of the day. A more intellectual treatment of the words could not well be imagined. Mr. Davison has completely caught the spirit of the poetry, and heightened its beauty by the potent charms which belong only to the sister art. 'False friend, wilt thou smile or weep,' sung to perfection by Madame Sainton-Dolby, was enthusiastically applauded."

"THE HARP OF WALES."

Sung by Mr. SIMS REEVES,

COMPOSED BY BRINLEY RICHARDS.

Price 2s. 6d.

"'The Harp of Wales' (sung for the first time) is a very graceful song, admirably adapted for Mr. Sims Reeves, and sung by the distinguished tenor with a refinement of expression which produced a magical effect on the audience, and raised demands for repetition which were not to be denied."—Daily Telegraph.

"'The Harp of Wales,' beautifully sung by Mr. Sims Reeves, was unanimously redemanded."—Morning Post.

"The other was new and sung for the first time by Mr. Sims Reeves. It is called the 'Harp of Wales,' and is a lovely and expressive melody. It was enthusiastically encored."—Daily News.

"Mr. Richards did honour to his fatherland by introducing a new song, 'The Harp of Wales,' which is sure to become a favourite of the Cymri, who are justly proud of their bards. So admirably was this sung by Mr. Sims Reeves, that an encore was inevitable, and the ballad was as warmly applauded the second time as the first."—Musical World.

MUSIC AND THEATRES IN PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent).

Aug. 1, 1860.

I AM this week almost in the same predicament again which obliged me in my last letter to entertain you de cequis et bobus rather than of actors and musicians. Paris has fallen into a sort of dreamy lethargic state, from which it will only rouse itself to rush off to the sea-side or the German health springs. At the Grand Opéra, the run of Semiramis continues, if such an expression can be applied to the progression of the stately queen of the East. The sisters Marchisio have gained more self-possession in their respective parts, and advance in public estimation. The famous duo between Arsace and Semiramis is nightly called for a second time. Pierre de Medicis, Prince Poniatowski's opera, has been played once, and Robert le Diable is to be produced forthwith, with Mlle. Vandenheuvel Duprez, and Mlle. Marie Sax. Roger was induced to sing once more at the Opéra Comique before his departure for Baden, and appeared in the part of Georges in La Dame Blanche before a densely crowded audience, who greeted him with every mark of enthusiastic admiration. It was, indeed, an adroit stroke of policy on the part of M. Beaumont, the new manager, to bring Roger back to the scene of his first blushing honours, and thus to revive those laurels which, in the arduous trials of the Grand Opéra, had somewhat faded. Le petit Chaperon Rouge, so long announced, will decidedly be revived this week, and immediately upon it will follow M. d'Hauteroche's comedy, Crispin Medecin, the production of which has suffered some delay, owing to objections raised to it on the part of the authorities. They have at last consented to let it be acted, but stipulate for a different title. This is a concession, no doubt, to the susceptibilities of the medical profession, who are in this country a very thin-skinned class, and mighty sticklers for the dignity of their cloth. The race of Diafoirus, though it has discarded powdered periwig and gold-headed cane, is as flourishing as when Moliére scarified its bombastic pedantry with the sharp edge of his satire; but public authority now intervenes to save the dignity of science from such unseemly assaults.

Gossip is already busy with the future season at the Italian Opera here. It seems a settled thing that if Tamberlik do not return, Mario is engaged for the last six months of the season, and Signor Pancani for March and April. Grasiani, Gardoni, Badiali, Zucchini, Angelini, and Mesdames Alboni, Penco, and Marie Battu are coming again, so that a sufficiently complete company will to a certainty be available. The season it is said will open with La Sonnambula; and La Semiramide will be given with Mesdames Alboni and Penco, and Badiali, so that the Parisians will have an opportunity of exercising their critical acumen by a comparison of the Italian performance with that now forming the principal attraction of their own Grand Opéra. Such operas as Il Matrimonio Segreto and L'Italiana in Algeri, which are not sufficiently long to furnish forth the entire evening, will be backed up by operas in one act selected from the old Italian répertoire.

The Orpheon Society of the city of Paris held one of two grand meetings last Sunday at the Cirque Napoléon, under the direction of MM. François Bazin and Pasdeloup, directors of vocal instruction in the communal schools. The programme may interest some of your readers after the recent visit to England of the Orpheonists. Here it is: — Part I.: 1° Veni Creator, by Besozzi; 2° Le Médecin Tant mieux et le Médecin Tant pis, by F. Bazin; 3° Angelus, by Papin; 4° La Garde Passe (men's voices), by Grétry; 5° O Salutaris, by Auber; 6° Le Couvre-feu, by Halévy. Part II.: 1° Invocation, by Pasdeloup; 2° Le Printemps (men's voices), by Von Calle; 3° Les Vendanges, by Orlando de Lassus; 4° Faust (men's voices), by Gounod; 5° Cantique, by Haydn; Vive l'Empereur, by Gounod. The second meeting will be next Sunday. Last week the Concert Musard distinguished itself by the performance of Spontini's overture to Olympia; and as few opportunities of hearing this work have ever presented themselves to the Parisians, great curiosity was excited on the occasion. Mad. Spontini is said to have furnished directions as to the true mode of rendering the work; and certainly it was very effectively executed.

The distribution of prizes at the Conservatoire for Music and Declamation has just taken place, but in neither department do the competitions appear to have brought to light talent of more than ordinary promise. It is worth while noticing, perhaps, that among the competitors for the violin and violoncello prizes, figured four young ladies, three violinists and one violoncellist. Lady-fiddlers we are tolerably well accustomed to, but the attitude of a lady grasping with all her limbs a violoncello is one to the grotesqueness of which usage has not yet reconciled us. In time, no doubt, we shall think nothing of it. The cry after more female occupations, which is so fast breaking down the foolish distinctions between sauce for the goose and sauce for the gander, and has already given us a female goose practising physic, is destined, no doubt, to wear out our faculty of astonishment at such novelties. Female lawyers, soldiers, and sailors will be plentiful as blackberries; and the stories of Portia, and Joan of Arc, and the touching ballad of "Billy Taylor" will lose their savour. A propos of this subject, as connected with the question of delicacy touching the fair sex generally, I am informed of a curious result which has followed the promulgation of the new constitution by the King of Naples. Besides restoring to the repertory of the Opera a number of works previously interdicted by the censorship of the former régime on grounds now of morality, now of state policy, it has emancipated the corps de ballet from the celebrated green caleçons (drawers) to which the prurient-minded zeal for decency of the priests had condemned them, much to their chagrin and annoyance. They now nightly appear in the zephyr-like pink and white in which we are accustomed to admire in perfect innocence their evolutions, unreminded by a green signal that there is any danger in the spectacle, and the audience testify by their enthusiastic applause their sense of relief at the removal of this disgusting badge of servitude to minds darkened with suspicion and haunted by hideous phantoms of human depravity and carnal sin. While I am at Naples I may as well inform you that the tenor, Signor Pancani, is engaged for the ensuing season, together with Negrini and Colletti, Signora Steffenone, Signora Vera-Lorini, and the danseuse, Mlle. Boschetti.

Returning to the Paris news, I shall conclude all I have to communicate by saying a few words about the theatres. Not that there is anything remarkable to dwell upon in their doings, for all are pretty much in the same languishing condition as characterises musical affairs. The fact is the extraordinary caprices of the weather have entirely thrown out the calculations of the manager. Instead of being divided into four even suits, like a pack of cards fresh from the maker, spring, summer, autumn, and winter, succeeding each other, as do hearts, spades, clubs, and diamonds, the days of the year have got so intimately shuffled up, that any trade or profession depending on the weather has become as hazardous as a game of rouge et noir. The consequence is, that believing July would turn up a succession of hot days, which would mightily thin theatrical audiences, managers have made no provision for the unusual popularity with which they are favoured by the inclemency of the season. Not having any novelty in readiness, they have had recourse to revivals, and these are now as much the order of the day in the theatrical world as they were lately in its opposite pole, the religious hemisphere. At the Gymnase we have had Les Faux Bonshommes; at the Vandeville, La Vie de Bohême, and later still La Tentation, produced for the return of Brindeau, whom you had an opportunity of seeing in this very piece in your French Plays. At the Porte St. Martin, a drama of Frederic Soulie's, Les Etudiants, produced at the Ambigû sixteen years ago, has been revived with very fair success, but generally speaking the very modern pieces will not bear the process of disinterment, for the lack of that deeper inspiration and more conscientious workmanship to embalm them, which the present writers neglect for ephemeral sketches of the momentary phases of an ever-changing social surface. At the Palais Royal, a veritable novelty has been produced under the title of Les Memoires de Mimi Bamboche, which, being an allusion to a certain disreputable personage, who, under the name of Rigolboche, has drawn attention to her choreographic powers, first at the public balls, and afterwards on the stage, has proved more attractive than the intrinsic merits of the piece deserve. There is nothing more offensive in the style of public manners in this country than the way in which, one by one, a set of disgraceful husseys are allowed to make their way up from the petty orgies of student life, to the front rank of fashionable notoriety, whence, if they do not ascend the pedestal of art, as they frequently do, their names are familiarly bandied about with a second-hand admiration in every rank of society. The reign of Aspasias with neither wit, learning, nor outward decency, is no longer a portent of decadence, it is the actual and accomplished fall.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

Resumé of the Season.

On Saturday the theatre really closed for the season, although it was anticipated that it would be kept open another week in consequence of the increasing success of Oberon. It could not be managed, however, some of the principal singers being imperatively summoned to their continental engagements. The performances on Saturday were for the benefit of Mlle. Titiens, and included Oberon, preceded by the "Shadow Song" from Dinorah, for Mad. Marie Cabel; the last scene from Lucia di Lammermoor, for Signor Giuglini; and the divertissement from the ballet of Orfa, for Mad. Ferraris. The audience was enormous, in spite of the thunderstorm that raged furiously and the rain that fell in absolute torrents from 6 until 9 o'clock. It is not easy to account for the triumphant reception awarded to Oberon at Her Majesty's Theatre, when it is remembered that, with Braham and Miss Paton in the cast, in the zenith of their popularity when the opera was first produced at Covent Garden with great splendour of scenery and decoration and the extremest care in the general getting up under the composer's own direction, it was a comparative failure. Has the musical taste of the public so much degenerated? Does there exist a stronger admiration for the decorative in theatricals? Is Signor Mongini a greater tenor than Braham, or Mlle. Titiens superior to Miss Paton? Does Her Majesty's Theatre enjoy a more powerful prestige than old Covent Garden before Music hurled the Drama from its pride of place? Is Mr. E. T. Smith a better or a more fortunate manager than the late Charles Kemble, or Mr. Benedict a more experienced and habile conductor than Tom Cooke of facetious memory? However these questions may be answered for or against the representation of Oberon at Her Majesty's Theatre, some things may be urged directly in its favour. It may be confidently asserted that the characters of Fatima and Oberon, so important in the score, were never before so efficiently performed as by Mad. Alboni and Signor Belart; nor had Sherasmin and Babekan been entrusted to such artists as Signor Everardi and M. Gassier. In short, the cast of Oberon at Her Majesty's Theatre was incomparable, and such an array of talent could not fail to have a powerful allurement of its own. As the music became better known too it was more liked, and this gave a durability to the attraction which neither perfect cast nor splendour of decorations could secure. That Oberon has proved one of the most triumphant successes of late years on the Italian stage cannot be denied, and indeed its production promises to constitute an epoch in the annals of the opera.

The season opened on the 10th of April with Flotow's Martha, the principal characters sustained by Mlle. Titiens, Mad. Lemaire, Signors Giuglini and Vialetti; Mlle. Pocchini appearing in a divertissement from the ballet, Fleur des Champs. That the opera was considered no eminent success may be concluded from the fact that it was not repeated during the season. On the 12th, Mad. Borghi-Mamo made her début as Leonora in La Favorita, winning immediate favour by the beauty of her voice and the charm of her style. Signor Everardi made his first appearance as Alfonso with decided success, and Signor Mongini exhibited considerable improvement in Fernando, a part somewhat out of his exact line. Il Trovatore was given on Saturday the 14th, with Mlle. Titiens, Mad. Borghi-Mamo, Signors Giuglini and Vialetti, — Mad. Borghi-Mamo achieving her second success in Azucena. On the 18th, Mlle. Piccolomini appeared as Violetta in the Traviata, it being the first of a series of six farewell performances, previous to her retirement into private life. She did not excite the same enthusiasm as formerly, though she had still many ardent admirers. On the 26th, a new opera, by Signor Campana, entitled Almina, written expressly for Mlle. Piccolomini, was produced, and created little or no sensation. In Almina, played three times, Mlle. Piccolomini took her leave of the stage, an unwise step, as was almost universally affirmed, the young prima donna having so entirely identified herself with Violetta. On the 19th of April, Rossini's Otello was produced, with Mad. Borghi-Mamo, Signor Mongini, Signor Corsi, Signor Everardi and Signor Vialetti. The lady created a profound sensation in Desdemona, more especially in the last act; and the Otello of Signor Mongini, but for its predominance to exaggerate in the passionate scenes, would have been admirable. In the music of Iago, Signor Everardi proved himself a practised Rossinian vocalist. On the 27th, Lucrezia Borgia was given, with Mlle. Titiens as the Duchess, Mad. Borghi-Mamo as Maffeo Orsini, Signor Mongini as Gennaro, and Signor Everardi as the Duke. Mlle. Titiens was grander and sang more superbly than ever in Lucrezia, and Signor Mongini was immensely applauded in Gennaro. Maffeo Orsini was not well suited to Mad. Borghi-Mamo; and Signor Everardi sang better than he acted as the Duke.

On the 5th of May, Don Giovanni was produced, with the following cast:—Donna Anna, Mlle. Titiens; Donna Elvira, Mlle. Vaneri; Zerlina, Mad. Borghi-Mamo; Don Ottavio, Signor Giuglini; Leporello, Signor Vialetti; Commendatore, Signor Castelli; and Don Giovanni, Signor Everardi. The Zerlina of Mad. Borghi-Mamo was exquisitely sung, but some found fault with the acting on the score of its lack of animation. These were principally admirers of Mlle. Piccolomini. The Don Giovanni of Signor Everardi wanted dash and devilry, and a certain nonchalance of manner. In other respects little fault could be found. Signor Everardi sang the music extremely well; was easy, at times even graceful, in his deportment; and looked the part admirably, although perhaps a little too mild of aspect for a voluptuary. An artist must be born as well as bred a Don Juan. This is why we have so few singers who can play the part. "Instinct is a great matter." Signor Vialetti sustained the part of Leporello for the first time with credit. Mlle. Vaneri gave the music of Elvira in excellent style, and Mlle. Titiens was superb as Donna Anna—one of her finest parts, certainly. Don Giovanni was repeated on the 10th and 17th, Her Majesty being present at the last performance, her only visit of the season. On the 28th it was given for the fourth time, with a change in the cast, M. Gassier appearing as Don Giovanni, Signor Everardi as Leporello, and Signor Sebastiano Ronconi as Masetto. Signor Everardi turned out the best in the exchanges, acting the part of Leporello with infinite vivacity, and singing the music to perfection.

Norma was brought out on the 8th of May for Mlle. Titiens, who exhibited immense improvement in her mastery of Bellini's music. Her singing of the "Casta Diva" was, in some respects, the most surprising we ever heard. Signor Mongini's Pollio is one of his most unexceptionable performances. Mlle. Vaneri pleased much in Adalgisa, and Signor Vialetti was grave and weighty as Oroveso. For some reason we could not make out, Norma was not played again entire during the remainder of the season, although the first scene was introduced into the performances on several occasions for Mlle. Titiens.

On the 12th of May, Rigoletto introduced Mlle. Maria Brunetti as Gilda, and Signor Sebastiano Ronconi as the Jester. The lady, who had gone through one brief campaign only at the Grand Opéra of Paris last year, had hardly experience enough to take her place beside the experienced generals of song who commanded the different forces at Her Majesty's Theatre. She was nervous, and could not do herself justice. Nobody, however, could mistake her talent, which only wants a few years to ripen it. We may anticipate by and bye having to write important bulletins about Maria Brunetti. Signor Mongini was as powerful and striking as ever in the Duke. The Rigoletto of Signor Sebastiano Ronconi had many good points, but was overdone. The opera was repeated on the 24th, after which we see or hear no more of Mlle. Brunetti during the rest of the year.

The Barbière was brought out on the 15th, but with no superlative cast. It comprised Mad. Borghi-Mamo as Rosina, Signor Belart as the Count, Signor Everardi as Figaro, Signor Vialetti as Don Basilio, and Signor Castelli as Doctor Bartolo. The lady would have been irreproachable but for some unwarrantable liberties taken with the cavatina "Una voce," and the duet "Dunque io son," both of which were almost obnubilated in a cloud of fioriture, whereby the music was spoiled and nobody the gainer. Mad. Borghi-Mamo introduced a Neapolitan air in the lesson scene, which created a furor. The Figaro of Signor Everardi was not first-rate, and the Doctor Bartolo of Signor Castelli was last-rate. Signor Belart sang Almaviva's music with wonderful fluency, but this did not compensate for the want of breadth in his singing, and his indifferent acting. Signor Vialetti, if he had not descended to caricature, would have made a capital Don Basilio. On the 12th of June, the Barbière, with M. Gassier as Figaro, was repeated, and introduced Signor Ciampi as Doctor Bartolo. The new buffo made a tremendous hit, literally taking the house by storm as the old guardian, and winning the universal suffrages of the entire press. Subsequently, in other parts, Signor Ciampi hardly reached the expectations formed of him in the old doctor; but the fact that he is very young may extenuate the sins of excess with which he has been charged. Signor Ciampi's talent is undeniable, and only requires fining down to be made pure and legitimate. It will be his own fault if he be not ere long acknowledged the most accomplished buffo of the day. On the 16th of July, the Barbière was given with another change in the cast, Mad. Alboni being Rosina, and Signor Sebastiano Ronconi, Figaro. Mad. Alboni's singing of Rossini's music is incomparable. "Una voce" falls from her lips as it fell from the inspired pen of the composer, as fresh and as complete. Signor Sebastiano Ronconi did not exactly snuff out the recollection of his renowned brother in his delineation of the barber.

Semiramide—one of the specific announcements of the prospectus—was produced on the 22d of May. Mlle. Titiens essayed the part of Semiramide for the first time, and was too anxious to do herself justice. Her singing, at times gorgeous and magnificent, was not always perfect. Her acting, however, was grand, powerful, and picturesque in the extreme. Mad. Alboni's Arsace was worthy of the music. Higher praise we could not bestow. Signor Everardi's Assur was excellent, if not great; and Signor Belart was irreproachable in the small part of Idreno. We cannot say much for the band, the chorus, and the mise-en-scène. The success was not extraordinary. If, however, Mr. E. T. Smith had expended the same money and pains in getting up Semiramide as he did in getting up Oberon, we should have had another story to tell. Semiramide was repeated on the 26th and 31st, and on the 11th of June.

The Huguenots was given for the first time on the 2d of June, with the following cast, too striking not to give in extenso:—Valentina, Mlle. Titiens; Marguerite de Valois, Mlle. Michal; Urbano, Mad. Borghi-Mamo; Raoul, Signor Giuglini; De Nevers, Signor Everardi; St. Bris, M. Gassier; Marcello, Signor Vialetti. This undoubtedly was the crowning performance of the season, and which never failed to draw immense audiences. The Huguenots was repeated on the 4th, 9th, 14th, and 27th of June, and the 17th of July. Mlle. Titiens transcended all her efforts, and indeed those of all artists we have seen in Valentina. Mlle. Michal — not named in the prospectus — proved a valuable acquisition to the company, singing the music of the Queen with surpassing brilliancy, and creating a decided sensation. Mad. Borghi-Mamo made a most fascinating page, and gave both her songs, the first particularly, with charming grace and expression. The St. Bris of M. Gassier, and the Nevers of Signor Everardi, were inestimable additions to the cast. Signor Giuglini sang the music of Raoul as exquisitely as on any former occasion, and displayed greater passion and intensity in the acting; and Signor Vialetti exhibited those bluff qualities that make his impersonation of Marcello entirely his own.

On the 5th of June, Verdi's Ernani introduced Mad. Lotti to the subscribers of Her Majesty's Theatre. She made no sensation, and the opera was not given a second time. This lady afterwards essayed her talents with better success in Gnecco's comic opera La Prova d'un Opera Seria, given on the 19th of June; and in Cimarosa's Matrimonio Segreto, produced on the 23rd. Gnecco's opera was given twice, but did not attract. Signor Ciampi sustained the part of the manager with immense spirit, but was indifferently supported. Cimarosa's opera was well cast,—Mad. Lotti appearing as Carolina; Mlle. Vaneri, Elisetta; Mad. Alboni, Fidalma; Signor Giuglini, Paolino; Signor Everardi, Count Robinson; and Geronimo, Signor Ciampi. Mad. Alboni's Fidalma was perfect; and the Count of Signor Everardi every way admirable. Signor Ciampi's Geronimo, too, was excellent, although open to criticism on the score of over elaboration. The chef-d'œuvre of the old Italian master was played twice only; and, although pleasing infinitely a select few, did not take with the general public. On the same night that La Prova d'un Opera Seria was given, a new German tenor, Herr Steger, made an appearance as Edgardo in Lucia di Lammermoor with but little success, and was heard of no more. Mlle. Titiens played Lucy for the first time, and though somewhat undersuited in the part, contrived to gain new laurels by her brilliant vocalisation no less than her energetic acting.

Of the next novelty, Oberon, brought out on the 3rd of July, we have spoken at length recently on more than one occasion. The public are familiar with the causes that led to its production at Her Majesty's Theatre; which, indeed, is entirely to be attributed to Mr. Benedict, who has all along advocated the policy of reviving the almost forgotten work of his illustrious master and having it tried on the Italian stage. The greatest success of Mr. E. T. Smith's first operatic campaign in the Haymarket is owing to Mr. Benedict, not only inasmuch as he suggested the performance of Oberon, but for the work done in adapting the music to the exigencies of Italian Opera, a far more difficult task than many think, to say nothing of the responsibility. Oberon was repeated on the 5th, 7th, and 9th of July, when it was suddenly withdrawn from the bills without explanation. The reason, however, seemed to be that Signor Mongini's engagement had expired, and, that not being solicited to stay he had departed for Italy. When the cheap nights commenced Oberon was clamorously called for, and a telegraphic message being despatched for Signor Mongini, he forthwith returned to London. Weber's opera was repeated on the 19th for Mr. Smith's benefit; and on the 21st, 23rd, 24th, 26th, and 28th, making in all nine performances—a number which might have been trebled had it been brought out early in the season.

Perhaps the most questionable act of the management during the entire season was the bringing forward on the very last night of the subscription two such renowned artists as Mad. Marie Cabel and Mad. Amalia Ferraris; the one the very head of the French school of singers, the other one of the most accomplished dancers now before the public. To make matters worse, Mad. Cabel only appeared in one scene from Dinorah, a much greater indignity than was offered to Mad. Ferraris, who appeared in only one scene from the ballet of Orfa, since the fair danseuse was the sole representative in her department, whereas the fair songstress had to contend against the impression made by Mlle. Titiens, who had preceded her in a whole opera. A few days afterwards a better opportunity was afforded Mad. Cabel of exhibing her admirable talents as Maria in the Figlia del Reggimento, a part in which she displayed the most brilliant vocalisation, and the most delightful graces as an actress. That the fair cantatrice was not altogether at her ease in Italian opera was only natural; and it is to be regretted that no more than one opportunity was given her of appearing in the part.

We omitted to state that Mlle. Claudina Cucchi, a very clever dancer, made her first appearance on the 7th of June in a new ballet entitled Adelina. Mr. Smith perhaps did not make the best of the ballet materials at his command; but the fact of his engaging first-rate talent indicated a desire on his part to do the most. A good ballet with good music is only less desirable than a good opera. We trust that next year the ballet master will make an attempt to bring forward something worthy of the prestige of the theatre.

We cannot recognise the necessity of two conductors. Why Mr. Benedict and Signor Arditi should both be retained it is impossible for us to make out. We can understand that a conductor who has other engagements to attend to might find it inconvenient to preside in an orchestra where performances are given every night, as at Drury Lane last year; but at the regular performances of three or four nights a week there can be no difficulty. Besides, as no servant can serve two masters, so no band can serve two conductors. Mr. Smith is fond of duplications; witness, the harlequinade of his Drury Lane pantomime. But, if he would desire his Italian opera to flourish, he must be simple and observe the unities. Let him eschew two conductors as he would two coachmen on the box of his chariot, if he would wish to be driven straight and escape upsetting.

MEYERBEER.

By Scudo.

Meyerbeer is certainly one of the most curious and interesting figures presented by the history of Art. A man of the North, beloved fellow disciple of Weber, who created the German opera, born of a family favoured alike by nature and fortune, Giacomo Meyerbeer had nothing to do but allow himself to live. Having two brothers, one a celebrated astronomer, the other a distinguished poet, Giacomo wished that his name, too, should be inscribed upon the book of life. After having been a remarkable virtuoso on the piano, as were also Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Mendelssohn, after having tried his powers in several dramatic compositions, in the language of his country, he was suddenly seized by an extreme love for Italian music, and breaking all bonds with the new school, which had aimed to lead away the musical genius of the German nation from the influence of the Italian masters which had triumphed since the renaissance, Meyerbeer went to the peninsula, and established again by his example the old-fashioned pilgrimage of German musicians to the pure sources of melody; for it is well to know that the pilgrimage of the German composers began as far back as the last half of the sixteenth century. Prætorius, Henri Schütz (who was a pupil of the school of Venice), Keyser, and all the dramatic composers who preceded Handel, Hasse, and Gluck, were admirers and imitators of the Italian school then reigning. It was at the close of the eighteenth century, after the death of Mozart and Haydn, that the old alliance of the two great musical schools of Europe was suddenly broken. Beethoven, Weber, Schubert, Spohr, Mendelssohn, and all the musicians who attached themselves more or less closely to the movement of renovation called the romantic, that is to say, national school, not only rejected the ancient teachings of the school which produced Palestrina, Carissimi, Scarlatti, Gabrielli, Marcello, and Jomelli, but even any imitation of its original peculiarities and processes. The last manifestation of the German romantic school is that horde of inconoclasts who pretend to extirpate from music all idea of melody, and who speak with disdain of the works of Monsieur Mozart! and who have dubbed themselves musicians of the future, because the present age is not worthy to comprehend them.

Of keen intellect, a sagacious observer, endowed with an imagination at once ardent and under restraint, ambitious of glory, yet not in too great haste to conquer it, timid and anxious in details, audacious and profound in the conception of a general plan, Meyerbeer developed in Italy a complex genius in which an adroit imitation of Rossini is discreetly mingled with his own inspirations. Such is the character of his two best Italian operas, Marguerite d'Anjou and Il Crociato, which made him a reputation that much afflicted his illustrious fellow-pupil and friend, the author of Der Freyschütz and Oberon. We may read in the correspondence of Von Weber, the letter in which he deplores the fact that Meyerbeer should have plunged deeper and deeper into the imitation of foreign forms, and that the love of success should have stifled so fine an imagination. "Was hofften wir alles von ihm! – O verfluchte Lust zu gefallen!" Nevertheless in the midst of all the applause and vivas lavished upon him by the Italian public, so warm and extravagant in the demonstrations of its satisfaction, Meyerbeer meditated (for he is always meditating) a transformation of his manner. Der Freyschütz, which had been given at Berlin in 1821, was translated into French, and represented at the Théâtre de l'Odeon, at Paris, in 1824 with a success that has become European. Stimulated doubtless by this example, by that given by Gluck in 1774, which Spontini and Rossini had followed so brilliantly, Meyerbeer also conceived the idea of essaying his genius in a country which possesses indisputably the finest and richest dramatic literature of modern nations. Robert le Diable was brought out at the opera in November, 1831. In March, 1836, he gave the Huguenots; in 1849, the Prophète; and in 1854, l'Etoile du Nord. I shall not undertake to comment on these works, which are known all over the world, and performed in all the theatres of Europe. At some future time, we shall have occasion to recur to these great scores, which are very differently rated by critics, but of which no one can deny the powerful effect upon the public. Germany, where the works of Meyerbeer are judged by artists and critics with a rigour that borders on injustice, Germany runs to the representations of Robert le Diable, the Huguenots, and the Prophète with no less enthusiasm than the Parisian public. Upon what then depends the evident and indisputable popularity of the operas of Meyerbeer? On the vigour of the colouring, the warm passion that pervades them, on certain situations powerfully rendered, on the effect of combinations, on profound inspirations that take hold of the masses, whatever may be the legitimate reservations of the man of taste who prefers the beauty that touches the heart and charms the imagination to the truth that strikes and impresses itself upon the intellect. We can say of Meyerbeer, who devotes himself above everything to the true expression of life, what the Latin poet, Propertius, has said of Lysippus, the Greek sculptor:

"Gloria Lysippo est animosa effingere signa."

It is a fine spectacle to contemplate the varieties of genius presented by the history of art. Going back no farther than our own century, and restricting the field of observation to the three nations that represent the æsthetic civilisation of Europe, the Italians, the Germans, and the French, we perceive two great changes wrought, the one by Beethoven in instrumental music, the other by Rossini in dramatic music. These two geniuses, as different from each other as are the two nations whose aspirations and sentiments they express, proceed in the conception of their work as nature proceeds: they imitate their predecessors, and as the poet says, "sur des pensers nouveaux ils font des vers antiques," for there are no lasting recollections in the intellectual world, any more than in the moral world, but those that rest upon some corner of the past. You cannot cite either a great philosopher, or a poet, or an artist, or even a real statesman whose original work is the result of an isolated force, of a purely individual activity. If it is incontestable that the first compositions of the author of the Pastoral Symphony reveal a more or less involuntary imitation of the style of Mozart, so neither does Rossini conceal the fact that he has been educated in the admiration of Haydn, Mozart, and Cimarosa, whose essences he combines and mingles on his magic palette: but this has not prevented Beethoven from becoming the most vast, most profound, and most original musical genius that has ever existed, or Rossini from being the most varied, most passionate, and most brilliant dramatic composer of his epoch. Around Beethoven, who remains unique, has arisen in Germany a group of congenial geniuses, such as Weber, Spohr, Schubert, and later Mendelssohn, who, deriving their inspiration from the same order of ideas and the same traditions, are not the less original for that, especially Weber, who first translated into the lyric drama the marvellous of the German poetry. In the train of Rossini, in the same way, has been produced a family of brilliant disciples, of whom the most original of all is Bellini, who would have risen very high, had not death cut off before his time this sweet singer of Sicily, who had known how to combine with his own yet youthful style, an imitation of the old masters, especially of Paisiello, and the manner of the great renovator of Italian opera.

While these two great revolutions in the musical art were in progress in Germany and Italy, France, which comprehends and appreciates nothing but exclusively dramatic music, remained faithful to the double tradition of Gluck and Grétry. Spontini and Mehul are disciples and eloquent imitators of the creator of Armida and the two Iphigenias, while the influence of Grétry produced at the theatre of the Opéra Comique, a swarm of delicious and charming composers of whom M. Auber is the illustrious successor. On this vast theatre, upon which Gluck, Piccini, Sacchini, Spontini, had come in succession to enlarge the domain of the lyric tragedy created by Lully and Rameau, submitting their differing genius to the severe taste of the French traditions, Rossini came also to write four great chefs d'œuvre, and terminates his glorious career by the marvel called William Tell.

It might have been thought that all the grand combinations of dramatic music were exhausted, and that after Rossini and Weber, so profoundly different from each other, a new transformation of the lyric drama was impossible. But such reasoning fails to take into account the inexhaustible fecundity of nature. Then was seen to appear a man patient, of profound genius, endowed at once with a powerful imagination and a rare delicacy of mind. German in origin, and, by the sound musical education he had received, become a little Italian by a sympathy and inclination, he is French by the logic of his eminently dramatic understanding. After several years of trials and doubts, of partial successes that give him some appreciation of his powers, he comes to Paris whither the diverse tendencies of his nature attract him, and reveals himself to the astonished world in a work Robert le Diable, which produced an immense excitement. The Huguenots, the Prophète, and l'Etoile du Nord extend and fix his reputation. I know all that an exclusive and partial taste can say of the style and often complicated manner of Meyerbeer. We have ourselves arrived at a complete understanding of his work, only through a strong desire of equity, believing, as Poussin says, that our appetites alone should not judge of the beauties of art, but our reason also. Because we are naturally inclined toward that family of delicate and harmonious geniuses, who purify reality by the ideal, and temper power by grace, the chaste, restrained, and truly divine geniuses who are called Virgil, Raphael, Racine, Mozart, shall we fail to recognize the manly and robust geniuses, who rejoice in the expression of grandeur, in the painting of vigorous characters and complicated passions, like Michael Angelo, Shakespeare, Corneille, and Beethoven?

Is not the first quality of a judge or a critic impartiality? I mean that impersonality that forgets for a moment its secret affections, its natural predilections, so as to see that only which is submitted to its judgment, and the better to comprehend the work and the artist that do not belong to the order of ideas and sentiments with which it easily sympathises. What a poor spirit would that be, which, educated in the admiration of a Titian or an Andrea del Sarto, could not comprehend a Rembrandt, that mighty colorist who loves the contest of lights and shadows, great contrasts of chiar' oscuro, types more vigorous than noble, and scenes of bourgeoise life, whence he causes to spring a profound thought and a dramatic interest.

Such are likewise the qualities of the works and genius of Meyerbeer. He excels in rendering the contrasts of extreme situations, the mêlée and shock of diverse passions in a powerful whole, in creating vigorous types, such as Bertram, Marcel, and Fidès, who engrave themselves on the imagination of all, whom no one can forget, and in filling his immense canvass with tumult, life, and light. In what modern drama can be found a finer female character than that of Valentine in the Huguenots, or a more touching scene than the duo of the third act with Marcel? Does a more pathetic air exist than the "Grâce" in Robert, or a tableau more poetic and novel than the act of the Nuns in the same great work? I say nothing of the fourth act of the Huguenots, one of the finest pages of dramatic music in existence; but the divertissement and grand scene in the church, of the Prophète as well as the military scene in l'Etoile du Nord, are these not the production of an imagination more supple and more various than it is supposed to be? Meyerbeer is reproached with being wanting in melody. Certainly he has not the melody of everybody, those commonplaces that travel through the streets, and which the old troubadors love to repeat to the accompaniment of their cracked guitars. A dramatic musician above all, Meyerbeer could say, with Gluck, to his critics, "If I have succeeded in pleasing the theatre I have attained the end I had in view, and I assure you that it concerns me little that my music does not please in a concert or in a saloon" (Life of Gluck, by Auton Schmid, p. 426). A great tactician, a colourist full of relief, Meyerbeer could also add these words which the author of Armide said to a friend, "You should know that music in its melodic part possesses very few resources. It is impossible by the mere succession of notes that form the character of melody to depict certain passions." This is what album composers and the makers of canzonets do not understand; but the public, that for thirty years has applauded the works of Meyerbeer, listens only to the emotion it experiences, and leaves to journalists the smartness they lay claim to in denying the brightness of day, and the power of so great a master.

In an age of great revolutions, of universal renovation, in which politics, poetry, science, and the arts have extended the horizon of life and enlarged the bounds of the universe, music, and especially dramatic music has also renewed its forms, vivified its colours, and multiplied the number of its characters. Between Weber and Rossini, who have a manner of proceeding so unlike, and whose immortal works express a world of ideas and sentiments so opposite, Meyerbeer has succeeded in creating for himself a profound and original personality. The opera of the Pardon de Ploërmel, far superior to l'Etoile du Nord, is in our opinion of all his works the most simple, the most agreeable, and the most freely melodious of the author of Robert and the Huguenots.

ORGANS AND ORGANISTS,—CHURCHES AND CLERGYMEN.

It is rather a remarkable thing that in England, where of late music in its variety of style has been making such progress, the mass of the community should still remain so deplorably ignorant. And not only does this epithet apply to the least-educated portion, but we regret frequently to notice how many otherwise classically-taught members of society are so totally deficient in all musical knowledge. We should like to have the opportunity of putting a few questions to those people who are in the habit of looking down upon their organists as inferior members of society. Fancy, for instance, a poor curate of £100 a year considering it infra. dig. to be seen speaking to the organist of the church in which he officiated; the latter, in all probability, enjoying three times the income and intellect of his surpliced and fancied superior. This is a state of things which certainly ought not to exist; but we fear that until a change has taken place, such as time and education can only materially effect, this unhappy state of things must call forth more pity than anger. The deplorable changes which take place in the various churches are mainly due to the absurd interference of persons who fancy they know a great deal more about music than the man whom they pay to instruct them. An organist will sometimes substitute an adaptation from one of the masters for a response which has no music or anything else in it; the consequence will be that he has an anonymous letter from some crochety old party who has never had his unhappy soul edified beyond the Old Hundredth drawled out in the most heartrending manner. And, of course, frequent occurrence of this kind of thing is sufficient to dishearten the most impervious character. A man perhaps of classical knowledge and refined musical taste is subjected to this sort of thing; which we know is only too often the case. He throws the whole thing up, even if it next door to ruined him, rather than bear the ignorant attacks of people who were not even endowed with sufficient sense to leave alone what they would probably never have the intellect to fathom and enjoy. How many would add their evidence to this? But, happily, musicians as a body know how to resent this sort of thing Contempt inflicts a deeper wound than words. Like a summer cloud that passes over and for a moment obscures the beauty of the landscape, so the discomfort of the musician is dispersed by the love for his art and his callous indifference to the opinions of those who grovel in a world below. As an instance of this sort of thing:—I knew a man who played at a church a few miles from London, who was peculiarly sensitive in this respect; and on one occasion he was performing a concluding voluntary, the nature of which required him to employ the full power of his instrument at times. One of the officials (curate or rector, no matter) passed behind him as he sat at the organ, and administered a violent thrust in the back, at the same time exclaiming, "You'll kill us!" I'll leave you to judge what sort of impression this would be likely to produce. Of course he immediately resigned the position; but a very humble apology, I believe, caused him to reverse his decision.

One great disadvantage which organists have to contend with is the amateur element—so many young men play sufficiently well to conduct a service, and who at the same time do not derive their living by it; the consequence is, that a great many churches are supplied from this source, and for several obvious reasons. In the first place, the amateur will play for the glory very often, and then the officers of the church can twist him round their thumbs, the consequence being that the musical part of the service sinks to a miserably slow state of things, such as a short journey in almost any direction will furnish you with. We could enumerate many of the large metropolitan churches as instances. Every church should set apart a portion of its income for a choir;—an organ is of course a sine qua non, but is intended chiefly as an accompaniment—no service in the Church of England can be efficiently performed without a choir—and the choir should be instructed by an organist who is a musician, and practising the noble art of which he is the representative, should command respect and admiration. We sincerely hope the age is becoming more enlightened. Let our haughty curates and rectors who know not music look upon Germany and Italy, and blush! Let them visit the foreign cathedrals and listen to the choirs, and see with what respect the organist is treated, and they will perhaps know how to value talents which are only especial gifts. No earthly toil will draw music from a soul born dead to harmony.—A. C.

The Musical World.

LONDON: SATURDAY, AUGUST 4, 1860.

A MUSICIAN whose works present many points of analogy with those of the composers mentioned by us last week as the heads of the German Romantic School is Hoffmann—far better known by his tales than by his Miserere, his Requiem, his airs and choruses for Werner's Crusade of the Baltic, or his operas of Love and Jealousy, The Canon of Milan, and Undine, which last production has always been regarded as his masterpiece. Indeed, with Undine, Hoffmann obtained his one great musical success, and it is easy to account for the marked favour with which that work was received in Berlin. In the first place, the fantastic nature of the subject was eminently suited to the peculiar genius of the composer. Then he possessed the advantage of having an excellent libretto, written by Lamothe-Fouqué, the author of the original tale; and finally, the opera was admirally executed at the Royal Theatre of Berlin. Probably not one of our readers has heard Hoffmann's Undine, which was brought out in 1817, and we believe was never revived, though much of the music enjoyed for a time considerable popularity, and the composition as a whole was warmly and publicly praised by no less a personage than Karl Maria von Weber. On the other hand, Undine, and Hoffmann's music generally, have been condemned by Sir Walter Scott, who is reported not to have been able to distinguish one melody from another, though he had of course a profound admiration for Scotch ballads of all kinds. M. Fétis, too, after informing us that Hoffmann "gave music lessons, painted enormous pictures, and wrote licentious novels (where are Hoffmann's licentious novels?), without succeeding in making himself remarked in any style," goes on to assure us, without ever having heard Undine, that although there were "certain parts" in which genius was evinced, "want of connexion, of conformity, of conception, and of plan, might be observed throughout;" and that "the judgment of the best critics was that such a work could not be classed among those compositions which mark an epoch in art."

Weber had studied criticism less perhaps than M. Fétis, but he knew more about creativeness, and in an article on the opera of Undine, so far from complaining of any "want of connexion, of conformity, of conception, and of plan," the author of Der Freischütz says: "This work seems really to have been composed at one inspiration, and I do not remember, after hearing it several times, that any passage ever recalled me for a single minute from the circle of magic images that the artist evoked in my soul. Yes, from the beginning to the end the author sustains the interest so powerfully by the musical development of his theme, that after but a single hearing one really seizes the ensemble of the work, and detail disappears in the naiveté and modesty of his art. With rare renunciation, such as can be appreciated only by him who knows what it costs to sacrifice the triumph of a momentary success, M. Hoffmann has disdained to enrich some pieces at the expense of others; which it is so easy to do by giving them an importance which does not belong to them as members of the entire work. The composer always advances, visibly guided by this one aspiration—to be always truthful, and to keep up the dramatic action without ceasing, instead of checking or fettering it in its rapid progress. Diverse and strongly marked as are the characters of the different personages, there is nevertheless something which surrounds them all; it is that fabulous life, full of phantoms, and those soft whisperings of terror which belong so peculiarly to the fantastic. Kühleborn is the character most strikingly put in relief both by the choice of the melodies, and by the instrumentation which, never leaving him, always announces his sinister approach.* This is quite right, Kühleborn appearing, if not as destiny itself, at least as its appointed instrument. After him comes Undine, the charming daughter of the waves, which, made sonorous, now murmur and break in harmonious roulades, now powerful and commanding, announce her power. The arietta of the second act, treated with rare and subtle grace, seems to me to be a thorough success, and to render the character perfectly. Hildebrand, so passionate yet full of hesitation, and allowing himself to be carried away by each amorous desire, and the pious and simple priest, with his grave choral melody, are the next in importance. In the back-ground are Bertalda, the fisherman and his wife, and the duke and duchess. The strains sung by the suite of the latter breathe a joyous, animated life, and are developed with admirable gaiety, thus forming a contrast with the sombre choruses of the spirits of the earth and water, which are full of harsh, strange progressions. The end of the opera, in which the composer displays, as if to crown his work, all his abundance of harmony in the double chorus in eight parts, appears to me grandly conceived and perfectly rendered. He has expressed these words—'Good night to all the cares and to all the magnificence of the earth'—with true loftiness, and with a soft melancholy which, in spite of the tragic conclusion of the piece, leaves behind a delicious impression of calm and consolation. The overture and the final chorus which enclose the work here give one another the hand. The former, which evokes and opens the world of wonders, commences softly, goes on increasing, then bursts forth with passion; the latter is introduced without brusqueness, but mixes itself up with the action, and calms and satisfies it completely. The entire work is one of the most spiritual that these latter times have given us. It is the result of the most perfect and intimate comprehension of the subject, completed by a series of ideas profoundly reflected upon, and by the intelligent use of all the material resources of art; the whole rendered into a magnificent work by beautiful and admirably developed melodies."

M. Berlioz has said of Hoffmann's music, adding, however, that he had not heard a note of it, that it was "de la musique de littérateur." M. Fétis, having heard about as much of it, has said a great deal more; but, after what has been written about Hoffmann's principal opera by such a master and judge as Karl Maria von Weber, neither the opinion of M. Fétis nor of M. Berlioz can be of any value on the subject. The merit of Hoffmann's music has probably been denied because the world is not inclined to believe that the same man can be a great writer and also a great musician. Perhaps it is this perversity of human nature that makes us disposed to hold M. Berlioz in so little esteem as an author; and we have no doubt that there are many who would be equally averse to according M. Fétis any tolerable rank as a composer.

WHILE on the subject of pianoforte composers who have written not for a country or for an age, but for the world and for all time, we may allude to one who has done perhaps more legitimate service in developing the bonâ fide mechanism of the instrument than any predecessor, contemporary, or follower. Next to Moscheles (by many placed before him—we cannot but think in some respects unreasonably), comes Jean Nepornell Hummel, one of the most talented, voluminous, and classical of all the pianoforte composers. Hummel—be not startled, reader—was not an original genius, although a long habit of composing endowed him with an unmistakeable peculiarity of manner. But Hummel was a musician, heart and soul—one of the right sort, unbending, comprehensive, and enthusiastic. Educated under excellent masters, he soon acquired the art of writing with ease, while the strict school in which he had been nourished, regulated his taste in the true direction. Hummel was a more learned musician than Moscheles, although he did not possess Moscheles' originality. His contributions to the art were not less numerous and valuable. Both have been of inestimable worth in directing the studies of pianists, and both were endowed with a facility which promptly seconded these intentions. Hummel's concertos owe much more than is generally admitted to those of Mozart, Dussek, and Steibelt; but they abound in a variety of graceful passages that exclusively belong to their author. It should be noted here that Mozart anticipated Beethoven, and that Beethoven did not surpass Mozart in the symmetrical form which, although Haydn had imparted to the symphony, was, before Mozart's time, wholly strange to the concerto. Mozart, therefore, did as much for the concerto as Haydn had done for the symphony and sonata—for, be it remarked, while in the lucid arrangement of ideas which appear and return in reasonable and proper places, the consistent balance of relative keys being preserved, the concerto is but a branch of the parent SONATA,* yet it still presents, even in the examples left us by Mozart and Beethoven, a marked difference of plan.†

While in the tuttis, or orchestral preludes‡, Hummel (like Moscheles) followed Mozart's symmetrical arrangement, he also (like Moscheles) overlooked that peculiarity which endows Mozart's concertos with such unity and completeness. Let us explain. In Mozart's concertos the three solos, of which, like the majority of concertos, they are composed, are continually accompanied in the orchestra by one or both the principal themes, separate or in conjunction, elaborate and worked out to the end. We find little of this in Hummel, although occasional glimpses are not wanting; but a complete development of the themes is never attempted, except in the tuttis. For this reason, without alluding to his higher genius, Mozart not only wrote his concertos as though he had improved upon the models of Hummel, who lived after him (instead of Hummel half-rising to the models left by Mozart), but wrote them, as it were, side by side with Beethoven, the great developer himself—even he who gave Mendelssohn the first hint§ of dispensing altogether with the tutti, an evident superfluity.‖

Nevertheless, devoid of pure invention as was Hummel, his concertos are fine productions, indispensable to the completion of a musical education, beautiful and interesting as music, independent of their influence and of all arbitrary considerations. No pianoforte writer ever produced a greater variety of new and elegant passages than Hummel, who, we need hardly remind our readers, was one of the greatest pianists of his day; and as an impromptu player, or improvisateur, had few equals, and fewer superiors. (This reminds us that we have neglected to speak of the wonderful powers of improvisation possessed by Moscheles). The miscellaneous works of Hummel—studies, fantasias, &c.—would of themselves form an interesting library. But, to come to an end with him, his sonatas for pianoforte solus are almost as rare (master as he needs must have been of the sonata-form) as those of Moscheles. We have never seen more than five—that in F minor (the best—a chef-d'œuvre); that in D, which, containing a scherzo and trio, assumes the distinction of the real grand sonata; that in E flat, dedicated to Haydn; that in C; and that in F sharp minor, which, though styled a sonata, is, more strictly speaking, a fantasia. But these alone are enough to immortalise Hummel, had he not produced so many and such variety of works in another form as to place him among the most fecund and admirable of musicians.

M. DELAPORTE has not resigned the directorship of the Orpheonists of France, but merely that of some choral society in Paris. Tant mieux. It would be about as easy to replace Garibaldi in another sphere of action as M. Delaporte in his.

* We cannot too frequently insist that the sonata is the model for the symphony, quartet, and all the larger form of instrumental music.

† The three specimens of the concerto left us by Mendelssohn, in which the sonata form is perfectly developed, have been frequently described.

‡ The tutti, according to Mozart, is a kind of synopsis of the whole first movement, laid out like the first movement of a sonata.

§ In the concerto in G major.

‖ Beethoven, in the G concerto, begins at once with the pianoforte (like Mendelssohn in all his concertos), but, after a few arpeggios, he introduces a long tutti. This leads to the conviction that the idea of abandoning the tutti had entered into the ever-inventing brain of the composer, but that he almost immediately gave it up as untenable. The great concerto in E flat presents the same apparent discrepancy.

MR. E. T. SMITH AND HIS MANAGEMENT.

(From the Morning Post.)

Nearly four months ago Mr. Smith startled the town by the publication of a prospectus adorned by such an array of celebrated names, and so rich in brilliant and attractive promises, that not a few of those initiated in the mysteries of operatic management thought the new director must be possessed by the demon of romance, or that desire and achievement, intention and accomplishment, had become so completely mixed up in his mind as to appear to him one and the same thing. In other words, the fulfilment of all Mr. Smith's splendid promises was considered by many to be a downright impossibility. A vast theatre was to be redecorated. At least two grand operas (Rossini's Semiramide, and Weber's Oberon), both requiring extensive and costly scenic illustration, were to be magnificently placed upon a stage notoriously the most inconvenient to be found in any large theatre: and which, when the prospectus for the past season appeared, was destitute of almost every requisite mechanical appliance, and altogether out of working order. The old dilapidated concert-room, long the abode of spiders, rats, and mice, and "such small deer," was to be converted into a "bijou theatre," while a company of celebrated singers and dancers, so numerous that it was difficult to see how they could all be brought forward in a manner worthy of their artistic positions, further increased the swelling announcement. Then we were to have such admirable conductors as Mr. Benedict and Signor Arditi, such principal violins as Herr Molique and Mr. Blagrove, a first-rate band, and a first-rate chorus. Many, as we have said, doubted the possibility of all this being duly accomplished; and yet the old house was altered much for the better, and redecorated in a very splendid and costly manner in time for the opening night (April 10). The "bijou theatre" was finished about the middle of the season, though it has not yet been publicly used. The two promised operas have been given with all the scenic effect which could reasonably be looked for in such a locality, and the following artistes have appeared:—Vocalists—Mlle. Titiens, Mad. Borghi-Mamo, Mlle. Piccolomini, Mad. Lotti della Santa, Mad. Marie Cabel, Mlle. Brunetti, Mad. Lemaire, Mlle. Vaneri, Mlle. Louise Michal, and Mad. Alboni; Signor Giuglini, Signor Vialetti, Signor Belart, Signor Everardi, Signor Aldighieri, Signor Gassier, Signor Corsi, Signor Ciampi, Signor Sebastiano Ronconi, Signor Castelli, Herr Steger, and Signor Mongini. Dancers—Mlle. Pocchini, Mlle. Cucchi, Mlle. Morlacchi, Mlle. Pasquale, Mlle. Amalia Ferraris, M. Durand, M. Chapuy, &c.

For the most part then the director was enabled to keep faith with the public, the only shortcomings being in the orchestral and choral departments; serious failings, certainly, though by no means irremediable. Mr. Smith has himself, with laudable frankness, publicly made allusion to the weak points of his establishment, and in acknowledging the necessity of a reformation, promises to do his best to accomplish it, at the same time warning his supporters that the task is fraught with difficulties. These difficulties are not so great as Mr. Smith (who probably knows but little of such matters) has perhaps been taught to believe. It were preposterous to suppose that a vast city like London can only yield a sufficiently large number of orchestral performers to furnish one first-rate band. Plenty of capital instrumentalists, whether English or foreign, are always to be had in the metropolis; but the power of selection should be in competent hands, and remuneration to the executants must be enough to attract efficient professors, and make it worth their while to attend rehearsals, without which a satisfactory ensemble is not to be looked for. There is no reason why the fact should not be publicly stated that the salaries of orchestral performers are, for the most part, very low—shamefully so, indeed, when compared with the enormous sums paid to singers. There is no instrument that it takes not time and pains to learn, not to speak of that Heaven-born genius which the instrumentalist—if he really excel in his vocation—must possess in at least an equal degree with the singer. The vocal and histrionic arts doubtless require also long and assiduous study; but surely it will be seen that the rewards are out of all proportion when it is shown that where the celebrated singer receives £80 per night, the equally celebrated player gets, under the happiest circumstances, £5—more frequently £3, £2, or even less. These are the highest terms paid, we believe, at a certain great lyric establishment, the distinctive character and permanent success of which are, in a large degree, ascribable to the attractions of the magnificent orchestra. With such remuneration the professors are satisfied. Everything is in the hands of a respected conductor. Rehearsals are duly attended, and the results are always most honourable and valuable to the management. But elsewhere is it not otherwise? Are the members of Mr. Smith's band equally well remunerated? Do they duly attend rehearsals? Is the engagement and management of them entrusted to one or two conductors who must necessarily be responsible to the public for the public acts of those under, or supposed to be under, their control? We can answer these questions unhesitatingly in the negative, and must consequently conclude that until the system of last season be "reformed altogether," the new brightness which Mr. Smith has thrown about Her Majesty's Theatre will remain heavily clouded. It is not, of course, probable that a manager who is ready to pay £1,000 per month to certain artists, and has proved himself willing and able on so many occasions to risk large sums in catering for the public, would suddenly be seized with a fit of parsimony directly the question of fiddles, oboes, clarionets, &c. came under his consideration. Far more credible is it that Mr. Smith did what he was advised to do in this respect—that he wished to do the best possible, but, being ill-advised, committed errors, which he will have leisure to repent of and atone for between this and next season. Our counsel may be given in a few words. Let Mr. Smith, first of all, employ a thoroughly competent person to select orchestral performers, and pay those performers enough to ensure their punctual attendance (under a penalty) at every necessary rehearsal. Let the same plan be put in force with respect to the chorus, and we will answer for the result. Here, however, our objections are at an end. If all the new performers, introduced experimentally of course by Mr. E. T. Smith, did not turn out valuable acquisitions, we do not see that any blame can attach to the director, unless the public have a right to consider him less fallible than any other theatrical manager.

Madame Jullien's Benefit.—It is gratifying to find that the English public have not forgotten the man who did so much for the advancement of his art and the cultivation of the musical taste of the age, for we cannot but think that a very large portion of the 15,000 persons who were at the Surrey Gardens on Tuesday evening were influenced by the desire of doing some good for the widow of one who was deservedly the most popular, as he was the most talented of caterers for the amusement, and let us also add the elevation, of his patrons. Fortunately the weather was favourable, and consequently those who could not obtain room in the large hall, which was crammed to suffocation, were not inconvenienced by having to remain in the open air, and listen to the strains of the performers, mellowed by the distance which in this instance might have "lent enchantment," if not "to the view," at least to something else, for the heat and the crowding must have been positively awful to those in the area of the building—it was bad enough in the first circle, where standing room was just as much at a premium as everywhere else. Of course we cannot be expected to notice in detail a programme which numbered some thirty-five pieces, and lasted from half-past six until—well, we cannot say when, for we certainly did not stay it all out. The entertainment was divided into four parts—the first orchestral, conducted by Mr. Alfred Mellon and Prince Galitzin (whose Surprise Polka was encored by the way), comprising the overture to Semiramide, one movement of Mendelssohn's A minor symphony, Jullien's Warsaw Varsoviana and Last Waltz—the latter for the first time of performance, and every way worthy the reputation of its lamented composer, the air charming and eminently dansante. The second and third parts entirely vocal, embraced a variety of songs, ballads, &c., all of which were received with a greater or less degree of noisy enthusiasm too closely bordering upon turbulence to be pleasant. Indeed the exuberance which seems to be so strong a characteristic of a transpontine audience was at times so very fully developed as to threaten to interrupt the progress of the concert altogether. Not that anybody seemed to have the slightest idea of what they wanted, beyond an insane desire for displaying their strength of lung and vigour of arm. Painfully embarrassing it must have been to some of the more nervous of the vocalists, and in one or two instances the effects were distressing alike to singers and the more rational portion of the hearers. Miss Kate Ranoe, Mlle. Enrichetta Camille, Mlle. Brunetti, Miss Poole, Miss Palmer, Mrs. Weiss, Mad. Louisa Vinning, Mlle. Parepa, Mad. Alboni, M. Gassier, Mr. Weiss, Mr. Patey, and Mr. Sims Reeves, with the Vocal Association conducted by Mr. Benedict, contributed some of their most popular pieces, of which it is sufficient to say that Mad. Alboni's superb rendering of the aria "Ah! quel giorno" from Semiramide, was encored, and the tyrolienne from Betly, "In questo semplice," substituted; that the brindisi "Il segreto" evoked a furore, and was repeated with if possible greater effect, the fair artiste retiring amidst the waving of hats and handkerchiefs, and a perfect uproar of delight. Of course Mr. Sims Reeves was compelled to repeat his songs "They say that all things change," by Vincent Wallace, and Balfe's "I love you"—which latter bids fair to become one of the most favourite songs of the day. Nor were these the only encores of the evening, "I dreamt that I dwelt in marble halls," by Mlle. Parepa, being given a second time, and "Barney O'Hea," by Miss Poole, redemanded, in lieu of which we had "Wapping Old Stairs." Besides these we must especially mention Miss Kate Ranoe's very intelligent and expressive reading of Herr Reichardt's popular song, "Thou art so near and yet so far." Of the fourth part of the concert, in which the bands of the Grenadier, Coldstream, and Scots Fusilier Guards were announced to appear, we can say nothing, but have no doubt that Jullien's English and British Army Quadrilles afforded as much delight as they used when conducted by their composer, and the Last Waltz repeated to the gratification of the multitude, who seemed to evince no desire to quit the "gay and festive scene and halls of dazzling light."

CAN PARIS PAY ITS ARTISTS?*

The Revue et Gazette des Théâtres quoted, in its number of Thursday last, a portion of the article published by us on the London theatres, and in which we directed attention to the excellence of the lyrical companies at Covent Garden and Her Majesty's, where it is not uncommon to see artists of the first-class consent to undertake secondary parts, while at Paris the same artists would evince less alacrity for such acts of complaisance, however precious those acts may be for obtaining a more brilliant performance of the masterpieces of the classical as well as the modern repertory. Our contemporary, who had already stated this fact, which a recent opportunity enabled us to corroborate de auditu, appends the following reflections to our remarks:—

"Paris will never be so fortunate as to be able to offer the public that assemblage, in one and the same work, of first-rate artists which must be the dream of all those who know how to appreciate a masterpiece. Is it not a certain fact that such a superior manner of rendering the secondary parts must throw upon the masterpiece additional light, and impart perfectly new value to details which mediocrity leaves in the shade?

"To what causes is to be attributed this accidental superiority of London over Paris? Why do the artists whom Paris has reared do on the other side of the Channel things which it would be impossible to make them do on this? Why can the London theatres have entire companies composed of first-rate artists, like an army in which each soldier should possess the value of a colonel? Why? To these questions we believe there is only one answer, and that is: London can pay and Paris cannot."

We deny in toto this assertion; it is our conviction that Paris can pay, relatively speaking, quite as well as London, only we must add that London knows better how to pay, and how to obtain a higher return for its money than Paris. Our neighbours, again, possess greater talent in speculation; they do not buy a pig in a poke; they travel themselves, or get others to travel for them, in order to procure certain information as to the merit of the various artists. When the latter are once engaged, they are obliged to renounce their caprices, their exacting demands, and all idea of embarrassing the management; the performers must no more be backward in their duty than the treasurer in his, and it is thus that theatrical enterprises become profitable.

In Paris, negociations are opened with a superior artist at the last moment, and, naturally, he speculates on the need there is of his assistance; as in nearly every case he is called upon to support unaided the responsibility of a piece, he is the more intractable with the management the more indispensable he feels himself to be; so that managers become the subordinates of the persons they have engaged, which is the contrary to what it ought to be in sound logic.

It is said that in London the aristocracy does not care for expense; high Parisian society also can be generous, when it has sufficient reasons for manifesting its liberality; but, to speak the truth, we think it does not enjoy too many occasions of doing so. Now, connoisseurs in artistic banquets cannot consider a table properly served when it boasts of only one and the same dish, and Paris is generally restricted to this congruity of repast. If, in a theatre with opera and ballet, there is a first tenor, we shall have to regret the absence of the prima donna; if there is a superior barytone, the contralto will be wanting; in the choreographic department, the first danseuse will absorb everything, and all the rest will be left to chance, without any attention being devoted to that completeness of ensemble, and that artistic result which should be attained. Among us, therefore, with that good taste which is generally acknowledged, with the intelligence necessary for doing things well, and with numberless resources, we find only incomplete companies, which, from their very incompleteness, are incapable of producing a piece in such a manner as to show it off to the best advantage. This is not the fault of the public; it is the fault of the managers, who do not set about their work with sufficient earnestness; people among us have a habit of being contented with something merely approximative; they are prodigal in one particular and miserly in all the rest; what is wanting is that good sound sense which should preside over a better distribution of our disposable forces; for things to be different, and for the comparison to be always to our advantage, we should only have to will it; but, whether from presumption or from carelessness, we do not know how to will, and thus we arrive at the results we have pointed out.

To speak only of the Opera, people assert it could never pretend to compete in magnificence with the English managers, who may with impunity, it is added, increase their expenses in order to augment their profits in the same proportion. This reasoning is not, perhaps, correct. As we have said, we were present at Italian operatic performances in London; neither Covent Garden nor Her Majesty's display more magnificence, we do not say munificence, than our Académie Impériale de Musique. Only, on beginning his season, Mr. Gye knows to within a poun the sums he has to receive, and, allowing for his profit, the sums he can spend. He harmonises his budget, and does nothing at hazard; an example we recommend for adoption by our first lyric theatre. It has been thought right to refer to the precarious situation of a speculative manager, who, after having attracted public attention to the theatre he managed, was obliged to retire a few months since on account of the positive losses he incurred. We do not think the example selected is a good one. M. Carvalho—for he is the person alluded to—overstepped, at the Théâtre Lyrique, the limits to which, by his patent, he was restricted. Certainly we are obliged to him, as an artist, for the performances he presented to the public; but we do not award him, as a manager and a commercial individuality, the same meed of praise. He attempted more than he was obliged to attempt, and more than was asked of him. He entered into competition with the Opéra and the Opéra Comique simultaneously, and such was not the position Government had allotted him, and charged him to maintain. He necessarily, therefore, arrived at the result, materially to be regretted, which has been mentioned, and to which he advanced almost consciously, we believe. If it be said that it would have been just to have furnished him with the means of retrieving his losses, we agree; but he must not be put in comparison with what is done in London, particularly at the Italian Opera, because the situation is not at all the same, and because there is not the slightest logical or rational connection between the two cases.

We now come to the liberty of fixing the prices. This is an entirely special question, and, as far as we are concerned, we should have no objection to its being settled as our contemporary desires. Our readers know that we have always been partisans of everything which could extend the circle of liberty within which theatrical industry moves. Now we should not offer any opposition to a system which permitted a trader in Paris or the departments to sell his goods at the value he thought fit to put upon them; but it strikes us that, in this particular, the discussion is going from the ground which it appeared at first to have selected, and that it is not by coursing two hares at once that we can hope to catch one.

Consequently, we maintain what we said in the first lines of this article; we reply to the question thus put: Can Paris pay its artists as well as London can pay them? Yes, most certainly. Can it demand the same services of them? Yes. Does it render their life more easy and their reputation greater? Yes again. Therefore, the position of an artist in France is in no way inferior to that he is able to obtain in England.

At present, let every manager be allowed to fix the prices of admission as he pleases; we can see no objection, nay, we even think that if he has a right to do this, he may advance his own interests, those of the public, and those of all true artists simultaneously. As matters are carried on now-a-days, we confess we are in no way surprised at the indifference of the spectators, while the reduced, or insufficient prices, which form one cause of complaint, are, but too frequently, superior to the quality of the dramatic merchandise offered for sale. For some time past, however, the class-papers and the superior authorities have been considering the modifications required in the present mode of managing theatrical enterprise; a great number of useful observations have already been evoked, and we cannot believe they will be entirely without effect. As a matter of course, the persons interested will be brought to leave the domain of theoretical discussion, and proceed to practical experiment, and we have great faith in what has already been done. We rejoice, therefore, that the few lines we wrote on our return from London produced, from the Gazette des Théâtres, the article to which we have replied. On this occasion, as on every other, we have found the journal edited by our friend Denis ready to maintain the cause of progress, a cause to which, like him, we have devoted the little experience, and, most certainly, all the energies we possess.

Scraps from Abroad.—(From various sources.)—Signor and Signora Tiberini have proceeded to fulfil an engagement at Trieste. Signor Pancani, who is engaged for next March by M. Calzado, has also left Paris. He will spend a week at Aix-la-Chapelle, whence he will proceed to Naples, where he is engaged for the present.——Signor P. P. Boccomini, one of the principal members of Mad. Ristori's company, has died at Amsterdam. The management of the Riccardi Theatre at Bergamo has been confided, for the duration of the fair, to the Brothers Marzi, who will give performances of opera buffo and ballet. Some papers have spread the report that the management of the Theatres Royal, Naples, would perhaps pass, ere long, into the hands of Malvezzi, the tenor. Signor Lorenzoni and Signora Gavetti Reggiani have been engaged for next autumn at the Communal Theatre of Bologna, the former as first dancer, and the latter as prima donna.——The Neopolitan journal Il Diorama has changed its title, and is now called L'Italia.——Among the recent engagements for Constantinople may be mentioned those of Signor A. Bianchi, first tenor; Fiorini, bass; Mattioli, buffo; and Signora Galli, prima donna assoluta.——Signor Masini, first bass, is at present in Milan, whence he will soon return to St. Petersburgh, where he is engaged for the fourth time.——M. H. Montplaisir is engaged as ballet master for the Carneval of 1860-61 at the Carlo Felice Theatre, Genoa. The fresh choreographic work produced will be entitled Benvenuto Cellini, on which the management will spare no expense. Verdi's Trovatore is being given simultaneously at Gerbino and the Alfieri Theatre, Turin.——The vocal and instrumental concert of the pupils at the Milan Conservatory took place on the 8th July.——The opening of the Valle Theatre, at Rome, for the summer season was to have taken place on the 30th June, with the Masnadieri. After the last rehearsal, however, Corsi the tenor fell ill. The part of Carlo was immediately given to the other tenor of the establishment, Signor Gianini, and the opening fixed for the 3rd July, but, at the first general rehearsal, Signor Gianini was compelled, by an intestinal attack, to take to his bed. On this, application was made to Signor Negrini, who happened to be still at Rome, and that gentleman appeared in the part on the 7th ult.; Signora Teresa Armelini was the prima donna.——Mlle. Sarotta is engaged at the Oriente Theatre, Madrid.——Signoras Pancani, Negrini, Coletti; Signoras Staffenone, Vera-Lorini, and Mlle. Boschetti, première danseuse, are engaged at the San Carlo, Naples.

My mother tongue, how dear thy tone,
With all my life how bound;
Ah! were my heart of steel or stone
'Twould soften at thy sound.

Thou teachest this proud neck to bow,
As might a mother's arm;
With soft caress thou smooth'st my brow,
And hush'd is all alarm.

Again I feel a little child;
The vain world fades from sight,
And all as spring-tide's breezes mild
I feel thy healing might.

Once more my grandsire bids me kneel;
Come, child, thy prayer say,
"Our father" I repeat, and feel
Once more what 'tis to pray.

From deep within my spirit calls,
My heart pours forth its pain,
Till heaven's peace upon it falls,
And all seems well again.

My mother tongue, so right, so sound,
Of God thou break'st the fear,
The simple words "my father" sound
A prayer in mine ear.

No music seems to me so fine,
Nor nightingale's love call;
Full oft thou'st made the gushing brine
Adown these cheeks to fall.

MISS ANNA WHITTY.

Our readers will perhaps recollect that at Mr. Benedict's annual concert, in St. James's Hall, in 1859, Miss Anna Whitty, a young lady the daughter of the editor and proprietor of the Liverpool Journal and Liverpool Daily Post, created a most decided sensation by the admirable style in which she sang "Bel raggio" from Semiramide, displaying in her vocalisation a refined and cultivated style, and a voice of most charming sweetness and brilliancy. Though Miss Anna Whitty has only once sung in England, she has for several years been pursuing a most prosperous career in Central and Northern Italy, in spite of the political troubles of that region, and the Florentine, Milanese, and Livornese papers lately received by us give most glowing accounts of Miss Whitty's operatic performances.

The Buon Gusto of Florence says, "Anna Whitty is a young and fair daughter of England, who has made Italy a second country, and Italian art a passion and a religion. Distinguished for education, manners, instruction, and talent, she perfected her vocal powers in Florence, under a first-rate master; her studies were not of that superficial order which the greater part of the singers of the present day pass through. She rendered herself familiar with the works of our best composers, and preferred, with the instinct of good taste, the classical creations of our immortal maestri. Mlle. Whitty has by this gained the gratitude of our land of song—it is for this she merits renown and honour. She made her début at the Theatre-Royal Pagliano, at Florence, some three years ago, having previously held the post of prima donna at Malta, for two seasons. From that moment her career was assured, and each theatre where she appeared was for her a new field of glory, where she obtained fresh and enviable triumphs. Those who have not heard this artiste will ask us—what are the gifts she possesses, and what are the powers that have enabled her to call forth the enthusiasm of the most critical audiences? The reply is easy; but before we decipher the letter itself, let us first examine the envelope. Mlle. Whitty has a commanding presence and a pleasing countenance. As we have said before, her manners and deportment on the stage are eminently noble and distinguished. Her voice is not robust, but is rich and full in tone, with an excellent suavity and sweetness, of great compass, most flexible, and, above all, most sympathetic, being of that timbre that does not besiege but descends to the heart, filling the soul with the various emotions of tenderness and melancholy. Added to this is her rare trillo and perfection of method, her extraordinary agility with which she overcomes the most difficult passages, performing them spontaneously, and without an effort; her singing is an embroidery; difficulties become for her a mere plaything—a pastime. Mlle. Whitty, as a "lyric actress," is capable of interpreting any work; but it is in classical compositions, particularly those of Rossini, in which she most excels, and for which she seems specially created; it is in these chefs d'œuvre her genius developes itself, where her trillo is most displayed. For her there must be obstacles, difficulties, and then she is seen gliding, flying, playing among a million of notes the most complicated and perilous, with the same rapidity, ease, and security, as the butterfly frolics among flowers. Added to this trillo, the grace, the charm that accompanies it, producing an ensemble that almost reaches perfection. Mlle. Whitty's powers as an actress equal those she possesses as a singer. Her gestures are as graceful as they are moderate; each movement betrays intelligence and refinement. She never forgets the part she represents, becoming herself embodied in the character she interprets. As we have said in a former number, Mlle. Whitty must ever become the delight of whateyer public and the ornament of whatever theatre she may appear at. She is at present at Leghorn, where, according to her custom, she excites that critical public to the highest enthusiasm, the theatre resounding with acclamations at every morceau she executes. In honouring this artiste we honour Italian art, of which she is so faithful an interpreter. Such is the admiration—such is the esteem we publicly offer to the distinguished merit of Anna Whitty."

The Scintille of Milan, speaking of the performance of La Cenerentola, says, "It is needless to tell you that Mlle. Whitty, in the principal part, was immense; and, in fact, it would be difficult to find a singer of the present day who can with so much ability execute the difficult music of Rossini, and who joins to the most perfect intonation the rarest talent and musical knowledge. It is impossible to say in what particular morceaux she was especially applauded, being almost equally so throughout the whole opera; but in the famous rondo, 'Non più mesta,' she touched the very sublimity of art."

The Leghorn correspondent of the Milan Gazetta dei Toatri is equally enthusiastic:—"I thought the lovely music, 'Cenerentola,' old, out of fashion! I was decidedly in the wrong. And do you know to whom I owe my conversion? To Mlle. Anna Whitty, the charming artiste, who seems to have been created on purpose to sing the melodies of our immortal Rossini. Her voice is pure, sympathetic; her agility marvellous, and her method perfect. They encored the rondo, and the public, delighted with the youthful cantatrice, demanded a third repetition of the classical morceau. Eight times at least was Mlle. Whitty recalled before the curtain."

Making all allowances for the exaggerated style of Italian enthusiasm, we have reason to believe that Miss Whitty is an artiste of whom we may, as Englishmen, be proud, and we hope soon she will have an opportunity of administering to the pleasures of her own countrymen and countrywomen.

THE DRAMATIC COLLEGE.

(From the Daily Telegraph.)

THERE is a sort of affliction to which human nature is liable, and which Gray used to call The White Melancholy. The patient never laughs or dances, but is in a perpetual state of satisfaction with himself. This, we are bound to think, is the state into which some of our moralists have fallen. The world is offensive to them, but, to do them justice, they are highly condescending to the world. Both, therefore, get on better than might have been expected. But now and then an affair turns up beyond the endurance of charity itself; and such a business, as certain persons assume, was the late festival at the Crystal Palace in aid of the Royal Dramatic College Fund. We had originally imagined that the day passed off balmily and genially enough, that the fun was excellent and the fraud enticing, that the lady stall-keepers were so many living fascinations, and the gentlemen who lent their aid better levellers than any Jacobins on record. But it seems that the whole matter was a public perfidy, and that society is to blame for having smiled in presence of a sham which the genus Mawworm is resolved henceforward never more to tolerate. The great community which reads newspapers and pays attention to passing events will probably ask to what on earth we are alluding.

Who has said, or written, or suggested a word against the Dramatic Fancy Fair? No one, we allow, who is likely to command more than a "class" audience, and yet the impeachment has been delivered, and the actresses who exerted themselves so pleasantly and benevolently are exhorted to kiss the rod. A contemporary, which assumes the functions of "the accredited organ of dramatic morals"—whatever that may mean—has untied its lictor's bundles and knouts the entire theatrical profession roundly. We do not believe that the smart will be very severe or that the green-room population will turn pale under this eminently righteous censure; but is there, in reality, a syllable of truth in the charge thus flung at random against the promoters of a most praiseworthy movement? The Dramatic College Festival at the Crystal Palace was, in fact, an event which very agreeably illustrated the relations at present existing between the theatrical profession and society at large. The barriers have been broken down; the Mawworms are now exceptional beings; it is known and acknowledged by all, except the bigoted and stupid, that many a true English lady and English gentleman treads the stage. This result having been attained, what possible objection was there to a mingling of actors, actresses, and the best classes of the public at Sydenham in order to assist in the development of a great philanthropic purpose?

The Dramatic College, we are told, issued begging advertisements. Does not every hospital, every asylum, every shelter of the widow and the fatherless, every charitable institution in the kingdom do the same? But, it is added, the public were asked for contributions to the stalls of articles to be sold for the benefit of the fund. Was there anything unusual in that? It has been done over and over again, and might be done for the Brompton Consumption Hospital, the Soldiers' Daughters' Home, the Hospital for Epileptic and Paralytic Patients, and the highest ladies in the land have set the example. Now, however, we reach the centre of bitterness and opprobium. The world, it is complained, was invited to see "actresses with their rouge off." And pray where is the sin which is denounced in these withering terms? Are actresses never to wear the costume or appear in the characters of ordinary ladies? Must they be shut up for ever in the enchanted palace of the drama, amid mock diamonds, paint, and spangles? Are they to be blamed because, volunteering to assist in obtaining relief for their less fortunate brethren and sisters, they were affable on a day of general pleasantry—because they smiled and gossipped—because they were, as they cannot help being, graceful and fascinating? Of this we are sure, that never was a public festival more creditably conducted, and that the ladies who took part in it did honour to themselves and their profession. Still, there are other accusations in store. The actresses, we learn, charged exhorbitant prices for trumpery. Did the most ardent disciple of economy go to the Crystal Palace with the view of making a bargain? Did he expect to buy a serviceable pair of slippers for one shilling and tenpence, or a good sound mustard-pot, electro-plated, and get change for half-a-crown? If so, he misunderstood the nature of the fête, which was not an auction, but an opportunity for benevolence to display itself cordially, and without that austere ostentation which is recommended by our new censors of the stage. Give money with a black-gloved hand, but hand it over to an honorary treasurer instead of placing it happily in the palm of a handsome missionary who, presiding at a stall, accords you a baby's shoe and one farthing's worth of ultra tooth-powder in reward of your guinea. This is extortion, sayeth the assailant, who probably went to buy and not to give; but therein lies the mistake.

It is perfectly right to sneer. To sneer is a privilege of the age. Without it we might all be sceptics. Therefore we have no quarrel with any one for asking why actors and actresses should busy themselves in obtaining funds for the maintenance of a Dramatic College. All we question is the sanity of the protest. Why, who in the world should busy themselves, if not actors and actresses? Men of letters largely aid in supporting the Literary Fund; our naval and military charities are mainly dependant on the donations of officers; indeed, the principle of almost every similar institution is at bottom that of a mutual providence society. The licensed victuallers, the bootmakers, the newsvendors, have their asylums and almshouses, their sick funds and pensions, each class subscribing from its own purse, and obtaining from the public whatever assistance it may be disposed to render. The promoters of the Dramatic College have followed in this respect the universal example.

But what did the ladies and gentlemen contribute out of their own pockets? we are asked. The subscription list tells us all we have a right to know. What is it to us, or to anyone, whether the actresses who presided at the Crystal Palace stalls purchased the bugles, laces, toys, trinkets, and other fanciful frippery they sold to benevolent buyers? We have no doubt that the ladies in question bore their full share of the burden, although it would be sheer impertinence to speak more of their charity than they have chosen to speak themselves. Of course, from the dignified and White Melancholy point of view, we might concur in thinking that one gentleman did not look very tragic as the guardian of Aunt Sally, and that another did not prove himself a genuine Cagliostro in his Cave of Mystery. We may admit that Cockshy is inconsistent with pathos, and that to sell snuff-boxes and penknives from a tray is not precisely High Art. But cui bono? Cannot we wear a mask of laughter over our good intentions? Why be angry with a broad grin if it helps to assuage a pang or to dry a tear? We have our peculiar national customs of raising funds in aid of benevolent objects. Now it is a sermon, and then a concert; to-day the bishop preaches, and to-morrow the comedian jests. This week the highest ladies of the land dispense vouchers, and next the actress steps forth into the real world, in a true spirit of sisterhood and mercy, to benefit those who have passed out of her bright though unreal world upon the dim border-lands of death, the poverty, the neglect, the disappointments of old age. Let us welcome her at her excellent work. She can be a good fairy in real life no less than behind the footlights. Her evil day, perhaps, may come, but come when it may she can never regret that, in the full harvest time of her prosperity, she assisted in succouring the poor and humble of her own profession. It was her duty—she fulfilled it well—and she may pass on, fancy free, notwithstanding the volunteer censures, which will not detract in the public mind one iota from her good intentions, nor injure in the slightest degree the admirable purpose she so materially assisted.

THE WORCESTER FESTIVAL.—If nothing else were wanted to indicate the close of the musical season and hegira of the singing birds, the busy note of preparation for the one hundred and thirty-seventh meeting of the three choirs of Worcester, Gloucester, and Hereford, would be sufficient warning of the approach of autumn, which at present seems likely to succeed winter without the customary intervention of spring and summer. The festival at Worcester this year will be a remarkable one, if only from the fact that it is the last time we shall have an opportunity of hearing Mad. Clara Novello, in a place of all others where it tells with the greatest effect—the nave of one of our noble cathedrals. Those whose sole impressions of an oratorio are confined to Exeter Hall, the Crystal Palace, or any other secular building, can form but little idea of what the Messiah or Elijah is like when performed in a building exclusively devoted to sacred purposes, possessing all the acoustic requirements in the highest perfection, and conveying a host of associations to the mind impossible to realise elsewhere. Who that has once listened to the "Hallelujah" chorus from the Messiah, "Thanks be to God" from Elijah, or any of the massive double choruses in Israel in Egypt, can ever forget the sensation it produced when heard in the grandly solemn and imposing vaulted area of the cathedrals of the three choirs. Nor is it in the choruses alone that this is felt. The solos are no less telling; and to hear Mad. Novello's voice in "Hear ye Israel," "Let the bright seraphim," "Rejoice greatly," or Mr. Sims Reeves in "Thou shalt break them," "Then shall the righteous," "Sound an alarm," or any other of the famous airs, is alone worth a journey to the meeting of the choirs. But of this more anon, when the 11th, 12th, 13th, and 14th of September are over, and we have once more the opportunity of recording our opinion of the three choirs in general, and Worcester in particular.

The forthcoming festival at Worcester is marked by a deviation from the regular routine which has for so many years been observed at these gatherings. It has been the custom to commence at 11 o'clock on the Tuesday morning with a full service, embracing the Dettingen Te Deum, two anthems, and a sermon on behalf of the Charity, for it must be borne in mind that it is only the surplus of receipts over expenses (for which latter the stewards are responsible) that can benefit the widows and orphans of the three dioceses, and as there is generally a deficit, the Charity would receive nothing were it not for the voluntary contributions at the doors, which ordinarily amount to from £900 to £1000. The sermon will not be omitted this time, but the service will begin on Tuesday morning at half-past 9 o'clock, and be performed by the three choirs alone, without the aid of the "stars," who are reserved for the oratorios. As there will be no charge for admission, and the service is repeated each morning, the most captious will have no cause to grumble at the arrangement. The first part of the Creation, and the whole of Mendelssohn's St. Paul, will be given on Tuesday. On Wednesday Spohr's Last Judgment, and a selection from Judas Maccabæus. On Thursday Elijah, and on Friday The Messiah. Such is the morning scheme. The evening concerts offer one novelty, a cantata by N. W. Gade, which is to be heard for the first time, entitled The Erl King's Daughter, Mesdames Rudersdorff and Sainton-Dolby, and Mr. Weiss sustaining the principal parts, with a chorus of Elfin Maidens. The May Queen of Professor Sterndale Bennett inaugurates the Tuesday evening, and with Mad. Novello, Mr. Sims Reeves, Miss M. Wells, and Mr. Weiss, will doubtless afford as much delight as everywhere else on its performance. The principal instrumental displays are Beethoven's symphony in D (No. 2), Weber's overture to the Ruler of the Spirits, and the overture to William Tell, a flute solo by Mr. R. S. Pratten, Mendelssohn's violin concerto by M. Sainton, and a fantasia by Mr. H. Blagrove. A novelty to Worcester will also be added in the shape of a selection from Mr. Vincent Wallace's opera, Lurline, Mlle. Parepa, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mad. Weiss, Miss M. Wells, Messrs. Montem Smith and Weiss, lending their services to give it due effect. The remainder of the evening programmes is made up of the usual material, with all of which the London concert goer is but too familiar, and marked by the one fault which seems inseparable from all provincial meetings, whether of the choirs or the manufacturing districts—excessive length. However, we suppose the managers understand the taste of the supporters, who desire quantity rather than quality, and if it only pays we have nothing to do but to wish the meeting success.

THE NINE O'CLOCK BELL.

IT is a beautiful custom which prevails in many towns and villages in New England,—this ringing of the church bells at the good wholesome hour of nine o'clock in the evening. It is an observance, too, sanctioned by time-honoured usage,—handed down to us by our puritan fathers,—redolent of antiquity, and of those good old days when people went to rest betimes, slept soundly and sweetly upon hard beds, and arose with the sun, or the larks, if you please. There is to us something inexpressibly pleasant in this ringing of the bells at nine o'clock, and we never pass a night in a strange village, but we feel more at home in it—more tranquil and fitted for repose, if we chance to hear at the usual time some faithful sentiment in a neighbouring steeple, sending forth its evening chime. There is more than we think in the power of early associations. We never forget the mellow tones of the church bell which graced the belfry of the village church in our native hamlet. Its cadences will ever and anon sound in our ears all our lives long, though many dreary miles of land or sea make a gulf between us and our early home.

Who has not some particular bell in his memory, which to his boyish eyes seemed the largest bell upon earth? What an interest it had in his eyes! How he watched with eagerness for its ringing, and with what a feeling of curiosity, mingled with awe, he mounted, for the first time, the rickety staircase, wound his way up through the unfurnished garret, and stood face to face with the object of his admiration; or looked down from the dizzy height upon mother earth far below, and the blue hills in the distance, standing up like armed sentinels against the sky. What a variety of cadences the old bell possessed! On gala-days it rang a merry peal, and the child's heart leaped for joy. On the Sabbath its tones were more solemn and majestic, according well with the solemnity of the day, and seeming to say to all within the sound of its voice, "This is none other than the house of prayer, the very gate of heaven;" but when it tolled the knell of a departed soul, the tones were sad and mournful, dying away upon the air with a tremulous sound, like a mourner's sob.

We have read that the travellers in foreign lands, with the broad ocean rolling between them and home, have sometimes awakened at night, and seemed to hear the church bells ringing in their homes beyond the sea; and so real did it seem to them, that it was difficult to dispel the illusion, if such it be. May it not be possible that in certain peculiar states of the mind,—that wonderful creation of a divine hand,—the faculties become so acute, so intensified, the delicate nerves of sensation so enhanced in power, that time and space are annihilated, and we are borne on the wings of the wind as it were, very near our home and friends. It was not all an illusion when the heroine of that most delightful novel—Jane Eyre—seemed to hear the voice of Rochester calling to her in the darkness. Who has not in his own experience known instances similar to this, of those who heard voices in the night-watches, and gained strength and courage thereby.

"Perched God's right hand in that darkness,
And were lifted up and strengthened."

One need not go to the city for sweet-toned, musical bells. In many of the rural villages of the north country, we may hear as rich, full tones,—as harmonious cadences as ever fell upon the listening air of evening from cathedral dome or lofty church-spire. It is, after all, the associations, the memories awakened, that render the tones of even a diminutive bell more majestic and soul-moving than organ music to our ears. We recollect one bell in an obscure country village whose mellow tones will live for ever in our heart. In the clear evenings of mid-summer, as the shadows deepened along the landscape and the stars peeped out one by one "in the infinite meadows of heaven," its clear, silvery tones might be heard echoing among the hills, proclaiming the hour of nine o'clock, and saying not inaudibly, to all the dwellers round about, "The night cometh; sleep on now and take your rest, for all is well!" It is impossible to describe the tranquillizing influence its tones exerted—the happy recollections it awakened in the hearts of those who nightly listened to its welcome music. At such a time, under the clear sky of a midsummer night,

"The friendships old and the early loves
Come back with a Sabbath sound as of doves
In quiet neighbourhoods."

Let us cherish with a feeling akin to veneration anything that tends to occasionally separate us from the busy toil and strife of life's battle, soothe and calm our troubled spirits, and fit us for repose! Long may it be before the time-hallowed customs die out in New England which set the church bells a-ringing at the good hour of nine o'clock, for with it would vanish one of the most valued associations of childhood.

"We may build more splendid habitations,
Fill our rooms with paintings and with sculptures, but we cannot Buy with gold the old associations."

Music in the South Seas.—Our Puritan ancestors, (says Mr. Dwight of Boston) used to pay their church rates in beans and cordwood, and the natives of the South Sea Islands now buy their concert tickets with bananas and pine-apples. We copy from the New York Musical Review the following poster and prices of admission of the Alleghanians, who are having a fine tour in the South Sea Islands. D. G. Waldron of this city is their business agent.

"By royal command of King Makea V. and the Rarotonga nobility, the Alleghanians will give a grand concert at the School-house this afternoon at four o'clock, January 19th, 1860. Prices of admission:—Tickets to admit one, 1 hog, or 2 pigs, or 1 turkey, or 2 chickens, or 25 pine-apples, or 2 bunches bananas, or 5 large pumpkins, or 2 baskets oranges. Children, half price."

The profits also might be a novelty. The writer of a letter says:—In order to get at the amount of the receipts in dollars and cents, I have valued everything at about New York retail prices—

79 hogs at $5 each	$395.00
93 turkeys at $1 each	93.00
116 chickens at 38 cents	44.08
16,000 cocoa nuts at 12 cents each	1920.00
5,700 pine-apples at 12 cents each	684.00
418 bunches bananas, averaging 75 to the bunch, making 31,350 bananas at 6 cents each ...	1881.00
600 pumpkins at 15 cents each	90.00
2,700 oranges at 2 cents each	54.00
limes, mats, fans, &c. about	25.00
Total	$5,086,00

Mr. Vincent William Wallace, the celebrated composer, has returned from the United States, to which he has recently paid a short visit on affairs of business. Mr. Wallace proceeds on Sunday to Wiesbaden, where he will doubtless put the finishing touches to his new opera of the Amber Witch, pronounced by all who have heard it superior even to Lurline. The Amber Witch is to be produced at Her Majesty's Theatre, after Mr. Macfarren's Robin Hood.

CHRISTIAN MINSTRELSY.

From Punch.

A Bill for interfering with Theatres and Public-Houses had been introduced into the House of Commons, but in consequence of the publication of a letter on the subject from the Christy Minstrels, who would be affected by its action, it was withdrawn, and the poetical person who writes the gibberish chanted by these begrimed parties received orders to prepare a song of jubilee. He sent an early copy to Mr. Punch, who is much pleased with it, and considers it quite up to the mark of the Christy poetry. The first of the fifty-three verses goes thus:—

"Take away dat Bill, Nigger,
Yaw, yaw, yaw,
Take away dat Bill, Nigger,
Him shan't be law.
Take away dat Bill, Nigger,
Yap, yap, yap.
Take away dat Bill, Nigger,
Dat's a good chap.
Take away, &c., &c., &c., &c."

The Japanese at Philadelphia.—At half-past two o'clock in the afternoon, about twenty-five of the members of the Embassy, consisting of the officials and servants, visited the Academy of Music, to attend the matinée at the Opera. The Embassadors were not present. Long before the hour for opening the doors of the Academy, a crowd gathered in front of the building, and in a few minutes after admission was gained, the parquet, first circle, and balcony, were filled with a well-dressed audience, a large portion being ladies. In the balcony, the centre rows of seats were reserved for the Japanese, and when they entered they had no difficulty in being accommodated, and were not compelled to bear the pressure of a crowd. A few were placed in one of the stage boxes, but these did not stay after the first piece. Tommy was along, dressed in his best, but looking very downhearted, the result, it is whispered, of a strong attachment for a young lady in Washington. The three physicians of the Embassy were also present, and were conspicuous from the closely shaven head. Most of those present exhibited, with evident satisfaction, gloves purchased since their arrival in the country, and in approved fashionable style they watched the ladies through opera glasses. The strangers glanced carelessly around the house, but did not seem astonished either at the magnificence of the building or the crowd of persons assembled to greet them. They have evidently schooled themselves to conceal their thoughts, and nothing can be gained by watching their countenances. Soon after the entrance of the Japanese, the orchestra, numbering over forty-five performers, opened with the grand overture to William Tell. To this the Japanese paid but little attention, but when the curtain rose on the second act of Lucrezia Borgia, with Mlle. Parodi as Lucrezia, every Mongolian who possessed an opera glass levelled it at the performers, and so watched them during the act, which was a short one, to the evident relief of the Japanese. Next, Buckstone's comedy of The Rough Diamond claimed their notice, and in this respect the acting was more pleasing to them than the singing. Many of the strangers conversed together, and seemed somewhat amused at the lady performers, while others smiled when the audience would applaud any "point" made in the course of the piece. All the performers played their best, and received considerable applause; but as nearly everybody was watching the effect of the play upon the Japanese, and thus losing the run of the performance, the enthusiasm was not so general as our people are in the habit of showing. The choruses of the Mœnnerchor and Young Mœnnerchor were given without any show of appreciation on the part of the Japanese, but the inexhaustible egg-bag of Blitz excited the undivided attention of the strangers. Mlle. Parodi gave the "Star-spangled Banner" in glorious style, assisted by a full chorus of two hundred singers.

This part of the performance was well managed. As the curtain rose, the singers were seen grouped in the rear of Mlle. Parodi, and on one side stood an American sailor with the flag of Japan, while on the other stood a representative of Japan, with the American colours. The magic dance of two nations, by Mr. W. Wood, caused them some amusement. Mr. Wood first appeared as a Japanese, and after dancing a few minutes, suddenly wheeled, and presented the appearance of an American sailor. But the pantomime of Vol-au-vent did the business. Here was something they could understand nearly as well as the rest of the audience, and although many of them endeavoured to keep a straight face, they gave it up after a few trials, and enjoyed themselves to their heart's content. One old fellow, who sat like a statue through the whole afternoon, smiled once at the antics of Mr. Wood; but feeling the impropriety of such undignified conduct, he held his fan to his face for concealment. They seem to have a quiet sort of enjoyment, for while several seemed convulsed with laughter, no sound of mirth could be heard two feet from them. After the performance, the party drove in open carriages to the hotel, no crowd following. And, by the way, we may state that a wrong impression has gone abroad that the Embassadors were insulted on Saturday. This is all a mistake. Along the route there were of course some noisy demonstrations, but no word was spoken which, if understood, could have roused their pride.—Dwight's Journal.

SIMS REEVES'S newest and most popular Ballad is "I love YOU," composed expressly for him by Balfe. "I love you" was sung by Mr. Reeves, and enthusiastically encored, at Mr. G. W. Martin's Concert, Exeter Hall, Mr. Lindsay Sloper's and Miss Susannah Cole's Concerts, St. James's Hall, and will be sung at Mr. Balfe's Benefit Concert at the Royal Surrey Gardens, and at the Crystal Palace Concerts. London, published, price 3s., by Duncan Davison & Co., 244 Regent Street, W.

MEYERBEER'S FOURTH MARCHE AUX FLAMBEAUX ("Royal Wedding March"), composed in honour of the Marriage of the Princess Royal of England with Prince Frederick William of Prussia, which was played with such immense effect by the Band of the Guides at the Fête of the Orphéonistes at the Crystal Palace, is published for the Pianoforte, price 4s., by Duncan Davison & Co., 244 Regent Street, London, W.

"I LOVE YOU," New Song by BALFE, composed expressly for Mr. SIMS REEVES, and sung by him with the greatest success, is published, price 3s. by Duncan Davison & Co. 244 Regent Street, W.

NEW SONGS by J. W. DAVISON, "Rough wind that moanest loud" (sung by Mr. Santley at the Monday Popular Concerts); "Swifter far than Summer's flight," (sung by Miss Palmer at the Monday Popular Concerts); "False friend, wilt thou smile or weep," Beatrice's song in the Cenci (sung by Madame Sainton-Dolby, at the Monday Popular Concerts, St. James's Hall); are published by Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201 Regent Street.

The above Songs form Nos. 1, 2, and 3 of Vocal Illustrations of Shelley.

"Mr. Santley was encored in one of the thoroughly picturesque and poetical settings of Shelley, by Mr. J. W. Davison, mentioned a week or two since. His song, 'Rough wind that moanest loud,' is a thoroughly good song."—Athenæum.

"Madame Sainton-Dolby's greatest efforts were called forth by Mendelssohn's 'Night' song, and Mr. J. W. Davison's 'False friend, wilt thou smile or weep' (from Shelley's 'Cenci'), to both of which she did the amplest justice. The latter work is one of the most poetical and beautiful of the 'Vocal Illustrations of Shelley,' composed by Mr. Davison many years ago, and which, though rarely heard, possess far more sterling merit than nine-tenths of the most admired songs of the day. A more intellectual treatment of the words could not well be imagined. Mr. Davison has completely caught the spirit of the poetry, and heightened its beauty by the potent charms which belong only to the sister art. 'False friend, wilt thou smile or weep,' sung to perfection by Madame Sainton-Dolby, was enthusiastically applauded."

Morning Post, April 26, 1860.

Cramer, Beale, and Chappell, 201 Regent Street.

"THE HARP OF WALES."

Sung by Mr. SIMS REEVES,

COMPOSED BY BRINLEY RICHARDS.

Price 2s. 6d.

"'The Harp of Wales' (sung for the first time) is a very graceful song, admirably adapted for Mr. Sims Reeves, and sung by the distinguished tenor with a refinement of expression which produced a magical effect on the audience, and raised demands for repetition which were not to be denied."—Daily Telegraph.

"'The Harp of Wales,' beautifully sung by Mr. Sims Reeves, was unanimously redemanded."—Morning Post.

"The other was new and sung for the first time by Mr. Sims Reeves. It is called the 'Harp of Wales,' and is a lovely and expressive melody. It was enthusiastically encored."—Daily News.

"Mr. Richards did honour to his fatherland by introducing a new song, 'The Harp of Wales,' which is sure to become a favourite of the Cymri, who are justly proud of their bards. So admirably was this sung by Mr. Sims Reeves, that an encore was inevitable, and the ballad was as warmly applauded the second time as the first."—Musical World.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., Dépôt Général de la Maison Brandus, de Paris; 244 Regent Street, corner of Little Argyll Street, where may be obtained—

"THE SULIOTE WAR SONG," sung by Mr. Santley, price 3s.

MUSIC AND THEATRES IN PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent).

Aug. 8, 1860.

I have at last something like an event to tell you about, but it has been a long time a coming. Boieldieu's Opera, Le Petit Chaperon Rouge, after being so long threatened by the manager of the Opéra Comique, was revived last Thursday. But before I enter into any details on this interesting musical occurrence, I will first discharge an agreeable duty and inform you of a promising début on the boards of the theatre in question by a young artist from the Théâtre Lyrique, Mlle. Marimon. This lady was to have made her first appearance in Boieldieu's opera, but Mad. Faure-Lefebvre having been re-engaged, the part, which devolved to her by right, could not be withheld from her; consequently the débutante had to content herself with the part of Catarina in Auber's Diamants de la Couronne. In this she has now been heard three times, each new performance confirming the favourable impression of the first. Mlle. Marimon, though she has much to learn as an actress, is already a brilliant and accomplished singer, and will, no doubt, with the intelligence she displays, make rapid progress.

Now for Boieldieu and his once most popular of comic operas. Le Petit Chaperon Rouge was first produced in 1818 at the Théâtre Feydeau, when the principal parts were sung by the celebrated Martin, Ponchard the elder, and Mad. Boulanger, afterwards succeeded by the lively and graceful Mad. Gavaudan. It was one of the most attractive works of the day, and retained its attractions till they were eclipsed by the greater vigour and depth of La Dame Blanche. All the old airs, which were constantly hummed by the fathers of the present generation, were heard again on Thursday night with a sort of affectionate pleasure. Many of them had still the power of touching by their simple grace, and seemed scarcely to have lost any of their original freshness. Mad. Faure Lefebvre was charmingly graceful in the part of Rose d'Amour, and obtained an encore in her ronde "Depuis longtemps gentille Annette." M. Crosti sang the music of Rodolphe admirably, but failed as an actor to give the part its proper characteristics. Rodolphe is a sort of Don Juan in water colours, and should be played with lightness and an easy grace of manner, tinged with mockery; but M. Crosti takes the character literally and prosaically, and deprives it consequently of all distinctive mark.

As I told you it would be, Robert le Diable was revived last Friday at the Grand Opéra, with Mad. Vandenheuvel Duprez as Isabelle, Mlle. Marie Saxe as Alice, and Mlle. Zina Richard the Abbess of the nuns. Mad. Vandenheuvel, the daughter of M. Duprez, the celebrated tenor, is not unknown to your readers, having been engaged in 1852 at Her Majesty's Theatre. She was the original Catherine in L'Etoile du Nord at the Opéra Comique. Her success was of the most decided character; and in the great air "Grâce! Grâce!" she completely enlèved the sympathies of the audience, and was triumphantly recalled at its conclusion. Mlle. Saxe, who also made her first appearance, was no less emphatically successful.

The Corporation of the city of Paris is busy pulling down and building theatres.

Diruit, edificat, mutat quadrata rotundis.

It has purchased of M. Dejean the Cirque Impériale, that the new Boulevard du Prince Eugène may pass over its site; and, on the other hand, it is buying out the tenants and holders of houses in the Rue Basse du Rempart, which are to come down to make room for the new Opera house. The Municipal Council have just voted unanimously in favour of the plans and designs last submitted to them.

At the last representation of Semiramis, at the Opéra, the audience was honoured with the presence of no less than three of the stars of your late operatic season—Mesdames Borghi-Mamo, Csillag, and Amalia Ferraris. By the way, I am informed that Mr. E. T. Smith has taken time so vigorously by the forelock, that he is already fully manned with a company for next season, such as shall rarely have been surpassed, if the information can be relied on, for it will number in its brilliant ranks, besides Mlle. Titiens, engaged for three years, Signors Mario, Mongini, Belart, Everardi, Ciampi; Mad. Grisi, who is to make her definite adieux to London and England; Mesdames Borghi-Mamo, Alboni, Lotti, Gassier, &c. &c. &c. Add to these Signors Giuglini and Vialetti, and M. Gassier, and the formidable phalanx, at the head of which the great E. T. S. proposes to march in his next campaign, will be complete. How he proposes to pay them, or what effect their payment, should it duly come off, will have on the reserve of bullion in the bank, are interesting questions for the speculations of the curious in such matters. Perhaps he may add Mlle. Lagrua to the list of celebrities. If so his chances will be all the better. She is now at Carlsbad, and is expected this week in Paris. At Pesth, where she sang last, the youth of that city presented her with a poignard of magnificent design to be suspended to her arm when she plays Norma. The blade is silver, and the handle beset with precious stones, bearing this inscription: "Alla Signorina Lagrua, la gioventú di Pest.—1860. (Peste! quelle galanterie!)

The competitions of the Paris Academy of Music I told you did not bring to light any subject of unusual promise. Not so those of the Brussels Institution, which, if report is to be trusted, has brought forth, under the auspices of its several professors, M. Lemmens, organ, Mad. Pleyel and M. Dupont, piano—a little batch of prize-men and prize-women, who are all veritables artistes!

A correspondent, happily released from the turmoil of Paris to wander in the Elysian regions of Baden, tells me the theatre which M. Benazet is building there is rapidly progressing, and to judge from the foundations which have been laid its size will be of the largest. In the same letter is a piece of Russian news, to the effect that a new Russian opera, by M. de Villebois, entitled Natascha, or the Brigands of the Volga, will be produced at the St. Petersburgh Theatre in October. Brigands seem to be in fashion, for there is a new opera by Verdi, talked of for the Scala at Milan, which is called The Brigands of the German Forests. Mercadante had been beforehand with him in taking the subject of Schiller's Robbers for his opera I Briganti.

I hear of all sorts of preparations making by the newly Gallicised inhabitants of Savoy to do honour to the Emperor and Empress of their choice on their approaching visit among them. The good city of Chambéry is determined to hit the taste or humour of the Imperial visitors, whichever way chance or caprice may at the moment direct it. The fêtes it is organising are to have at one and the same time a civil, a military, a religious, and an artistic complexion. There is to be a ball, a review, and a solemn performance of the Te Deum at the Metropolitan Church, to express the deep thankfulness of the Savoyard heart at being adopted into the bosom of Imperial France.

I will conclude with a piece of highly gratifying news. The King of Saxony has recalled Richard Wagner from the exile to which he had been doomed after the events of 1848. Has his majesty become at last convinced of the utter harmlessness of this profound person?

The New York Musical World, formerly edited by R. S. Willis, Esq., and the New York Musical Review, have been united and will hereafter be published by Mason Brothers as the New York Musical Review and Musical World. We wish our contemporaries all success in the new enterprise.

Paris.—The sky is as rigorous as ever with the Concerts des Champs Elysées; still, whenever the rain ceases, amateurs take the road to the concerts. Spontini's overture to Olympia, recently placed by Musard in his repertory, was very well received. It is said that we are shortly to have the overture to Pianella, by Flotow. The Siècle lately made some complaints against the severity exercised at the doors towards ladies presenting themselves without being accompanied by a gentleman, and in consequence of which a highly respectable family had been refused admittance. M. de Besselièvre, in an article to the editor, questions the truth of the report, and lays great stress on the small probability there is that respectable women would go alone to a public place of amusement which can boast of no reserved places, or private boxes, at the risk of exposing themselves to the vicinity of individuals of the masculine gender, who, without ever wishing to be so, might prove either disagreeable or compromising to ladies.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Resumé of the Season.

The Prophète, given on Saturday, brought the season to a close with brilliant éclat. The performance was magnificent from first to last, and the applause continuous and enthusiastic. To make use of an old phrase, everybody seemed to surpass himself, and certainly no entertainment of the year appeared to afford more unqualified gratification. The house was crowded in every part, and, long as the opera is, nearly the entire audience remained to the last scene, where the curtain falls upon the conflagration in the palace of Munster, and Jean of Leyden, like Mokanna, the veiled prophet of Khorassan—a prophet of a different stamp from the duped son of Fides—ensnares his enemies into his toils, and hurls them with himself to destruction. (M. Scribe no doubt had Moore's story in his head when he planned the catastrophe of the Prophète.) The success of Mayerbeer's great work went beyond the highest expectations. It was a pity, however, that it should be cut short in the height of its career. They somehow manage these things indifferently at the Italian operas. Last year the Pardon de Plbernel (Dinorah) was produced a few nights before the end of the season: it was given only three times, and its triumphant reception availed but little. Managers may fancy that a success commenced brilliantly one season may be carried on brilliantly the next. So it may, but there is always danger that a good deal may be forgotten, and then the management will have to begin its success anew. We have no fear, however, that in the case of the Prophète the memory of the public will have to be jogged. The grandeur and completeness of the execution, and the veritable wonders of the scenery and appointments, will keep the performance fresh in the minds of those who have seen and heard it. That the Prophète will constitute one of the eminent attractions of next season we feel assured. The expense involved in its production has been something fabulous, and hardly any amount of success in one season could pay back what has been laid out. But Mr. Gye looked forward to an enduring success, and invested his money with a fair prospect of having it returned with interest for many years to come. The season of 1860 has been pronounced, on authority, the most lucrative of the last ten years. This must be attributable in a great measure to the growing prestige of the theatre, since the past year has not been remarkable for its novelties or its new singers. The solitary novel production of the season, Gluck's Orfeo è Eurydice, was not much relied on, being brought out at a concert, the management fearing to essay it even on an extra night.

The new singers, Mad. Csillag and M. Faure, were certainly great "hits," and did not fail to exercise a powerful influence on the fortunes of the theatre, the lady more especially, who proved herself a consummate artist in every respect, and who grew more and more into favour with the public up to the last night of the season. Mad. Miolan-Carvalho, too, improved her position considerably, not because she did anything superior to Dinorah, the first part she performed in this country, but because she was better known and her talents consequently more thoroughly appreciated. The attraction of the season, moreover, was greatly enhanced by the announcement that Mad. Grisi was to give her "twelve last performances," a statement, nevertheless, that many, from reasons unnecessary to state, did not put implicit faith in, but which no doubt had its weight with some section of the musical community. The fact that Mad. Grisi's "twelve last performances" modulated into almost twenty, and that at the end of the season nothing whatever was said of the great artist's final departure—a very laconic mode of treating the public, by the bye—incontestably proves that she will re-appear to take more "farewells," and again not disappoint the world by her breach of promise. Mad. Grisi has frequently been warned to quit the stage when her successor should appear. She looked around her this season, anxious no doubt for an excuse to go, and cried, "Where is my successor?" and Echo answered "Nowhere!" And so she will return next year, just "once more," and await her successor, who is sure to come and declare herself in the person of Mlle. ———, or Mad. * * *. The public doubtless imagined that they should have been consulted in this matter; but the management thought otherwise, and seemed never to have considered how far playing at fast and loose with them might give offence. Fortunately, Mr. Gye has deserved well of the public, and the public have made all possible allowance under the circumstances. Like Sir Roger de Coverley, in the Spectator, if asked to pronounce an opinion, we shall assert "that much may be said on both sides." And so for the present we shall let the matter rest.

The Royal Italian Opera season for 1860 opened on the 10th of April with Dinorah, the success of which at the end of last year was so eminently great. Mad. Miolan-Carvalho had lost none of her attraction in Dinorah, and M. Faure — from the Opéra Comique—who made his first appearance as Hoel, was admired for his fine capable voice, manly style of acting, and good appearance. A new contralto, Mlle. Giulia Sylvia, who appeared as the male goatherd in the room of Mad. Nantier-Didiée, created more effect with her looks than her singing; and a new soprano, Mlle. Rappazini, as the female goatherd in the room of Mlle. Marai, created no effect at all.

Mad. Csillag made her first appearance on the English stage in Fidelio, on Thursday the 19th, and produced a powerful impression, both in her acting and singing. Mlle. Corbari, who re-appeared after several years, was the Marcellina; Signor Neri-Baraldi, Florestan; Signor Tagliafico, Pizarro; and M. Zelger, Rocco. Mlle. Corbari was singularly graceful and prepossessing as Marcellina, and sang the music like a real artist. Fidelio, nevertheless, did not greatly attract, and was given twice only in succession.

On Tuesday the 24th, La Favorita introduced Mad. Grisi and Signor Mario in their old parts of Leonora and Fernando. The lady was grand as ever; the gentleman troubled with catarrh. They were supported by M. Faure in the Castilian Monarch, his performance eliciting universal commendation.

Fra Diavolo was given for the first time since 1858, on Tuesday the 1st of May, Mad. Miolan-Carvalho filling the part of Zerlina in place of Mad. Bosio; and Mlle. Corbari doing duty for Mlle. Marai in Lady Allcash. Although no advance on her incomparable predecessor, Mad. Carvalho sang the music of Zerlina and an introduced air from the Serment with wonderful brilliancy: Mlle. Corbari was a great improvement on Mlle. Marai in the English lady. Signor Ronconi was more droll and whimsical than ever in Lord Allcash; Signor Gardoni was the Marquis again; Signor Neri-Baraldi, Lorenzo; Signor Tagliafico and M. Zelger, the brigands. The saltarello in the third act was danced by the graceful and piquant Mlle. Zina Richard.

Il Trovatore was given for the first time on Thursday, May the 3rd. Mad. Csillag appeared as Azucena, and Signor Graziani made his rentrée as the Count di Luna, his most popular part. Mad. Grisi and Signor Mario sang and acted their best as Leonora and Manrico. Mad. Csillag did not shine so grandly in Verdi's music as in Beethoven's.

The Barbière, on Tuesday the 10th, gave us Signor Mario in one of his most fascinating moods, singing Rossini's divine music with divine voice and divine expression. An essay might be written on this performance. Mad. Carvalho was not well suited in the music of Rosina, which she frittered away with surprising coolness. Signor Ronconi was as irresistible as ever in Figaro, a part in which he sets rivalry at defiance. The position of M. Zelger in the part of Doctor Bartolo declared an unaccountable weakness in one department of the Royal Italian Opera.

The first performance of Don Giovanni took place on Saturday, the 19th of May. The version of Signor Alary was rigidly adhered to, and Mozart was again in eclipse. Mad. Penco made her first appearance in Zerlina, one of her best performances, and Mad. Rudersdorff officiated in Donna Anna for Mad. Grisi, suddenly put hors de combat.

La Gazza Ladra was produced on Saturday, May the 26th, with Mad. Penco as Ninetta in place of Mlle. Lotti, and M. Faure as Fernando in the room of Signor Debassini. Both were decided improvements. Mad. Nantier-Didiée made her rentrée as Pippo. Signor Ronconi's Podestà, as regards the acting, was incomparable. The music unfortunately is too low for him.

The Huguenots, produced on Tuesday the 5th of June, comprised two important changes in the cast—Mad. Miolan-Carvalho for Mlle. Marai in Marguerite de Valois, and M. Faure for Signor Polonini in St. Bris. Mad. Carvalho sang the music of Marguerite with intense brilliancy, and M. Faure proved himself an excellent substitute for Tamburini in the fanatic governor of the Louvre. With Mad. Grisi as Valentina, and Signor Mario as Raoul, this performance, as may readily be imagined, was one of the most powerful of the season.

I Puritani was given as an extra performance on Monday, June the 11th, with by no means a strong cast. Mad. Penco certainly displayed admirable powers in Elvira, and achieved a genuine success. Arturo was played by Signor Gardoni, Riccardo by Signor Graziani, and Giorgio by Signor Ronconi.

Martha was given on Tuesday, June the 19th, with Mad. Penco as Lady Henrietta, sustained last season by Mlle. Lotti, and in 1858 by Mad. Bosio. Mad. Penco stands midway between her two predecessors, wanting the voice and charm of one, and surpassing the other both in talent and accomplishment. Signor Mario's Lionel is a fine performance, full of tenderness and passionate fervour, and becoming in everything. When in the vein he sings the music delightfully.

Gluck's Orfeo è Eurydice was tried on the evening of Wednesday, the 27th of June, in a sort of combined entertainment. The performance did not attract. The same master's Iphigenia in Tauris had been performed at St. James's Hall a short time previously with but little effect. The performance at the Royal Italian Opera, however, differed materially, inasmuch as scenery, dresses, and decorations were employed. The cast of characters comprised—Eurydice, Mad. Penco; Orfeo, Mad. Csillag; The Happy Shade, Mad. Miolan-Carvalho; and Cupid, Mad. Nantier-Didiée. To the lovers of real music the performance afforded an immense treat. Mad. Csillag's Orfeo rose to the highest grandeur and majesty, and the other characters were admirably sustained. The scenery and costumes were wonderfully picturesque.

The first performance for the season of Norma took place on Thursday, the 28th, and attracted one of the most crowded and fashionable audiences ever assembled in the theatre. Mad. Grisi achieved all her old laurels in one of her grandest impersonations. Mlle. Corbari made a charming Adalgisa, and Signor Tagliafico a solid and weighty high priest. Signor Neri-Baraldi was hardly the beau ideal of the Roman centurion.

Lucrezia Borgia, given on Thursday, July the 5th, with Mad. Grisi, Signors Mario and Ronconi in the principal personages, was avowedly one of the most striking performances of the season.

On Thursday, July the 12th, the Prophète was revived after an interval of five years. Of the performance, the artists, the getting-up, and all connected therewith we have recently spoken at length, and need not now recapitulate.

Rigoletto, produced on Saturday, July the 21st, interrupted the career of the Prophète for one night, and afforded Mad. Miolan-Carvalho an opportunity of testing her powers in Verdi's music, in which she came off with flying colours. It is unnecessary to allude to Signor Mario's Duke, and Signor Ronconi's Rigoletto —both, in their different ways, incomparable.

The Prophète—interrupted on two other occasions, by the Huguenots and Don Giovanni, Signor Tamberlik assuming, in Mozart's opera, his old part of Don Ottavio, and singing with immense effect—ran to the last night of the season, gaining in attraction with every performance.

The new Floral Hall, a spacious and magnificent saloon, intended to be devoted to a variety of purposes, was opened as a promenade, after the performance in the theatre, about the middle of the season, and was so used on several nights. A grand show of flowers took place shortly after the opening, and in the evening the visitors to the boxes, stalls, and pit were allowed the right of entrance. Morning concerts too were given occasionally, and proved highly attractive.

Lola Montez.—The American journals announce the death of this once celebrated danseuse, after an illness of twelve days, brought on by an attack of apoplexy.

Dieppe.—Felix Godefroid, the celebrated harpist, who may be remembered in London in 1845, is about to give a concert in this city.

The Performance.

In order to avoid having to return to the subject, let us state, once for all, very emphatically, that the majesty of the mise-en-scène is all that can be desired; and that, jealously desirous of illustrating Rossini's work, some of our greatest artists have lent the aid of their pictures and their sketches, and others that of their pencils, in order to realise a Babylon, with its palaces and temples, its aerial gardens, its tombs, and its subterranean galleries, worthy of the most correct and conscientious Assyrian archæology: so much so, indeed, that MM. Despléchin, Cambon, Thierry, Nolau, and Rubé have transformed themselves into historical painters in the widest acceptation of the word. The same may be asserted of the character and magnificence of the costumes, which have been studied and reproduced with the most scrupulous fidelity. In short, all this material and artistic portion of the mise-en-scène reflects the greatest honour on M. Alphonse Royer.

The ballet alone might be improved; but we all know that in Rossini's operas this accessory has invariably been somewhat neglected, when—as is most frequently the case—it has not been neglected entirely. The Italian Semiramide had no ballet; the French Sémiramis might have done without one. We should have lost the reproduction of a dance-air from Mosè, and the very agreeable music with which M. Carafa's lyre was inspired for a pas of Nineveh women; but, to make up for this, Rossini's work would not have been stopped in its triumphal progress by a ballet, after all more Parisian than Babylonian, a fact which caused a neighbour of ours—known as a master of choreography—to say: "The Assyrian dancers were very advanced before the Christian era."

We now come to the Sisters Marchisio, the new attraction of the evening. We will not say they represented the Semiramis and Arsaces of antiquity. Those grand figures have disappeared from the stage of the world, even at the Opéra, which possesses the secret of bringing about the most fabulous resurrections. The Sisters Marchisio are contented with singing Rossini's music; but sometimes in so unctuous and catching a manner that the audience are infinitely charmed; so much charmed, indeed, that "encore" issues from all their lips simultaneously. Such was the effect of the admirable duet in the third act: —

Unis dans nos malheurs,
Mêlons nos pleurs.
Les cœurs en souffrance,
Font un bonheur de l'espérance.
Le sort, dans ses terribles lois,
En ce jour fatal nous assemble;
Restons unis, pleurons ensemble,
Nos deux cœurs ont la même voix.

The fact is that, at a certain moment, the two voices of the Sisters Marchisio constitute only one, so much are they swayed by the same soul and the same sentiment. It is long since we heard anything so completely harmonious; it is, we repeat, indescribably charming, and this one concerted piece would be sufficient to establish the reputation of the two sisters, even if they did not possess first-rate powers of execution. The soprano, Mlle. Carlotta, has a voice of that incisive quality which, to a certain extent, replaces the magisterial breadth of a Semiramis at the Grand Opéra. Her vocal chords speak in the most sympathetic and distingué manner. Paralysed at first by visible emotion, they speedily recovered their natural vibration, and it may be asserted that, during the whole performance, Mlle. Carlotta Marchisio's talent kept rising more and more in the estimation of the general public and of connoisseurs. Her sister Barbara possesses, perhaps, a less happy voice. Yet it has breadth and compass. Arsace is not deficient in style,—quite the reverse; but, to sum up, the sympathy inspired in the audience by each of the two sisters is not the same until the moment of their duet, which is, and always will be, in France as in Italy, the most beautiful jewel in their crown. With what acclamation was it redemanded, and with what applause did the house greet the new points d'orgue, with which, after the fashion of Malibran, Pasta, and Damoreau, the sisters surprised and delighted their hearers!

A large share of the honours of the evening fell to the lot of Obin, who, as Assur, was superb in voice, pourtrayal of character, and costume. He has studied and meditated on his part like a great artist who wishes to render himself worthy of his task, and he succeeded perfectly in his double capacity of singer and actor. Coulon (Oroes) and Dufrêne (Idrene) likewise deserve all the praise which must be lavished on the orchestra and choruses. In short, MM. Dietsch, Victor Massé, Vauthrot, and Croharé have deserved well of the public and the Opéra.

Why was it fated that M. Vauthrot could not be present at the success of which so large a share is his by right, as head of the vocal department? The chest complaint which attacked him like a thunder clap at the last grand rehearsals, left him only to make way for a most intense fever, during which Semiramide has been constantly uppermost in his mind. Let us trust that the disease will soon yield to the remedies of art lavished on him with marks of the liveliest sympathy.

ROSSINI

Before, During, and After the Performance.

A single official act preceded and followed the solemn transformation of Semiramide into French. It was the authorisation given by Rossini to his friend Carafa in the following terms:—

"My dear friend,—Since it is proposed to bring out Semiramide at the Opéra, and as you know I do not busy myself with things of that kind, I beg you will undertake the task; I give you the most complete latitude for whatever arrangements you may deem necessary. As this labour will be your work, it will be also your property, and all the author's rights, both in and out of the theatre, will belong to you, just as they would for an opera by yourself.

"Yours affectionately,
"G. Rossini."

Rossini has been called "the sublime idler," because, doubtless, no musician has ever written, or writes, more music—and what music!—than Rossini. Some day or other history will call him "the sublime miser," for he is always giving. What he has just done with regard to Semiramide he did some years ago with regard to Robert Bruce, and on that occasion his renunciation of all his rights was dated from Bologna. Did he not also do the same thing for the benefit of the authors, composers, and musical publishers who urged him to honour them by belonging to their society?" "I consent," he replied, "but on the express condition that all the money my rights produce me shall be contributed to your charitable fund."

Again, what about the city of Paris, from whom the illustrious maëstro solicited a plot of ground near the Bois de Boulogne, for the purpose of building a summer villa? Was there not a desire to offer him this plot of ground for his lifetime? "I should prefer paying for it," he replied, "and being completely at home, while at the same time among you, for, sooner or later, my property will go to your poor." It was thus that this illustrious and worthy master paid a hundred thousand francs for what he could have obtained gratuitously from the munificence of the capital of the arts, which he has enriched with imperishable works.
